TO VOL. II.

ANOTHER Volume of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS! It is with inexpressible gratification that we present to our readers this second demonstration of the prosperity with which they have crowned our labours, and honoured our exertions, on their behalf. To ourselves, these succeeding volumes have a peculiar charm of encouragement—they are the milestones which mark the progress of the interesting journey we have chosen—a journey which presents to us eternally fresh landscapes of the mind—spiritual pictures and new beauties at every turn; and, while it does not separate us from sweet familiar companionship with the living world, it opens up for us the secrets of Time, and sheds the sunshine of intellectual loveliness everlastingly upon our way. Yes, these tomes are little monuments of Art, which we are building up on the broad lands of the community; and on the four tablets of which Literature, Poetry, History, and the Intelligence of the social world, have graven inscriptions which we hope will prove as indelible as they are distinct.

But there is another reflection which this new volume brings with it, not less gratifying, although gratifying in a more worldly sense, than the glad one inspired by the elevated nature of the purpose we are working out. That it is tinged with vanity, we admit; but it is a vanity in which we take more pride than shame:—it consists in the maintenance, at the end of two volumes of hard but pleasurable labour, of that peculiar isolation of position which this Journal assumed for itself in the outset, and which it has, in spite of competition, rigidly preserved. By isolation we do not imply an absence of sympathy with the Press. No journal has received, no journal has responded to, such sympathy more than the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. But we mean that we originated what we are bold enough to denominate a new branch of civilization, and of that branch—now fertilizing and spreading into many channels—as head and leader, we have stood immutable and alone. It must speak volumes for the energy, perseverance, and enterprise of the Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, that, with a host of such imitations as ever spring up upon the success of a new and popular discovery, it has maintained a superiority that has kept it without a single rival. There are other flags waving upon outposts below us, but ours is the banner upon the hill-fort. There are some strivers behind us, but such has been our own celerity, that the faster they have run, the greater has grown the distance between us; and the British public, with a warm fiat of recognition, has proclaimed how immeasurable that distance has become. We have won every race for our backers; and, at the end of our second campaign, we find ourselves with an army of thousands of readers, evermore increasing and recruiting, but without a single seceder from its ranks.

We hope we may honourably attribute much of the pride and value of this position to the tone of high morality in every branch of public discussion, which it has been the glory of this Journal to preserve. For the sake of our real, faithful, and influential patrons—the RESPECTABLE FAMILIES OF ENGLAND,—we have kept the purity of our columns inviolate and supreme. The Clergy have given us their distinct and expressed approval; and there is no class of dissentients that has not supported, upon the broad principle of public virtue, our adherence to those undisputed maxims of morals and Christianity upon which all good men are agreed. Truth—the beautiful eternal Truth—has been our guide in all things; and, by her aided in our humble industry, we have sought for intellectual progress, social happiness, and political justice and civilization. That this conscientious course has been successful entirely is honourable to moral influences, and the advance of the enlightened taste which accepts what is wholesome, and rejects what is vicious and depraved. It has been the means of placing us at the head of the circulation of the London Weekly Press.

It is also somewhat flattering to find that the value of such a publication as the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been recognised and seized upon with extraordinary rapidity abroad; for, although there has been no attempt to equal the lavish embellishments of this Journal, yet there are such organs of public intelligence started in France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, and America, illustrated upon a similar principle, though not to a similar extent.

Do we hear our readers hint "Sir Editor—your trumpeter is not dead?"—then we reply: "No, and as long as you our friends will sympathize with our prosperity, and rejoice to hear of our success, we will try to invest him with a contingent immortality."

But now for the future. Let us pour gentle words of promise into the public ear; and, for gratitude for the past,—with a thankfulness for public fosterage too glowing and heartfelt for soul-utterance, still less for calm interpretation upon a printed page,—let us give assurance of such devotion to the interests of the community as they have generously manifested in our own.

All that a careful attention to the progress of illustrative art can enable us to do, to improve even our present magnificent scale of illustration—all that expense and anxiety can effect in opening up the sources of intelligence, and recording the history of the times—all that may set the stamp of grace upon literature—of truth upon science—of genius upon poetry—and of eloquence upon the cause of social advancement—shall be sought for with unremitting energy, and gathered into our weekly portfolio with the best industry of mind; and above all, let our readers believe that the great events of the interval between this and such another greeting of them—all the startling and prominent episodes by which it may be marked—shall find place with a depth, a richness, a fulness, a freshness, and unsparing abundance of illustration, which will be found embellishing, and making vital with truth, power, and beauty, the Third Volume of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

OUR SECOND VOLUME.

Another tome here tells the flight of Time,
And how his measure has been richly filled!
What pulses in the Nation's hearts have thrilled,
While Hist'ry followed on her march sublime!
Here are the records of each mighty pace
Marked out by mind; and beautifully here,
Through world's story of a half-sped year,
Art sheds her fair and fascinating grace,
Blent with stored knowledge for the human race.
Another glorious volume of the past
Is now spread open at the reader's will!
May we not boast it brighter than the last,
And hope for new ones fair and fairer still,
Till all Perfections rare our dreams of good fulfil!

NEW MODEL PRISONS.

A SERIES of descriptive illustrations of the New Model Prison appear among the engravings of our present number, and lead us almost naturally to a contemplation not only of the system which is to be pursued in this new abode of penance, but of the general condition of prison discipline in England. We regret in the outset to be obliged to express an opinion that such condition is lamentably at variance with the principles of humanity and civilization—that it is degrading to our better nature, and tainted with an ill-considered cruelty that has its true spring only in the more brutalizing depravities of the human heart. We are sadly afraid that it is in evidence before society that we underfeed, underclothe, overwork, and overpunish those criminals who have offended against our laws. Now, it is not in the spirit of the British constitution that we can do so, and therefore we proclaim our abhorrence of undue severity, and our hearty hatred of any system which, overstepping the beautiful limits of pure-souled justice, sets the seal of cruelty upon crime, and carries its baleful tendency so far as to sap and undermine the fair and fertilizing springs of human life itself. We have no right (save by the dread award of death in cases of extreme guilt, and moralists and Christian philosophers make that right seriously questionable) to pour into any other human punishment the elements of dissolution or disease, to drink revenge from the bright fountains of existence, and give either to mind or body more privation or endurance than it is manifestly capable to sustain. Now, we do unhesitatingly declare that we are sanctioning the commission of this glaring injustice in very many of our country gaols, and that its cruel influences will break into fearful operation in the remarkable structure which is this week submitted to our readers, and which has the unenvied distinction of being a model prison. We should not, however, have made so distinct a feature of it in this journal if we did not find that the literal signification of its title is about to be practically carried out, and that other edifices built upon its model are either in project or progress of erection in several other districts of the land. We are gentle enough to believe that a true model prison should be an establishment devoted to upholding the severe dignity of retribution without cruelty—that it should be commodious without the luxury of comfort—healthy without freedom—airy without cheerfulness—habitable without danger—and stern and gloomy without predisposing to insanity or despair. Its inmates should be dieted with a strictness amounting almost to privation and no more—clothed with only so much warmth as should mark the distinction between comfort and necessity—worked up to the point of toil and weariness, but only so as to punish and not exhaust the frame. But these new model prisons (for the bad approval of the authorities is pluralising them fast) go far beyond the limits which fairness and humanity suggest. They may be (after the recent prison reports and the excitement they have created) furnished with better rules of diet, clothing, and sick allowance than some of the country bastiles, but their internal discipline will, unless the public voice lustily cry down the infamy, be brutal and terrible in the extreme. From the statement of one correspondent, who sends us his name and offers us documents, it would seem that in some of the cells the agency of darkness is to be used, while the silent system is to be pursued to a sickening and horrible extent. That the very sound of companionship may be banished, the mere footfall of humanity hushed in that voiceless home of shuddering and suffering sin, the keepers are to wear cloth shoes (!); and the very surveillance of the work at which the wretched prisoners are employed is to be invisible to the miserable creatures watched. The work is to embrace the full twelve hours, exclusive of the time occupied by meals, unless the prisoners wish to labour longer!

But the silent system alone is a sufficient plea for popular indignation. It is unnatural, and must baffle all the strength and energy of the resourceless and uneducated mind. Its tendency is to close the eyes of the intellect, and break the chords of the heart. It is to make a Babel of the lofty and beautiful architecture of the senses, and to give unto idiotcy a throne upon the human brain. It is to outrage charity, and mercy, and humanity, and to arrogate to law one of the most wild and fearful of Heaven's deep afflictions; it is to practise, under the insulted banner of Justice, the crime of driving mad! The silent system is modern cruelty, devised to impair the health, destroy the constitution, and obliterate the mind. It neither reforms, reclaims, nor cures. To the dreadful catalogue of horrors produced by it, we have the following recorded in Wednesday's Times:—On the 12th of February, 1841, a man died apparently from fright. He was put into a solitary cell, and was found dead the next morning. There were no indications of the cause excepting congestion of the brain. There was a rumour that the cell was haunted. He was a fine and powerful man. The verdict was, 'Died from apoplexy produced by the effect of a superstitious dread of solitary confinement.' He had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and the last week to be spent in solitary confinement. Some of the prisoners heard him cry out. The turnkey thought him rather low-spirited when he placed him in the cell. On the previous day the deceased had told the cook that he was going into solitary confinement, and that he feared he never should live the week out; he added, that there was 'some one walking there.'"

As this silent system is the main ingredient in the discipline of the New Model Prison the humane public cannot do better than to discourage it in warm and fervent terms, and to seek to procure its explosion by every earnest and legitimate means. Remonstrate with the authorities, petition the legislature, appeal to the gentler and nobler sympathies of society, and do not leave unprobed for mercy and pity the generous bosom of the Queen. The press will aid the public in its truly Christian crusade against cruelty; and these new model experiments upon the endurance of nature will cease to degrade the sacred name of justice, to make the law monstrous, and its retribution a disgrace and sin.

The subject of prison discipline generally is one of importance and interest, and all the disclosures which have been lately made have tended to quicken public feeling in this regard. Society has felt a sort of shame in the consciousness of inhumanity even towards its criminals, and the conviction that they have been ill-treated to an alarming extent has set the spirit of inquiry in advance of the genius of reform. Such facts as are adduced by the official reports have not been without their moral and warning, and their distressing revelations have had a good effect upon the public mind. Here is one example in reference to diet:—

The diet allowed in this gaol (Monmouth) being entirely of a vegetable kind, almost necessarily, after a time, brings on derangement of the digestive organs, especially in those persons accustomed to a different one. Men, whose dissolute lives and irregular habits have already predisposed them to the inroads of disease, are committed most generally for hard labour, and sentenced to continue in gaol for a year or two or more, without any other support than gruel, bread, and potatoes. For a few months the change is not felt, perhaps, but after this period they become weak, and disordered digestion is followed by disease in various shapes, the effects of which cannot be counteracted by medicine alone, without the aid of a more generous diet, not perhaps needful merely for a few days or a week, but in some cases required, on and off, during a long period of imprisonment. Now during the last quarter, allow me, if you please, to call your attention to the three following cases, which of themselves form no small portion of the quarterly diet bill:—William —— is a debtor; he has been in prison since the 1st of March, 1839, i. e. a year and nine months. He is an old man, and came here in a dreadfully emaciated condition. He has been, on and off a patient of mine ever since his committal, and for the last four months a constant inmate of the infirmary. He has had frequent threatenings of dropsical effusion, with a chronic abscess in the shoulder during the greater part of the latter period, which has been discharging for some time past. This is a case you will readily see has urgently required a regular increase upon the prison allowance. The next case is that of William ——. This man was committed on the 19th of October, 1837, i. e. three years. His general health became so much impaired during the last quarter, that his sight was nearly gone, and until I put him upon a better diet all medical treatment was entirely useless. Under the combined influence of both, however, his health and sight were restored, though, I am sorry to say, at the expense of a long continuance on the extra diet list.

Here is a gaol diet and system first bringing a man to death's door, and then an abandonment of the bad discipline curing him at the county's expense. The absurdity of this is equal to the cruelty; but, in truth, there is no aspect of the general question of our modern prison system that does not indicate a necessity for reform, or that can be at all regarded with anything like credit to the national character for humanity and justice.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers have been for the most part occupied with the President's message, which revives the discussion on the right of search question, and will lead, no doubt, to renewed agitation for the abrogation of the treaties between France and England.

Don Ruiz de Luxuriaga, a Spanish refugee residing in France, commenced, in November last, an action against Don Carlos, in the Civil Tribunal of Bourges, to recover the sum of 7,722f. and interest, as the balance due to him from the Prince, of a sum of 43,722f. advanced by the plaintiff for, or on account of the royal defendant. The cause came to a hearing three days ago; but the Tribunal, on an objection raised as fin de non recevoir in behalf of Don Carlos, declared itself incompetent, on the ground that the French tribunals have no jurisdiction in civil cases between two foreigners, and ordered Don Ruiz de Luxuriaga to pay the costs.

The Moniteur Universel of Saturday contains a royal decree, applying the French law on weights and measures to Algeria; and the Moniteur Parisien announces that the sugar-bill will be presented to the Chambers on the 10th, the day after the opening of the Chambers.

The Paris papers of Sunday were a complete blank as to news. The King of the French was receiving at the Tuileries the usual complimentary addresses from the various departments of the state, and a brilliant sun was shining on the numerous promenaders congregated for the annual visits of new year's day. The mail bags were made up at noon on Sunday. The Législateur, a Conservative organ, says that at a Cabinet Council, held on Saturday, it was definitely arranged that the Chambers should be opened with a royal speech.

The Moniteur of Monday publishes the addresses delivered to Louis Philippe on new year's day. We give the diplomatic one, with the reply, in extenso:—

THE MARQUIS DE BRIGNOLE SALE, SARDINIAN AMBASSADOR, IN THE NAME OF THE CORPS DIPLOMATIQUE.

"Sire,—I have again the happiness of acquitting myself of the honourable task of presenting to your Majesty the homage and good wishes of the diplomatic body. A painful recollection is attached to the year that has just elapsed. Amidst so many regrets, Providence has left to your Majesty real grounds of joy and hope, and to your kingdom guarantees of order and stability. Our hearts join in the feelings from which, under circumstances so cruel, you have received from all parts such consolatory testimonies. Deign, Sire, to accept this, the respectful expression of our sentiments, as well as our prayers, for the happiness of yourself and your august family. The peace which so happily subsists, and the maintenance of which is the object of every cabinet, becomes firmer from its duration, for at every succeeding day its benefits become more and more highly appreciated. May it long continue to be the portion of Europe, and may France continue for many years in the enjoyment of it, under the reign of your Majesty."

The King replied:—"I have been deeply affected by the share which all the sovereigns whom you represent have taken in the immense loss I have sustained, and I seize this opportunity of again declaring how much I have valued the testimonies they offered to me. Could my family or myself receive any consolation, we should find it in the manifestations with which we have been surrounded by all France, and the universal sentiment which was everywhere evinced as to the necessity of providing against the future consequences to be feared from our great calamity. Everything gives me confidence that Providence will continue to bless our common endeavours to prevent the repose of the world from being disturbed, and to insure the maintenance of the general peace, by a continuation of that good harmony which so happily subsists between all the powers. I am sensible of the good wishes you express to me in the name of the diplomatic corps. I thank you in the name of the Queen, and of all my family. It is always with pleasure that I receive them through you as their organ."

The other addresses took no part the Duke of Orleans's decease, and the following replies of his Majesty to those of the Peers and Deputies afford an accurate notion of their tenor:—

TO THE PEERS.—"If I regret that the adjournment of the Chambers prevents my receiving from the Chamber of Peers as a body the expression of the sentiments of which it has given to me so many proofs, and which I am always pleased to hear from the mouth of its worthy chief, it is a real consolation to me that this circumstance has not prevented my seeing the peers round me in their individual capacity, and receiving from them anew those demonstrations which are once the support of my courage, and the hope of the future that remains for me. (Here the King was greeted with loud acclamations.) This future you know is entirely consecrated to France. The blow which has struck me was of a nature to inspire grave anxiety. Your wisdom, the fidelity of the Chambers to monarchial principles, the support which I have found in them, and the national ardour so openly expressed for myself and my family, have removed even the dread of this event which this immense calamity might have drawn upon France. (Renewed acclamations.) I avail myself of this opportunity of thanking you in the name of the Queen and all my family, and assuring you once more of the warm affection which I have always felt for the Chamber of Peers."

TO THE DEPUTIES.—"I am deeply affected by the anxiety of the Deputies whom I see assembled in such numbers around me to express sentiments which are my consolation in the misfortune that I have experienced. It is those sentiments which have sustained my courage; and it is your powerful support, seconded by the unanimous voice of the nation, which has dissipated alarms, and given new guarantees to the efficiency and stability of our institutions. The confidence of the nation has gained strength, and it is in that confidence that we shall find the necessary strength to preserve and transmit safely the sacred deposit of our institutions, and of those liberties which rest on them alone. I thank you most sincerely for the sentiments you have manifested towards me, and I take pleasure in repeating how delightful it is to me to hear them. Continue to afford my Government this loyal support, and France, safe from all dangers as from all fears, will gloriously pursue her career of peace, happiness, and prosperity."

The trial of Jacques Besson for murder, the particulars of which we gave in last week's paper, after frequent adjournments, was at length brought to a conclusion. The president summed up the evidence on both sides, leaving out all that had no direct bearing on the accusation. At one o'clock, the jury withdrew to deliberate on their verdict. The questions put to them by the court were as follow:—Is Jacques Besson guilty of having, on the night of the 1st September, 1840, committed, with premeditation and surprise, voluntary homicide on the person of Louis Villebardin de Marcellange? Is Jacques Besson guilty of having, by gifts, machinations, or promises, excited the author or authors of the said murder to commit it, and has he thus rendered himself an accomplice? At the end of an hour the jury returned, and, having taken their seats, the president said, "Upon my honour and my conscience, in the presence of God and man, the declaration of the jury is on the first question, 'Is the accused guilty of having, on the evening of the 1st September, 1840, committed voluntary homicide on the person of M. de Marcellange in his château of Chambias?'—Yes, by a majority; on the circumstance of premeditation and surprise—Yes, by a majority." No declaration of extenuating circumstances was made by the jury. Besson, who had been removed from the court when the jury retired, was now brought in again. He was exceedingly pale, almost inanimate. Arsac and Bernard, who had been removed with Besson, were not brought back. The verdict of the jury was now read to the prisoner. He heard it without uttering a word. The Procureur-General called upon the court to pronounce sentence of death, and to declare in the interest of society, by way of example, that the execution should take place in the public square at Puy. The president: Accused, have you anything to say as to the application of the punishment? Besson was silent, but held down his head and wept. Whilst the judges were in their council-room deliberating on the sentence every eye was fixed on Besson. He remained without movement, his head resting on his left hand. He appeared to be suffering great mental agony. The judges having returned, the president, amidst profound silence, pronounced sentence of death, ordering the prisoner to be executed on the public square at Puy. Besson was removed by the gendarmes. He was at this time in such a state that he could scarcely walk; but, on reaching a waiting-room to which prisoners are first taken when they are removed from the court, he appeared to regain a little strength. He struck his forehead violently with his right hand, and said, "For all that, the whole of what my counsel said was the truth." A Lyons letter of the 28th states that Besson has given notice of his intention to appeal to the Court of Cassation against his sentence.

The Courrier Français has passed by sale into new hands, and its editor, M. Leon Foucher, as well as all its principal writers, have published letters to state that they have no further connexion with the journal.

SPAIN.—By Madrid papers of the 23rd and 24th we learn that the Regent was expected in the capital on the 31st. The arrival of Van Halen's children in Madrid had given rise to reports that the ex-Captain-General of Catalonia had arrived himself, whereas he remains in private life at Barcelona. Dissolution of the Cortes was still generally believed in Madrid. The Espectador calls for a solemn inquiry into the conduct of M. de Lesseps, the French consul at Barcelona. Senor Coltantes, in defending the Peninsular, a republican print, made use of very violent language against Espartero, and was repeatedly called to order by the judge.

Barcelona papers of the 24th contain the Regent's decree, dated Sarria the 21st, replacing Van Halen by General Seoane as Captain-General of Catalonia. The Count de Peracamp's farewell to the troops is included in the order of the day; it is in the usual strain. The Constitutional, alluding to M. de Lesseps's promotion, maintains that France, by this step, has forced Espartero to throw himself into the hands of England.

The Madrid journals of the 25th ult. bring nothing of moment from that capital. The official despatches, published in the official Gazette, announce that tranquillity reigned in Spain. The Correspondal declares that Generals Pastors, Castro, Atero, and Linares will remain in Perpignan, and will not submit to what they term the unjust and illegal measures of the Barcelona authorities. They had performed their duty, and they declined to obey the summons to constitute themselves prisoners as if they had been criminals. It was these officers, it will be recollected, who evacuated the fort of Maranzas, at the instigation, and on the representation, of the French Consul, as asserted by Pastors in his dispatch of the 23rd of March. M. de Lesseps, we need scarcely add, is at direct variance with Pastors's despatch.

A letter from Perpignan of the 26th ult. says—"Last Thursday a panic seized on the inhabitants of Perpignan. According to reports in circulation, the refugees from Barcelona at Perpignan were to make an attack on Junquère, and afterwards proceed against Olot, Figueras, &c. All, however, ended in a display of enthusiasm for Espartero and a sounding of the tocsin."

All the foreign consuls residing in Barcelona gave, at the Hôtel d'Orient, a dinner to M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, the French consul, and to M. Gatier, commanding the French naval station, as well as his staff. Mr. Penleaze, the English consul, was not present.

The decree for the annulling of the municipal elections which were in favour of the Christines was duly expected.

The Debats states from Barcelona:—"The getting in of the war contribution is effected with extreme difficulty. The number of inhabitants that have abandoned the town since the commencement of the troubles amount to 60,000 or 80,000. This is the half of the whole population, and comprises the richest families. Trade and manufactures are quite annihilated, and workmen are everywhere without employment. The Regent has ordered a funeral service to be celebrated there in honour of the forty-two officers and soldiers killed in the affair of November 13th, but the expense is to be placed to the account of the garrison. The generals and superior officers are to contribute a day's pay, and the others half a day's."

The following telegraphic despatch appears in the Lloyd's Messager:—"BARCELONA, Dec. 27.—General Seoane has joined to his functions of Captain-General those of the political chief. Senor Guttierez, before his retirement, annulled the municipal elections. The number of inhabitants that left at liberty Senor Gilorl. General Zurbano was at Figueras. Several villages on the French frontier had been disarmed."

LISBON, Dec. 26.—The Government, which, until some more important and especially of the different corps of infantry, to be in direct opposition to the discipline required for the personal comfort of the soldier and convenience of the public, is likewise detrimental to the economy of the state, they are disbanding the different battalions, and putting the army entirely on a new principle. The Opposition looks upon this proceeding as the forerunner of some despotic intention on the part of the crown to declare itself absolute, and accuses the ministry of having usurped a power which was never ceded by the Constitutional Charter; and expresses its wonder that, on the eve of the opening of the Chambers, and when no object of importance demands such a step, they should be creating a military force, which can only be to strengthen the ends they have in view.—It is confidently affirmed that the King of Naples has been endeavouring to persuade Don Miguel to renounce his claim to the crown of Portugal, guaranteeing to him a handsome pension, to be paid by the Portuguese Government; but his persuasions have all proved fruitless, as he is firmly resolved to die sword in hand, rather than abandon the kingdom may contribute to place him once more upon the throne, to which he still considers himself to possess an undivided right.—With some trifling exceptions, the affairs of Rome with this court have, in a manner, been brought to an amicable conclusion; the Internuncio will, therefore, for the present, remain.

PRUSSIAN PRESS.—A letter from Berlin, Dec. 20, in the Post Amt Gazette of Frankfort, says—"The Censure has received orders not to permit the journals to publish Cabinet orders, unless they have been previously inserted in the Prussian State Gazette or the Bulletin des Lois. The only exception is when the Ministers formally authorise the publication."

BERLIOZ'S MISSION.—A letter from Stuttgard announces the arrival of M. Berlioz in that city. He has been sent, the account states, by the French Government to study the institutions and establishments for improving religious and popular vocal music in Germany.

RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA.—"The Prussian Ambassador at St. Petersburgh," says the Augsburgh Gazette, "has received orders to refer to the Russian Cabinet, with respect to the facilities granted to the Prussian commerce by a late ukase, that the Prussian Government is anxious that all the States of the German Customs Union should participate in the same advantages, inasmuch as its intention is not to act for itself, but for the great interest of the Union."

HOLLAND.—THE HAGUE, Dec. 29.—Among the projects of law relative to the budget of ways and means presented to the Second Chamber, was one to make alterations in the duties payable on inherited property, differing according to the degrees of affinity between the heirs and the deceased, from one to ten per cent. The project of law was accompanied by an explanatory memorial.

BELGIUM.—The Consulting Section of the Tribunal of the First Instance at Brussels, has ordered the trial of M. Caumartin, advocate, of Paris, for having, with a forbidden weapon, murdered at Brussels M. Sirey.

The ancient regulation relative to the police of the bay and port of Manilla having been revised, it has been put in force by the Spanish Government the new regulations, which must be observed by merchantmen in the said bay and port since the 15th of July last, as well as the instructions to be followed in anchorage.

The trial of M. Dietz for the wilful and premeditated murder of Gustave Liebon, a young naval officer, commenced on the 27th of December, before the Court of Assize of West Flanders. The trial was continued on the 28th and 29th, the witnesses, both for the prosecution and defence, having been heard, the pleading was to commence next day, when it was expected that the trial would end.

TURKEY.—Letters from Constantinople, of the 7th ult., in the German journals, confirm the statement of the Porte having decided on confiding the affairs of the Lebanon to two governors, one Druze, the other Maronite. They are to be appointed by the Pacha of Seida, to whom they are to be subordinate. It is added, that an official announcement of this decision has been made by the Turkish minister of foreign affairs to the representatives of the five powers.

The official Austrian Observer has the annexed article:—

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 17.—The Minister for Foreign Affairs has officially communicated to the representatives of the Five Great Powers that the Sultan, in order to conform to their wishes, had decided to confide the administration of the Lebanon to two governors, one Druze, the other Maronite. They are to be appointed by the Pacha of Seida, and subordinated to him. Akif Effendi, formerly ambassador at the Court of Vienna, and Emin Effendi, charged with a mission in Servia, have arrived in Constantinople.

The Augsburgh Gazette, of the 25th December, in its Constantinople letters of the 7th, affirms that the Austrian, and not Prussian, note is the statu quo in the affair, and consequently opposed to Russian intervention.

RUSSIAN AND ENGLISH SAILORS AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—The same paper states, from Constantinople, that a quarrel took place on the 7th December, between the sailors of two trading vessels belonging to Russia and England. The affair was submitted to the examination of the ambassadors of the two countries.

The Leipsic Gazette says:—"Well-informed persons generally assert that M. de Bourqueney has declared in favour of the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh, relative to Servia, and consequently has decided the question well on the matter before pronouncing the hostility of Russia. The English Ambassador has only declared himself in evasive terms. The Austrian Ambassador guards a passive attitude, neither giving an opinion or a counsel. The Court of Berlin has despatched a courier to his Government to announce the determination of the Divan not to yield."

THE AFFAIRS OF THE LEVANT.—The dates from Alexandria and Constantinople are to the 17th, Smyrna to the 19th, and Malta the 25th. Our Constantinople letters announce that the Syrian negotiations have been satisfactorily brought to a close by the reluctant acquiescence of the Porte in the suggestions of her best friends.

We have received the Paris papers of Tuesday night, which contain nothing new. The confidence of the public in the maintenance of the existing administration was, we are told, in nowise affected by the menaces of the Opposition. The certainty that the King would open the session of the Chambers in person had produced a good effect.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 17.—The Syrian negotiation has been satisfactorily brought to a close, the Porte having yielded to the advice of its allies. A hatt or edict has since been drawn up, containing the articles agreed to in the suggestions, specifying the proposed arrangements for the administration of Lebanon. The ancient privileges of the mountain sects are therein acknowledged. They will again elect a governor, subject to the control of the Porte, and be amenable only to the intermediary jurisdiction of those chiefs. A new pashalic will be formed, extending along the coast from Tripoli to Acre, and the Pacha of that division, resident at Beyrout or Sidon, will be vested with suzerain authority. The Turkish troops will be withdrawn from Lebanon, and the Arnaut irregular forces recalled from Syria. The treaty of Gulhane will form the acknowledged basis of administration.

Redschid Pacha was positively recalled from Paris by a sudden mandate on Monday afternoon by the Porte, which step completely took by surprise even the best informed in political matters. The intelligence is of the most positive character. Nafi Effendi, Chaoüsh Bashi (Minister of Justice), has been appointed to succeed Redschid at Paris, and until the arrival of the former Adeen Effendi, at present at Paris, will occupy the post of Chargé d'Affaires ad interim. It is not well known whether Redschid's peremptory recal is intended for his exact government with a strong reinforcement of men and provisions. Omar Pasha was to leave for Constantinople in a Turkish steamer. The Brusses were preparing for an attack upon the Turks, and a great number of Christians were to join them. The Austrian steamer Tripoli brought us news that the English steamer Devastation arrived at Beyrout on the 12th inst., bringing despatches from Sir Stratford Canning, to the effect that the Porte had formally agreed to the restoration of one of the family of the old Emir Bechir to the government of Lebanon.

THE WAR IN AFRICA.—A letter from Mostaganem, Dec. 18th, has the following:—"Couriers from the interior have brought us news of the expeditionary columns. General Bugeaud is at Heba, to which point provisions are to be sent to him. The Mascara column is at present on the skirts of the desert, and General Cavaignac is on the Mina. On the 7th he routed a body of the Flittas, and took their chief prisoner. In their flight the Arabs fell in with General Lamoricière's division, which caused them a considerable loss. Despatches from the governor announce that all the tribes from Miliauah to Heba have submitted." Accounts from Constantina of the 24th inst. announce the arrival there of Laurence, member of the Chamber of Deputies, and M. Giraudeau, counsellor at the Cour Royale of Algiers. They are both entrusted with special missions, the first to inspect the different branches of the public administration of Algeria, and the other to inquire into the best system of civil administration for that province.

WEST INDIES.—The Royal Mail Company's ship the Thames, with the mails from the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico, due at Falmouth on the 3rd, arrived there at ten P.M. on Sunday, the 1st instant. On freight, 577,000 dollars, and 303 serons of cochineal. Since the commencement of the contract, the extended plan of service, introduced on the 1st of October, the following have been the dates of the arrivals of the respective packets, and the periods at which they were due:—

Clyde	Were due 19th Nov.	..... Arrived	18th Nov.
Solway	3rd Dec.	.....	3rd Dec.
Tweed	20th Dec.	.....	20th Dec.
Thames	3rd Jan.	.....	1st Jan.

From which it will be seen that the increased punctuality in the communication between this country and the West Indies, which was anticipated from the new service, has been duly realised. The Thames is said to bring home mails from each of the stations, but, be it as it may, there were no passengers in the last steamer, nor are there any by this arrival from Mexico. The Clyde is to leave to Cape Haytien, to Cuba, and Jamaica the Tay to Jamaica, Havannah, Nassau, and Bermuda; the Acteon on the Barbadoes and Trinidad stations; the Teviot brought up the Mexican and Havannah mails to Bermuda, and would return to St. Thomas's; the Trent to the islands towards and up to Demerara, and would be the next to come to England. Her Majesty's ship Scylla conveyed up to St. Thomas's, from Barbadoes, the mails and passengers for Ireland and Barbadoes by the last-mentioned steamer; the Scylla left for Jamaica and Honduras on the 24th November; the troop-ship Crocodile arrived at English Harbour, Antigua, on the 8th December, with General Maisters and staff, on inspection. On the 10th, the Volage and Griffon sailed from St. Thomas's; the Illustrious, Sir Charles Adam, remained at Bermuda; also the Cygnet, Hornet, and Rover; the latter would sail in a day or two for England. The prize lately taken off Rio Janeiro by the Fantome, had arrived safely at Demerara, and the negroes were immediately distributed among the planters in Berbice and Essequibo. The Spartan would sail, on the 5th December, from Jamaica for Havannah. The Numa transport was hove down at Bermuda on the 16th December, having been found leaky. The commodore, at Jamaica, had hoisted his broad pendant on board the Imaum; the Magnificent was paid off. The Charles Eyes of Liverpool, Samuel Barr, master, was totally wrecked on the reefs off the Grand Turk, on the 17th of November; crew saved, but lost everything. The health of both Lord and Lady Elgin had been happily restored; the countess was expected at Spanish Town, to remain until the Christmas holidays. The tariff committee continued its sittings.

KINGSTON, Dec. 3.—The period which has elapsed since the last mail for Great Britain was despatched has not been marked by any peculiar circumstance. The colony remains quiet, and the best feeling exists between the three branches of the legislature, and we believe we may safely add, all classes of its inhabitants. The seasons generally have been favourable, but the shower in the towns has been unequalled during the first period of the year. In some localities it has been rather dry, and in Trelawny and St. James's we learn the canes are likely to suffer, unless some rain shortly falls. From the former parish a correspondent writes, "Our weather has been dry to very drought, and the canes are very backward." Some very fine showers have recently fallen in St. Catherine's and St. Andrew's.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The royal yacht now building at Pembroke, for her Majesty and Prince Albert, has been ordered to be entered in the "Navy List" under the title of "The Victoria and Albert Yacht." She will cost, we have heard, little short of £100,000.

We find the navy at the present moment consists of 234 vessels of all sorts, mounting on the whole 3,390 guns, which is about 670 guns less than last new year's day, and consequently we have about 7000 seamen fewer in employ. It appears we have 18 sea-going line-of-battle ships, being 7 less than last year; 32 frigates, being 3 less than last year; 39 sloops, 1 less; 36 smaller vessels, 19 less than last year; 65 steamers, 4 additional; 21 surveying vessels; 10 troop ships; and 10 receiving ships. Our force at home comprises 61 vessels, carrying 1,085 guns, Mediterranean, 1035; Brazils, 403; East Indies, 886; North America and West Indies, 476; Cape and Coast of Africa, 309; surveying, 93; troop ships, 56.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have ordered certain alterations to be made in the dress of the divisional staff officers of the Royal Marines. Henceforth the adjutants are to wear the uniforms of their rank, with the accoutrements worn by sliggs from the aide-de-camp belt, and when in the field the steel scabbard. Paymasters, quarter-masters, surgeons, and assistant-surgeons, are to wear the uniform and epaulettes of their respective ranks, and the cocked hats and black waist-belts, with sings, under the coatee. The hat of the paymaster and quarter-master is to be decorated with the regulation laced loop and bullion tassels, the former without a feather; the wearer of the surgeon and assistant-surgeon is to be plain, with a black button and loop, and also without the feather. The sash is to be discontinued.

The Urgent steam-vessel, Master Commander J. Emeran, arrived at Woolwich on the 27th from Liverpool on Monday, to be paid, and has since been ordered to Chatham for that purpose. The Infernal steam-vessel, building at Woolwich, is ordered to be completed by the 31st of March next. The Wrangler steam-vessel, Captain John Washington, has been ordered to be paid off, and the Blazer commissioned in her stead as a surveying vessel. The Tartarus steam-vessel has been ordered to be commissioned immediately, and the following officers have been appointed to her:—Frederick Bullock, late of the Fearless, captain; Alfred Miles, lieutenant; and Edward Burstall, mate. The Fearless steam-vessel will be commissioned immediately at Woolwich, by Captain Frederick Commander, and the following officers have been appointed to her:—Lieutenants W. V. Read and J. Wood (d.); Mr. J. S. Taylor, master; Mr. B. Scott, clerk in charge; and Mr. Kerr, surgeon and assistant-surgeon to be joined. The following have also been taken place:—Lieut. J. B. Emery to the Comet steam-vessel, vice Harding to Columbia, vice Kortright; Lieut. H. L. Cox, vice Edwards, to the Styx steam-vessel, vice Spero; assistant-surgeon Cowling, to the Columbia; and sub-lieut. Lieut. J. Sayes to the African steam-vessel, and to command her, vice Mr. Mackey, master.

The Favorite, 44, Captain John Foote, was at Ascension on the 14th of October. A further destruction of barracoons had taken place on the coast of Africa, in which operation three men of her Majesty's ship Madagascar and three of the Favorite were wounded by the natives. The following is an extract from a private letter from the Madagascar, dated August 29, 1842:—"Captain Foote has lately been putting in force some very strong measures for the destruction of slavery. On the 22nd of May a party of mariners landed at Kabenda at 5 A.M., and took possession of three barrack-rooms, and sent on board 956 slaves, destroyed all stores, and burned the whole of the premises to the ground. On the 31st of May landed again at Ambriz, and took 260 slaves, destroying two barrack-rooms and all stores; and on the 5th of June sent three boats up the river Congo, where they destroyed two barrack-rooms and all stores. This has been a great loss to the Spaniards and Portuguese at St. Paulo de Loando. The slaves have been sent to St. Helena, where we shall soon follow, after having been to a few more slave establishments."

DEATH OF AN OFFICER OF THE 2ND LIFE GUARDS.—A fine young officer, Mr. H. Watkin de Winton, expired at half-past eight o'clock on Saturday morning last, at his quarters in the Cavalry Barracks, Windsor, in the presence of several members of his family, and the medical staff; Dr. Fergusson was also in attendance. The death of this promising young man was occasioned by uncontrollable hæmorrhage, brought on, it is supposed, by the strenuous exertions of horsemanship he was in the habit of going through in the exercise of his profession, to which he was devotedly attached. Up to the last moment he determinedly refused to submit to his resignation, consequently, the value of his commission, about £3000, according to his wish, will fall to the regiment, by which he was so universally beloved and respected. He will be buried at Windsor with military honours.

Lieutenant L. P. Bouverie, of the 2nd West India Regiment, has been appointed extra Aide-de-Camp upon the personal Staff of Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Frederick Bouverie, K.C.B., commanding the Forces at Malta.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL PERCY DRUMMOND, C.B., DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE ROYAL ARTILLERY.—This gallant officer died at about twenty minutes past four o'clock, P.M., on Sunday, January 1, at his residence, in the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich. Major-General Drummond entered the service as Second Lieutenant, on the 1st of January, 1794, and consequently had been forty-nine years an officer of the corps. Major-General Drummond was at the siege of Copenhagen in 1794-5, and at the capture of the island of Walcheren and siege of Flushing in 1809; was also present with his company in Portugal at the same time as Sir John Moore, until the embarkation of the troops at Corunna; and was engaged in the campaign of 1815, including the battle of Waterloo. Major-General Drummond's father, Duncan Drummond, was a commanding officer of the Royal Artillery, and Director-General of the Field Train Department, and when he died, was buried in the churchyard of Plumstead, about a mile to the east of Woolwich. It is, therefore, probable the remains of the late Major-General Drummond will be interred in the same churchyard, with military honours.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The Oriental and Peninsular Company's steam-ship, the Oriental, sailed from Southampton on Sunday morning, with sixty-five first-class passengers. The Montrose, one of the regular Peninsula packets, sailed the same morning. She sailed from Gibraltar on the 22nd of December, Cadiz 23rd, Lisbon 26th, Oporto 27th, and Vigo 28th. The Montrose brings home seventy passengers. The Ajax, which sailed on Monday, has carried off 400 bottles of quicksilver, and thirty-seven passengers. The next West India mail due is the Thames.

MIRAMICHI, Jan. 1.—The Berthea, from Hamburgh to Newfoundland, has been towed in here with loss of bowsprit, masts, sails, &c., and decks swept, having been struck by a sea in long. 31 W. Sailed the Glasgow, for New Orleans.

CORK, Dec. 28.—Arrived the Robert Watt, Johnson, from Virginia, with loss of boats, bulwarks, &c.; Olinda, Edmondson, from St. John's N. B.

DEAL, Dec. 31.—Arrived the Mary Scrafton, from Bengal; the Bache, hence to Halifax, has put back from long. 40, dismasted, out 45 days.

BRIDLINGTON, Jan. 1.—The Clio, from Sunderland, is aground outside the harbour, and nearly full of water.

JAN. 2.—It has blown a gale from the North since Saturday night, and about 30 sail of colliers are in the Bay.

YARMOUTH, Jan. 3.—The Rev. of Newcastle, was fallen in with on the 28th ult., dismasted, and taken in tow by a smack, but subsequently abandoned crew saved. A brig, name unknown, is on the beach repairing, having struck on Sherringham Shoal. The Iantho, from Hartlepool to London, has been beached, and is nearly full of water, having struck on the Race sand.

SLIGO, Dec. 31.—A boat marked "Tom Moore," some board marked "Marquis of Normanby," and "Tom Moore," have come ashore near Ours. Some wreck and part of a boat, marked "Thomas Richardson" outside, and "John Swain" inside, have come ashore near Tilen West.

FAYAL, Dec. 27.—The Lafayette (American brigantine) was blown off these Roads the 25th ult., and has not returned. The Elnor schooner, from Prince Edward's island to Newfoundland, put in here the 16th inst., and has discharged to repair. The Angelo, from St. Petersburgh to Boston, put in here the 25th inst., with loss of rudder.

DEMERARA, Dec. 2.—The British Isles, Muirhead, hence for London, put back yesterday, leaky, and it is expected must discharge.

GRENADA, Dec. 3.—The Star, of St. Kitt's, has lost bowsprit, &c., having been in contact with the Acmon steamer, off Grand Mal and Molenier.

VERA CRUZ, Nov. 26.—The Charles Eyes, Barry, entering this port by the North Channel, the 17th inst., was caught in a sudden gale and went on the Calleja Reef, and became a wreck.

PERNAMBUCO, Dec. 31.—The Gute Hoffnung, from Leghorn to Hamburgh, which went ashore in Carmarthen Bay, the 18th inst, has become a wreck—crew saved.

ABERDEATH, Dec. 30.—The Agnes, from Shields, in entering yesterday, touched on the bar and sank, but has been raised, and got into the harbour.

A brig with 380 slaves on board has been captured and taken to Demerara by her Majesty's ship Fantome.

FALMOUTH, Dec. 30.—Arrived the Johannes, Wolf, from Coquimbo, left the 8th of August, bound to Swansea, lost bulwarks, &c.; Xaver, Hamburg, from New Orns.

WHITBY, Dec. 27.—The Hostelina, of Guernsey, has put in here with loss of bowsprit, cutwater, &c., and foremast sprung, having been in contact with the brig Pearl yesterday afternoon.

The Felix, from Finland to Gibraltar, has been towed into Ramsgate, with loss of windlass.

BRIDPORT-WATER, Dec. 29.—The Alice Haviland was run into off the Holines, on the 27th inst., and cut down to the water's edge, by a schooner, name unknown. The Wellington, from St. Andrew's to this port, has put into Bideford with decks swept.

GREENOCK, Dec. 29.—The Calypso, from Demerara, in a heavy gale on the 18th inst., lat. 50 N, was struck by a heavy sea, which washed three of the crew overboard, carried away bulwarks, stanchions, and swept decks.

RENDSBERG, Dec. 25.—The Vrouw Elida, from Konigsberg to Antwerp, sprung a leak, and foundered, W.N.W. of Fehmern: crew saved.

ELSINORE, Dec. 24.—The Louise and Julie, Peters, from Wolgast, put in here to-day, leaky, and will probably have to discharge.

GUAYAQUIL, Sept. 27.—The Adela, from Cadiz, got ashore at the mouth of the river, and was assisted off, with considerable damage: cargo landing, in a damaged state.

THE SHIP SCOTLAND.—The ship Scotland, a well-known transient vessel, which has sailed between Liverpool and New York for some years, experienced a dreadful disaster on the 21st ult., about nine o'clock in the evening, in lat. 58, long. 22. In a heavy gale she was struck by a sea, which carried overboard her commander (Captain Robinson), the second mate (Mr. A. Palmer), the steward, J. Simpson (a boy), and two seamen. It swept the decks of cabin and round-house, bulwarks, spars, studding sails, and railings; split the covering board, stove in the fore and after hatches, and caboose and caboose-house, partly filled the ship with water, and shifted the cargo. The Scotland, which sailed from Liverpool on the 8th ult., immediately put back, and reached that port on Thursday week in this dilapidated state. Her escape was providential, for the whole of the chests, books, and nautical instruments were likewise carried away. The captain's chronometer was found about twenty-four hours after the accident, totally unfit for use. Fortunately, it was remembered that an old compass had been stowed away in a chest between decks, which, being regulated, was rendered available. She was out altogether twenty days. Poor Captain Robinson, who was well known in the trade, left a wife and, we believe, three children (sons) to deplore his loss. He was a very amiable man, of a religious turn of mind, and was reading his Bible when the disaster occurred. The steward, who was severely injured by the calamity, died on his way to the hospital).

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRAMFORD.—Last Sunday, after divine service, the stairs of the gallery of Bramford Church were discovered to be on fire. Immediate alarm was given, and by prompt and well-directed efforts the flames were speedily subdued. Very little damage, beyond injury to the stairs, has been sustained.

RAMSGATE.—EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—On Wednesday, at the Greenwich Police-court, a smart young woman was charged before Mr. Jeremy on suspicion of having robbed her mistress, a lady residing at Ramsgate, of a large quantity of valuable wearing apparel and gold rings, brooches, necklaces, &c. &c. Sergeant Parry, R. 8, deposed that he received a letter from the superintendant of police at Ramsgate, stating that a robbery had been committed, but not giving the particulars. The thief was thought to have gone to Woolwich. He had made inquiries and found that the prisoner, who answered the description, had taken apartments at the Crown and Anchor Tavern. He searched her and found a box of clothes and valuables he produced, and which also answered the description he had received. The prisoner was perfectly self-posed, and declined giving any account of herself or property, and was sent down to Ramsgate in custody of Parry.

ROCHESTER.—On Sunday evening last, the quiet city of Rochester was thrown into a great degree of excitement, owing to several soldiers belonging to the Provisional battalion of Chatham garrison, and a proportionate number of civilians, having come into hostile collision in the streets. Upwards of 200 people collected round the public-house called the Lord Nelson, at which house the disturbance broke out. Information having been forwarded to the police, assistance was soon at hand; and on entering the public-house upwards of fifteen persons were found seriously wounded; some of the soldiers' heads were covered with blood from the blows of pokers, &c. One of the civilians, named Dutnell, it was stated, was so severely wounded, that his life is in danger, and he was carried to a house in Crow-lane and put to bed. The superintendent of police, Mr. Taff, having obtained the assistance of several persons, succeeded in securing ten of the soldiers and one civilian. The whole of the soldiers were allowed to leave the station under the charge of a sergeant and guard, with the understanding that they were to be produced when called upon by the magistrates. On Monday morning, at eleven o'clock, the Mayor, Edmund Buck, Esq., assisted by two magistrates, Mr. John Baden and Captain G. G. Barton, held a special Court for the purpose of investigating the above disgraceful outrage. The Court was most inconveniently crowded. Private Charles Briggs of the 4th Regiment, was charged with others in aiding and abetting the above; when the evidence of several persons, who were in the tap-room drinking when the row commenced, was taken down in writing by the Justices' clerk; which evidence went to prove that the soldiers rushed into the tap-room, and commenced an indiscriminate attack on them, and they in return attacked the soldiers, cutting into them with any thing they got them from the place. Mr. John Tuff, superintendent of police, said from information he received he went to the Lord Nelson, and there found between 200 and 300 people. In the house were several soldiers and civilians, many of them severely wounded. The soldiers had no weapons of any sort with them. A civilian of the name of Dutnell was in the parlour, where the soldiers were, covered with blood, having been dangerously wounded in the head. The Magistrates said that as one man's life was despaired of, they should adjourn the inquiry, and they instructed their clerk to write immediately to Sir Thomas Willshire, the Commandant of Chatham garrison, respecting the disgraceful outrage.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—GREAT FAILURE.—We regret to have to mention the suspension of payment of Mr. T. Whitmarsh, of the Royal Victoria and Sussex Hotels, at Tunbridge Wells, whose creditors were summoned at a very short notice to attend a meeting at his house on Thursday week morning at ten o'clock, when a statement of his affairs was laid before them, pressing measures having already been taken by some London creditors against him. Large and unfortunate speculations in railroad and steam companies' shares are the assigned causes of all this mischief.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—During the week information was received at the various police offices in London, that a man named Henry Lineham, of Leeds, in Yorkshire, attorney's clerk, had absconded from his employers with a considerable sum of money in gold in his possession, besides nine notes of the Bank of England for £20 each, dated Leeds, July 22, 1841, and numbered from 8,458 to 8,466, both inclusive. Lineham is described as being about thirty years of age, of middle stature, stiffly built, with light brown hair, and sallow complexion. He was last heard of at Birmingham. A reward of £30 is offered for his apprehension, and a further reward of £20 on his conviction by Messrs. Ward and sons, solicitors, Leeds.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

4, Paternoster-row, London, Dec. 27, 1842.

Sir,—Will you have the goodness to state that John Palmer, the party accused at Worship-street, on the 21st inst., is in no way connected with Raphael's Prophetic Messenger, Almanack, and Ephemeris, for 1843 (now in the 19th year), published by me. The gentlemen who conduct that Annual are, happily for me, men of honour and honesty, above such gross conduct.—I am, sir, yours obediently,

WILLIAM CHARLTON WRIGHT, Publisher.

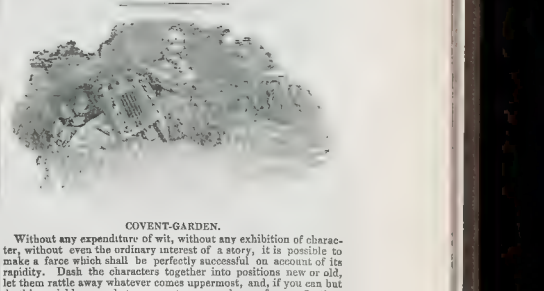
BLASPHEMOUS AND INDECENT PUBLICATIONS.—In consequence of many complaints having been made to the commissioners of police relative to the publication of scraps in which blasphemous and indecent prints are sold with impunity, they have resolved by vigorous measures to suppress all such places. As a preliminary step several police officers out of uniform have been sent through the metropolis, with orders to take notice of those shops where were exposed publications tending in any way to corrupt the public morals, or of an indecent character. The officers have also been directed to visit the various Socialist institutions, to examine the books in the coffee-rooms and libraries, that they may be able to report upon the nature of the instruction the keepers of them give.

LORD HUNTINGTOWER'S INSOLVENCY.—The court of bankruptcy has been occupied for the last three sittings on this case in investigating the execution of a mortgage by the bankrupt, with Col. Copland and Mrs. Edmonds, to Mr. Dobson, who is described as a merchant in Leadenhall-street. The evidence elicited in respect of this transaction and other matters connected with his lordship's career before and after he came of age, in his bill transactions with Colonel Copland, was of such an extraordinary character, that at the request of the court and the solicitor to the assignees (Mr. Nias) the publication of the evidence was withheld till the whole examination was concluded. The noble insolvent and Col. Copland were examined at great length, after which the case was further adjourned.

The Dublin Pilot contains a letter from Derrynane, and a few more Chapters of the Repeal Catechism. In the epistle Mr. O'Connell declares that he has done with the Whigs. "The people," he says, "would be nothing the better for the Whigs coming into office again to-morrow, and therefore the Repealers will in future treat with equal indifference the Whig and Tory clamours, both in the municipal and parliamentary elections."

The following names may be added to our Obituary of high life during the year 1842. Peers: Earl of Shannon; Earl of Leicester. Scotch Peer: Lord Gillies. Lord James Townshend. Baronets: Sir J. D. Astley; Sir J. J. Bureton; Rev. Sir A. Elton; Sir J. Fowlis; Sir R. Gore; Sir S. Hannay; Sir G. A. W. Leith; Sir H. W. Martin; Sir J. C. Paul; Sir G. Shiffner. Knights: Sir A. Anderson; Sir W. Anseley; Sir T. Sevestre.

MELOPHONIC SOCIETY.—On Wednesday evening the oratorio of "The Creation" was performed at the Music-hall, Store-street, Bedford-square. The principal singers were Miss A. Williams, Miss Ward, Miss Milner, and Messrs. Leffler and Redfearn. Miss Williams was highly successful in "With verdure clad," as was also Miss Ward in "The marvellous work." Mr. Leffler sang with more than usual steadiness, both of voice and manner; and Mr. Redfearn, in the beautiful aria "In native worth" (which was most deservedly encored), displayed powers of a pure tenor voice, not often heard, together with a chaste and quiet style which finely accorded with the grand yet placid dignity of the masterly composition. We recommend him to cultivate concert-singing in preference to that of the stage, for which latter he is, perhaps, a little too sombre. Mr. Holderness, as conductor, and Mr. W. Blagrove, as leader, discharged their offices with perfect judgment and taste. There was a numerous and highly respectable auditory.



COVENT-GARDEN.

Without any expenditure of wit, without any exhibition of character, without even the ordinary interest of a story, it is possible to make a farce which shall be perfectly successful on account of its rapidity. Dash the characters together into positions new or old, let them rattle away whatever comes uppermost, and, if you can but do this quickly enough to prevent your audience from reflecting, your farce is safe. The risk is, that you may deceive yourself as to the uninterrupted course of your merriment, that you may mistake that for a link in the chain of fun which is only a break; for if there be one single gap, if once reflection is allowed to ooze in and laughter be allowed two minutes' pause, down will topple the piece, the author of which relies on its bustle alone.

The farce called "The Highwayman," produced on Wednesday night, was one that owed its success purely to the constant movement in which the stage was kept. There was always something going on—what it was the audience did not care—but still there was a something. Why should we tell the story of a piece the charm of which had nothing to do with story; or describe the characters where mere farce conventionalities are hurried on and hurried off for the sake of keeping up a stir? A boisterous old squire, acted by Bartley, sets out on a quest after an eloped ward, pursues the wrong couple, is stopped on the road by his own nephew in the dress of a postillion, who wants him out of the way while he pursues a mistress of his own, and finally is taken for a highway man and is obliged to remain burdened with that character until he makes his acquaintance acknowledge him, by consenting to two marriages much against his will. There is a loud and bustling under his nephew; there is Harley, his nephew, bustling and eccentric, and always inventing new stratagems; there is J. Viming as a foppish officer, who bets hogsheads of claret that he can carry off heiresses; there is a country mayor, acted by Meadows, who is robbed on the highway; and there is the dirty washbond, played by Payne, who robs him. These are the author's puppets, which he amuses the audience by knocking together in all sorts of ways. If some situations do not command much mirth, he does not feel himself at a loss; an odd expression, a strange gesticulation, a new pun, a non-fitting hat forced upon an unwilling head, a peculiarly shabby coat—all these are the body of ammunition which he has in reserve, and which he can fire off when other means fail him. Certainly we must do him the credit to say, that, if he has produced a piece of no great pretensions, he has shown great tact in "keeping the ball up," he has constantly changed his scenes, and yet always introduced something amusing; and, if he has given no great scope for the personating powers of his actors, he has allowed them an opportunity of exhibiting their oddities. All he meant was the source a constant laugh, and he has succeeded.

Miss Rainforth made her first appearance in the opera of "Semiramide" on Tuesday night, and charmingly as she sung much of the music, and correctly as she acted the character, it will be no disparagement to her powers to say that her attempt was a comparative failure. As Miss Rainforth is one of our greatest favourites upon the English stage, on the score both of her talents and of the ladylike absence of all assumption with which she exercises them, such an admission gives us no ordinary pain. That which Miss Rainforth needs is physical capability for the part: she requires force and power to enable her to fill it out. The part of Semiramide is one which demands no ordinary qualifications from the actress who would undertake it with success; and while we cannot concede Miss Kemble high merit in her impersonation of the Assyrian Queen, we cannot but own that she was more qualified by nature for its arduous difficulties than her successor is. The faults which blotted the Semiramide of the former lady were the results of gross want of taste in the application of her powers—those which render themselves apparent in Miss Rainforth spring from the unavoidable necessity of her physical poverty. She needs size, muscular strength, and power of voice to give a full portraiture of the haughty princess, stained with unacknowledged crime, and tutored in a school which owned no laws but the unregulated passions of an ungovernable soul. Hence the denunciatual beauties which she produced and the dilly fine acting which she displayed gave rather the effect of a miniature sketch from Rossini's Semiramide than a life-like and substantial picture of the full size of humanity. Here our strictures will end, and, in justice to the actress, we shall only have praise to add. The comparative failure in the part was by no means that which we expected. Over its musical difficulties, Miss Rainforth achieved a thorough triumph. The splendid duet with Assur, at the commencement of the second act, was nobly conceived, and was rewarded with the most rapturous applause. The impassioned utterance, fiery gesture, and mere vocal mechanism, were alike admirable; but largeness of manner was wanting, and a certain amount of dignity which the actress was enabled to give, made an insufficient amend for the utter absence of that broad grandeur which is required by the character. The "Giorno d' orrore" was charmingly sung, and was, certainly, the gem of the evening. Every effect that Mrs. Shaw sings she renders at all more correct than she sells the greatest living English songstress, and the finest contralto known. The rich tones of her voice seem newer and fresher every time we hear them, and the more we listen to that voice the more are we convinced of the singular and artistic power with which she uses it.

Giubilei acquitted himself with credit.

The "Beggar's Opera" is in preparation at this house, for the purpose of presenting Mrs. Alfred Shaw in the character of Macheath. We cannot say we much incline to the custom of reversing the sexes in the representatives of the dramatis personæ of any piece, but we have a positive dislike to see the part of Macheath filled by a lady. However, in the person of Mrs. Shaw, it will afford, no doubt, a rich treat to the lovers of true singing; for some of the fine old melodies will be in the treatment of one who thoroughly feels their beauty, and knows so well how to give expression to their sentiment. The next musical novelty at this theatre will be an adaptation of Rossini's "Donna del Lago," in which Mrs. S. will sustain the part of Malcolm. Those who recollect the great Pisaroni will have an opportunity of making an interesting comparison between the two finished contralti of modern times.

INTERIOR OF THE MODEL PRISON.

THE PENTONVILLE PRISON.

About midway, to the right of the Chalk-road, which leads from the foot of Pentonville-hill to Holloway, for two years and a half past, has been in progress the vast assemblage of buildings of which the engraving on our first page presents but a partial view. Its general appearance is that of a prison-fortress, upon an elevated site, within lofty "boundary walls," enclosing, in the form of an irregular pentagon, an area of 6¾ acres; besides a lower outer, or curtain, wall, with massive posterns at the two points of entrance in the principal front, and surrounding a terraced-walk on the other sides of the entire plan. Such is the Pentonville Prison, which, from its presenting several new principles of construction, proposed to be extended to the several county gaols in the kingdom, has been termed "The Model Prison, on the Separate System," or the perpetual separation of the prisoners from each other. The plan appears to have been submitted by the Inspectors of Prisons to Lord John Russell, when Secretary of State for the Home Department, and who, in Parliament, on May 5, 1840, stated it to be the opinion of the Inspectors and the Government, that "the separate system would be likely to prove highly beneficial, both to the prisoners and the public." The first stone of this new prison was laid by the Marquis of Normanby, in the April of the above year; and its erection has cost the large sum of £85,000. It presents but few attempts at architectural embellishment; the pilasters and columns of the entrance gateway and building are relieved with rusticated work, and a line of corbels beneath the attics; and from the centre of the building rises a clock-tower, of Italian design, with an exterior prospect gallery.

In front of the prison is a lofty gateway, with three arched openings, the semi-circular heads of which are filled with "portcullis" work, and on each side of this structure is a dwelling-house of neat design, one being the residence of the governor, and the other that of the chaplain of the prison, and both outside the boundary wall.

The door of the entrance building opens into an enclosed court-yard, in which are two gates, through which provisions, &c., can be taken to the kitchens and offices, without interfering with the buildings more immediately devoted to officers and prisoners.

The entrance to the prison is by a flight of steps and through a low doorway, placed between two massive columns, through the broad passage a, on each side of which are the officers' rooms; and thence to the inspection or central hall, l, on reaching which the visitor, for the first time, becomes aware of the peculiar principle of construction of the prison. This hall is open from the floor to the roof, and will be the principal station of the officers: it is shown in the above engraving. Around it run two galleries, to which the ascent from the floor is by a geometrical staircase; and projecting from the centre of the lower gallery is a glazed apartment or lantern, in which will be seated the deputy-governor, who, from this central point, will command the entire range of the several corridors, and the officers on duty there. Opposite the door of this inspection lantern is a large door, communicating with a gallery leading to the chapel on the first floor of the entrance building. Returning to the hall, opposite the pier to the left, is shown the machinery by which the provisions are raised in trays through a trap-door from the basement, where are the kitchen and apparatus for cooking, and for warming and ventilating the entrance building.

The Prison Wings or Cell Buildings radiate from this hall as from a common centre, and, in plan, present two-thirds of a star of six points; two wings stretching on the right and left of this apartment, in a direct line with each other; and the remaining two wings diverging in a fan-like form. An open passage or corridor runs longitudinally through the centre of each wing, into which open the prison-rooms or cells, ranged in three stories: the lower range opening on the floor of the corridor, and the upper ranges upon narrow galleries attached to the wall, which are continued round the central hall, as already explained. At the further extremity of each wing a flight of steps, covered by a trap-door, leads to the punishment cells, which are placed in the basement. In the centre of each wing a circular iron staircase communicates with the galleries and is continued into the store-rooms below; and the provisions being drawn up from the basement of the hall, are conveyed along the corridors in cast-iron waggons upon wheels, running upon the gallery front as upon a railway. The wings are lit by lofty windows at the ends and sides and from the roof. At night a powerful Bude light will illumine the central hall from its ceiling, and gas-jets will branch from the gallery fronts. The entire length of the wings, right and left, and that of the intervening hall, is 500 feet; and the number of cells upon each floor is indicated in the ground plan; the whole calculated for 520 prisoners. The wings are lettered A, B, C, D, and the ranges of cells numbered in each wing, 1, 2, 3. One wing has been set apart for female prisoners, and effectually separated from the rest of the prison, the access to it being from a side door in the entrance building, which will be in charge of the matron.

INTERIOR OF CELL.

The Cells are each 13 feet long, by 7½ feet broad, and are all of them of one uniform height of 9 feet. The piers or partitions between them are 18 inches thick, and are worked with close joints, so as to preclude as much as possible the transmission of sound. The ceiling is arched, and the light is admitted by a window (a fixture), filled with strong glass, of similar form, in the back wall, and crossed by a wrought-iron bar, in the direction of its length, so as to divide it into two portions, of about 5 inches each. The engraving shows the interior of a cell; on the left is a stone water-closet pan, with a cast-iron top, acting on a hinge let into the wall. Next is a metal basin, supplied with water, to prevent the waste of which, the quantity is limited to one cubic foot, or about 6 gallons; the service-pipe from the water-trough being bent in the form of a trap, to prevent the transmission of sound. Opposite these conveniences is a strong three-legged stool, and a small table, with a shaded gas burner above it. Across the cell is slung from iron staples in the wall the prisoner's hammock, with mattress and blankets, which are folded up and placed upon a shelf to the left of the door in the day time. Here also is a hand-spring communicating with a bell, which when pulled causes a small iron tablet, inscribed with the number of the cell in the engraving, to project from the wall, so that the officer on duty in the gallery may be apprised of the precise cell where he is required. Each cell is warmed by air, through perforated iron plates in the floor, supplied through flues, communicating with immense stoves in the basement of the wing. The foul air is carried off, and a circulation of atmosphere maintained by means of perforated iron plates above the door of the cell, which communicate with an immense shaft placed about the centre of the roof of each wing. The means of supplying fresh air and the withdrawal of foul air, so as to present no opportunity of communication between prisoners in adjoining cells, are the joint invention of the Inspectors of Prisons and Messrs. Haden, of Trowbridge, and are remarkable for ingenuity and simplicity.

The Door of the Cell is shown in the above engraving. The frame is of oak. The door is two inches thick, of deal, framed flush on both sides; the edges covered with felt, to prevent noise and the transmission of sound; and there is a strong iron plating on the side next the cell, riveted through; the fastening is a spring lock and latch. In the upper panel is a small eyelethole filled with glass and wire-gauze, through which the prison officer may look from the outside, unseen by the prisoner in the cell; this hole having a cast iron escutcheon. In the panel beneath is a square trap-door, let down by a spring, through which meals, &c., may be conveyed to the prisoner.

The general plan of the prison, however, will be best understood by the annexed ground-plan.

The last engraving shows a portion of the interior of the Chapel, fitted up with separate stalls or sittings, the side doors of which radiate upon the pulpit at the other end of the chapel, so that each prisoner can see and be seen by the chaplain. The back of each row of seats is of such a height as to intercept the communication between the rows when the prisoners are standing up, and yet are not so high as to conceal them when sitting down. A double passage is made down the centre of the chapel, communicating with the central hall; and a staircase leads up from the gallery to a door, which is on a convenient level for entering the upper row of seats, from whence a succession of steps arranged in pairs communicate downwards with each row in front; and, as the officers will be seated in galleries, and on the floor of the opposite end of the chapel, they will have the entire surveillance of the prisoners. The organ is by Gray: the altar and pulpit fittings are very neat, in oak and crimson.

The Exercising Yards remain to be described. These, as shown by the plan, are upon the radiating principle, the advantage of which is, that an officer stationed in the centre may watch the prisoners, only one of each of whom will be admitted at a time into the spaces formed by the division walls, or lines in the plan. Around the central part is a dark passage, which renders it impossible that the prisoner can be aware the officer is watching him. The yards have open railings at both extremities; and they are so arranged that no two prisoners can see each other; the division-walls are roofed, to afford shelter when necessary. The exercising yards in front of the prison are constructed upon the same principle as those between the wings, except that they are of oblong form, with semicircular ends, instead of being entirely circular.

Such are the principal departments of the prison. Beneath each wing are 12 other darkened cells or dungeons for refractory prisoners. As yet, no infirmary has been provided: and, in case of illness, the prisoners must be medically treated in their respective cells.

The reader may now form some idea of the completeness with which the system of separation will be carried out in this new prison. The convicts will be supplied with such work during their confinement as can be carried on without noise, and each will work in his cell, whence he will only be led out for exercise or prayer: and, on those occasions, it is stated that each prisoner will be required to wear over his face a mask, or hood, to be removed when he reaches the space between the walls of the exercising yard, or the stalls of the chapel, and to be worn again in returning to his cell; by which means the prisoners will be prevented from ever seeing each other; and, as silence will be in all cases maintained, they will be as effectually separated as though they were miles apart. Books, at the discretion of the chaplain, will be supplied to each cell, and the prisoners will be required to attend divine service daily. Instruction in various trades, among which may be mentioned shoe-making and weaving, will be given daily by schoolmasters, of whom one will be appointed for every 100 prisoners. Each prisoner will be visited hourly during the day by a keeper; he will also be visited daily by the deputy-governor and chief officer; also specially by the medical officer and schoolmaster twice every week. The principal turnkey must report to the governor any misconduct of the inferior officers complained of by the prisoners, who will be permitted to see the visiting commissioners, the governor, chaplain, or medical officer, upon application through the principal turnkey; and the prisoners will be allowed to communicate with their friends in writing four times a year. They will be required to wear a dark mixture coloured dress, with the letters P. P. (Pentonville Prison) worked in red on the collar. The "warders," who will inspect the turnkeys in each wing, will wear a blue uniform and regulation cap, as shown in the large engraving. It is understood that convicts sentenced at the Epiphany sessions will be the first received at the new prison. The dietary has been fixed, but has not transpired beyond the prison walls.

Opening of the Hall of Commerce.—This beautiful building, of which we gave two sketches in this paper some weeks back, was on Monday last thrown open to the public, when upwards of 800 gentlemen connected with the trade and City of London partook of an elegant déjeûné provided by the proprietor for the occasion. The Lord Mayor, who presided, was accompanied by Sir J. Pirie, Bart., Mr. D. W. Harvey, Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Deputy Corney, Mr. Deputy Green, the City Solicitor, Mr. Sheriff Hooper, Mr. Masterman, M.P., Mr. Alderman Fairbrother, Mr. Under-Sheriff Pilcher, Mr. Tite, Mr. Carver, &c., Lord John Russell arrived at about half-past twelve. Upon the health of the "City members" being given, Lord J. Russell said as Mr. Masterman had been obliged to leave the Hall in consequence of urgent business, the duty had devolved upon him of returning thanks for the representatives of the City, for the honour which had been done them on that occasion (cheers). He was sure that all present would cordially concur in a feeling of admiration of the spirit which had prompted Mr. Moxhay to build this great and splendid Hall. All likewise would concur in wishing the fullest and most complete success to this great undertaking (loud cheers)—a success which would be delightful to Moxhay as regarded himself, but from which he was convinced Mr. Moxhay would receive still greater delight, because that success would have the effect of promoting the commerce and forwarding the prosperity of this great city (cheers). As the Lord Mayor had truly said, the present was not an occasion on which to indulge in any political allusions (hear hear). He trusted that men of all parties would be found anxious to promote the prosperity of that city and the country to which they all belonged, the prosperity of which was so bound up with the prosperity of the city of London, that the city could not prosper without the country participating in the benefits to be derived from it. He would, therefore, propose "The City of London, and the trade thereof" (loud cheers).—There were several other speeches, the Secretary and Proprietor (Mr. Moxhay) detailing the objects of the building at considerable length. The two principal rooms are spacious and lofty, and are admirably suited for the purposes of business transactions. At about two o'clock the party separated. So spirited an undertaking by a single individual deserves success.

To Correspondents.—A few Drawing-papers, fine Drawing-paper, may be had, price Two Guineas coloured; to Subscribers of the Paper, One Guinea.

Should any paper intended to be forwarded to Newgate to the full number of our subscribers have been lost, or not arrived by the presentation of our large print, so that there can be no excuse for non-supply. Whoever has taken the paper regularly from a bookseller or newsman is entitled to receive the print through the same channel, whether on account of past custom or of paid-up subscription.

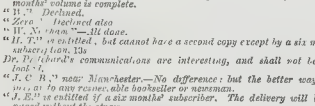
The exact size of the Paper of the Large Print of London is 4 feet 4 inches by 3 feet.

The Volume will have the Large Print of London folded in it as a Frontispiece

The Price of the Covers for binding the papers will be 3s., splendidly and appropriately enriched in gold on the back and side.

The price of the Volume will be One Guinea.

Portfolios, ingeniously constructed for holding and keeping the numbers for six months of 1843, may be had at the office, price 4s. The numbers can be bound at the end of the volume, and the portfolio can be used as before.



LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1843.

The police are apparently determined that the journalist who assumes the censorship of their misconduct shall not enjoy a sinecure in the pursuit of his avocations, for, as if to show how utterly regardless they are of public opinion, they appear during the past week to have cast aside even the semblance of virtue, and some have not hesitated to avow themselves in the public offices before the Magistrates the abettors and promoters of the most hideous and revolting profligacy that was ever perpetrated in the name of justice. If there be one species of criminality more wicked and abominable in a public officer than another, it is that of inveigling persons into the commission of offences against the law, in order afterwards to treacherously and assassin-like betray them to the authorities for the base consideration of the filthy lucre awarded to public prosecutors, a kind of compensation which has very properly acquired the conventional term of "blood money." We do not for a moment believe or attempt to insinuate that such unhallowed courses as these receive the slightest encouragement from the heads of the department, but it is "a common error with common minds" to suspect more than they see; and so long as such nefarious transactions as that to which we are about presently to call the attention of our readers are allowed to go unpunished, the most unclaimable and doubtless unjust surmises will be indulged in with regard to all parties. We entertain great respect for the magistrates of the City of London, seeing that their decisions are almost always tempered with mercy and suggested by kind and benevolent feelings, and the decision of Alderman Pirie in the present case is no exception to the general rule; but we could wish that he had gone a little further towards punishing the viper than merely to recommend his dismissal from the force to the Chief Commissioner. The short facts of the case are as follow. A man named King and his wife were held to bail for an assault on a female arising out of some domestic broil, and having great difficulty in procuring security, the interest of Mr. Policeman Franks, 24 P, was somehow or other enlisted in their behalf, and he applied to a man named George Porter, whom he instructed to come up to the Police-office, and be one of the bail; and, although he well knew that the unfortunate man had no qualification of the kind, he tutored him how to answer the questions that might be put to him, and provided a local habitation for him by telling him the number of a certain house in a street off Bishopsgate-street, which he was to swear he inhabited. All this was performed to the very letter, and the consequence was that on this bail the accused parties were liberated. Will it be believed, however, that a few days afterwards this very policeman took the wretch Porter into custody and brought him before the Lord Mayor on a charge of perjury. The statement made on this occasion by the lamb-like prosecutor was that "it occurred to him at the time the prisoner was swearing himself to be a housekeeper that he was not telling the truth, and he subsequently ascertained beyond doubt that his suspicions were correct, and he apprehended the prisoner for having thus given false bail. The prisoner, in tears, handed in what he said was a written account of what occurred, and solemnly declared that he was not so culpable, although he admitted that he did not occupy the house described, as was the policeman, who knew him well, and desired him to be one of the bail, directing him at the same time what to say and do on the occasion.—Sir John Pirie: Do you mean that you consented to swear that you were a housekeeper upon the advice of the officer, and that he knew your circumstances to be different?—The Prisoner: My Lord, he knew everything about it. He came and drank at my expense, and he told me to be sure to say I was a housekeeper when I was asked, and now he turns against me.—Sir John Pirie: Did you drink with this man, policeman? Policeman: I took a pint of beer with him.—Sir John Pirie: Before he was sworn as one of the bail? Policeman: Yes.—The Prisoner: My Lord, he had several pots of beer at my expense, and I can prove it, and he knew well I was no housekeeper. He knew all about me.—Policeman: I assure your Lordship that I did not know; I only suspected that he perjured himself.—Sir John Pirie: I will not entertain a charge made by a fellow capable of such conduct. It is most improper that such a person should be in the police, and I shall represent his conduct to the City Police Commissioner, who, I am convinced, will take care that the force will not be long disgraced by him. Prisoner, you are discharged; but mind what you are about, and let this operate as a warning to you.—Mr. Hobler: Let the prisoner understand, that if a credible prosecutor had appeared, the punishment which would in all probability be inflicted for the perjury would be transportation for seven years. The prisoner, who cried bitterly, declared most solemnly that he conceived, from the manner in which the matter had been represented to him, that he was committing no crime in saying that he was a housekeeper.—Sir John Pirie: You have had a narrow escape. Be a better man for the future.—Can anything be possibly more atrocious than these disclosures? and if such things be allowed to pass with impunity what man's life is safe from the machinations of such scoundrels? We really think that both fellows should be prosecuted—the one for the perjury and the other for suborning, for the sooner the authorities begin to make public examples of such miscreants the sooner will the evil be eradicated. If any argument were wanting to enforce the necessity of such a course as this it would be found in the case of the miserable man Meagan, who has been committed to Newgate to take his trial for the murder of Thomas Leary in Whitecross-street. Upon the occasion of the prisoner being brought up before the magistrates at Worship-street a second time, several witnesses were examined, and amongst others a woman named Catherine Singleton, who was present at the fatal affray, and whose evidence would apparently tend to reduce the charge against the accused to manslaughter, when a police constable named Wallis, 219 G, stepped forward, as if for the purpose of "clinching" the more heinous offence, by deposing to a confession alleged to have been made to him by the prisoner, but of which he mentioned not a single sentence when previously before the magistrate. Having been re-sworn, he stated

"That being on duty at the station-house when the prisoners were brought first to the court, he was ordered by Sergeant Ellis to take charge of Meagan, who, on the way to the court, said to him that it was the drink that had done it; that they were drinking all Saturday night and Sunday, and that after the christening he and Leary went to the Green Man and had glasses of rum, and they afterwards had words, but he could not recollect what passed; but he added that the deed was done, and the drink was the cause of it. Meagan now looked steadfastly at the policeman, and asked him how he could stand swearing before his Maker, and utter such a statement. He declared that he had used no such language; he would deny it upon his sacred oath, and he added, that if he were to die, his ghost should haunt the policeman if possible. The constable said that the prisoner repeated exactly the same statement to him in this court. The witness was rigidly examined, and repeated the two statements. He had not mentioned it here at the first examination, for he had only to escort the prisoner, and upon arrival deliver him up to Sergeant Ellis, and he did not know but that it was a matter already known to the latter. Inspector Shackell now informed the magistrate that a man then in attendance had come to him on Sunday while he was attending at the funeral, and told him he could corroborate the evidence of Wallis as to the prisoner's confession. Mr. Broughton asked him if the man told him the particulars? The inspector said no, for he told the man he was too busy to attend to him then, and desired him to attend at this court. William Waghorn, broker, the man alluded to, who wore a smock frock, like a country carter, was then called in, and sworn—He stated that he was on the look out for a situation and lodging at the Temperance Coffee-house, in Martin's-court, St. Martin-le-grand. He deposed that he was passing through Worship-street yesterday se'nnight, when the prisoners were brought here, and being, upon inquiry, told that a man had murdered his father, he came in with the crowd, and heard Meagan make the confession to the constable. He related the confession in nearly the same terms as the latter had done, but said the word used by the prisoner was, "That he and Leary had been drinking all night." He said he went on Sunday to see the funeral, and then related to Inspector Shackell the statement he had now made, and the Inspector said it just corroborated the constable, and desired him to attend here. The Inspector being sworn, said the man had not told him a word of the statement he had to make, but said he would corroborate the policeman, and the Inspector, without hearing more, told him merely to leave his address and attend here. This man, upon inquiry, was found to be an ex-policeman of the M division, but he said he had not been discharged from the force. Tilt, one of the ushers of the court, said, however, that he had seen the man hanging about for a long time, and was told by himself that he was discharged from the force for having been picked up drunk in Shoreditch. Mr. Broughton ordered this man also Catherine Singleton, to be detained in the House of Correction as witnesses, and he remanded Meagan to have the depositions taken for his committal for the murder."

We shall not trust ourselves with any comment on the conduct of this voluntary witness, whose correctness of memory is really astonishing, when we reflect on the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed at the time, and which, coupled with the fact of his being an ex-policeman, awakens very alarming suspicions of the manner in which public prosecutions are got up by the members of this same force. Besides, we consider that we should be acting very wrongly, indeed, whilst a fellow-creature's life is in the balance, if we allowed ourselves to be betrayed into any premature discussion of the case, which might look like prejudging it. Our only object is to draw public attention to this festering evil, which, if allowed to spread, must be productive of the most frightful consequences, and therefore the sooner it is checked the better.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

PARIS, January 4, 1843.

It has been decided that there shall be a royal speech on the opening of the Chambers next Monday, but we have very nearly had a ministerial crisis, owing to the debates and differences in the Cabinet on this knotty question. M. Guizot, I have already announced to you, has been always in favour of the customary discourse; first, because he regarded that the King was pledged to it by his speech in the last brief dynastic session; and, secondly, because M. Guizot ardently desires an animated discussion on his ministerial acts. In an address, in reply to the royal speech, there will be more ample field than in the narrow limits of a vote taken on a grant of secret service money. The triumph on an address will be also much more decisive for the Ministry, as many Conservatives are opposed to the upsetting of a Cabinet by refusing funds to carry on the Government. M. Guizot's advice was, however, most strenuously opposed by Marshal Soult in the Cabinet, and by M. Dupin, the deputy who is a secret confidant of Louis Philippe. M. Dupin has not forgiven M. Guizot, for refusing to support his pretensions to be re-elected President of the Chamber, and the wily advocate thought he could drive M. Guizot to a resignation of office, if he could persuade the King not to make the speech from the throne. I do not think M. Guizot would have resigned, but his position might have been equivocal by the false interpretation given to the non-appearance of a royal sitting. M. Guizot resorted to diplomatic aid, and the arguments of Count Apponey, the Austrian Ambassador, and of Lord Cowley, prevailed with Louis Philippe. The King protested that he had no motive for a ministerial mouification, and to prove his sincerity, he consented to the speech, although his opinion inclined unchangeably to the necessity for it, inasmuch as the Chambers had been merely adjourned after the Regency Bill, that the definitive Bureau was constituted, and it would afford the pedestal of two speeches in one session. Such is, in substance, the information I have to give you of the late deliberations as to the mode of opening the Chambers. The Marshal, finding that the little intrigue to revive his ministry of the 12th of May, 1839, that is, Dufoure, Passy, Teste, Cunin Gridaine, &c., has resolved to go hand in hand with M. Guizot as long as the latter can last. There is, in fact, just now no party or intrigue to upset the Soult-Guizot administration. Thiers is quiet. Count Molé has been baffled. Salvandy and other Conservatives of the Right seem inclined to be reconciled with M. Guizot. But it must not be anticipated that there will be a calm discussion on the Address. The Right of Search and Spanish questions may yet be the Scylla and Charybdis of the cabinet. At all events, the debates will be animated; but much is justly expected from Guizot's tact in debate. It is scarcely worth while to allude to the empty complimentary addresses to the King on New Year's-day, except that it has been remarked in diplomatic circles, that never was there more political reserve observable in their composition.

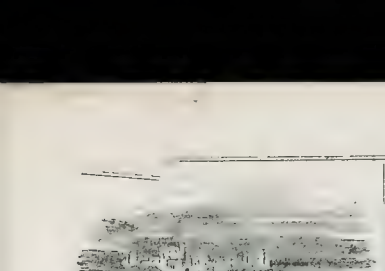
General Bugeaud's dismissal from the governorship of Algeria is all but official. Marshal Soult has protested against his remaining in the command, after his correspondence with the National. General Bugeaud had written to the republican organ a confidential letter, defending his acts against some attacks in that print. Such is the scoundrelism of the Parisian journalists, that the National actually printed Bugeaud's private letter; and, as the Minister of War had issued a mandate prohibiting correspondents from corresponding with newspapers, General Bugeaud's offence became too flagrant to be overlooked.

PARIS, Thursday.—No news yet of the India mail. We have had snow and sleet all day, and the telegraph has been unable to work. General Bugeaud is not recalled, but has been summoned by telegraph to Paris, to explain the expenditure, which has been enormous, in the late campaigns. It is doubted whether he will return to Africa, as it is proposed to divide it into three military divisions, and to have no governor for the future. Admiral Duperré, the Minister of Marine, will certainly resign after the opening of the chambers, owing to his bad state of health. Admiral Lalande and Admiral Mackau are both mentioned as his probable successor. There will be no other change in the Cabinet, and M. Guizot is stronger now than ever. I have no time to describe to you the full success of a new opera of Donizetti's, entitled "Don Pasquale." It is one of the most happy buffo compositions I have ever heard. Lablache is inimitable, and is seconded by Tamburini, Mario, and Grisi, most admirably. It will be the greatest hit for years.

THE MARQUESAS ISLANDS.—It has been currently reported in circles which have been considered liable for the accuracy of their information, that despatches from the Marquesas Islands had been received by the French Government, containing news of very serious import. These despatches are said to contain an account of the murder of the officer who was left in command of the island by Admiral Dupetit-Thouars; and it is moreover believed that the natives had risen upon the men who were left with the unfortunate officer, and that all the French in the island had fallen before the scalping-knives and tomahawks of the relentless savages. The same accounts also state, that the English ship of war had just arrived off the group of the Marquesas.

On Wednesday night Lieut.-Colonel Malcolm, C.B., left London with the treaty concluded between her Majesty and the Emperor of China, via Paris and Marseilles, from thence by the Oriental steamer, for China.

LIVERPOOL, Jan. 4, 3 P.M.—The Ariel has just arrived from Pernambuco in 26 days, having sailed from thence on the 28th November. Exchange is quoted at 27d. The Ariel likewise brings advices from Rio to the 10th Nov., with intelligence of the arrival of her Majesty's steamer Salamander, with Mr. Ellis on board, in 34 days from London. The Brazilian Government had commenced the issue of paper money, and the exchange had felt the effect at once of this pernicious measure, having fallen from 29d. to 27d., with a tendency still downward.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

BOSOM, Sunday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the whole of the court, attended divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. J. Vane officiated.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and suite, walked out on the terrace.—The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken their usual airings.

MONDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert hunted with his harriers, attended by Major-General Wemyss, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. Anson, Captain Seymour, and the Hon. C. A. Murray. The royal party met at Reconge Park, the seat of W. Lee, Esq., and had a capital run. The Prince returned to the castle at two o'clock, to luncheon.—Sir Robert Peel and Lord Stanley arrived at the castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

TUESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed several hours' shooting over the royal preserves, near Cumberland Lodge. His Royal Highness was attended by Sir R. Peel, Lord Stanley, the Marquis of Ormonde, Colonel Bouverie, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. Anson. The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, and Earl Delawarr, arrived at the castle, on a visit to her Majesty.—The royal dinner party included the following personages:—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Sir R. Peel, Lord Stanley, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, the Duchess of Norfolk, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Earl Delawrr, the Marquis of Ormonde, Mr. O. Gore, Colonel Bouverie, Major-General Wemyss, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.—The band of the 2nd Life Guards was in attendance.

WEDNESDAY, Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked for some time in the morning in the Home Park.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, Lord Rossmore, and Sir George and Lady Couper, had the honour of joining the royal circle at the castle. The royal dinner party included the Lady in Waiting, Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, Earl Delawarr, Hon. Miss Lister, Hon. Miss Liddell, Marquis of Ormonde, Hon. C. A. Murray, Mr. R. Ormsby Gore, Major-General Wemyss, and Colonel Bouverie.

The Queen held a Privy Council at three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, at Windsor Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury; the Earl of Aberdeen, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Lord Stanley, Secretary of State for War and the Colonies; the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and the Earl of Haddington, First Lord of the Admiralty. At the Council an order in council was passed for making Vice-Admiralty and other courts at Hong-Kong, China, which hitherto have been at Canton.—Mr. C. Greville was the clerk of the council in waiting. The Marquis of Ormonde was the Lord in Waiting; Mr. R. Ormsby Gore the Groom in Waiting; and Major-General Wemyss the Equerry in Waiting, on the Queen. Colonel Bouverie was the Equerry in Waiting on Prince Albert.—The summonses for the Council were issued between twelve and one o'clock in town, and a special train was ordered on the Great Western Railway.—The Earl of Aberdeen, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Earl of Haddington, took their departure from Paddington at two o'clock, to attend the meeting.—After the Privy Council, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Haddington, and Mr. C. Greville, left Windsor Castle for the Slough station, where they arrived soon after four o'clock, a special train conveying the party to town in twenty eight minutes.

The Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer left town on Tuesday, on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, at their seat, Bowood-park, Wilts.

COLONEL Malcolm transacted business on Wednesday at the Foreign-office

HIS MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager continues to enjoy excellent health, and during the week, owing to the prevailing fine weather, has almost daily taken carriage airings in the neighbourhood of Cumberland Lodge.

His Imperial Highness the Archduke Frederick has at length been enabled to take his departure from Portsmouth, the wind having shifted to the northward, and thus afforded an opportunity for the gratification of the desire to proceed down channel. His Highness has expressed himself highly gratified at the hospitality and attention which has been shown to him and his officers during their stay in this country.

R. O. Gascoigne, Esq., the second and only remaining son of Richard Oliver Gascoigne, Esq., of Parlington, died suddenly on Monday morning last, at Walsall, where the family are residing. He is supposed to have expired in a fit, having been found dead on his room floor. His brother died in the same manner but a few months ago. Only two daughters now survive; but the old estates, on the decease of the present owner, it is supposed, will pass into a distant branch of the family we have heard, probably into that of the Earl Fitzwilliam.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex and the Duchess of Inverness are not expected to arrive at Woburn Abbey, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, until the 12th instant, from the Earl of Carlisle's seat, Castle Howard.

M. Mosquera, New Granada Charge d'Affaires, transacted business on Monday at the Foreign-office.

Lord Stanley arrived in town on Monday morning from Knowsley Hall, Lancashire, and left town in the afternoon, on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The flooring of a malthouse at Upton, the property of Messrs. Jennings, of Windsor, gave way last week, when one man was killed, and two others dreadfully injured.—An alarming explosion of gas took place in the billiard-room of the Travellers Club, in Pall-mall, on Saturday evening last, when upwards of £100 worth of damage was sustained.—The proposition, for the erection of a Union workhouse in Anglesea, has been rejected by a majority of 47 guineas to 8.——The monument to the memory of the Scottish martyrs, intended to be raised in the Regent's-circus, is likely to become the subject of not only great controversy, but expensive litigation, in the parish of Marylebone. The vestry came to a resolution on Saturday last, which, for the present, virtually rescinds their previous grant of the site.——Mr. North, tavernkeeper of Bath, was prosecuted at the Newberry petty sessions on Thursday week by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for having overdriven his horse in a match against time, which led to the poor animal's death. The defendant was fined in the sum of five guineas.

——An aggregate meeting of the agriculturists of Berkshire is to take place in a few days, for the purpose of maintaining their claim to protection.——It has been calculated that the following sum of money is nightly the amount spent in theatrical amusements on Monday, the 26th of December, at the 12 theatres that are now open in the metropolis:—Covent-garden theatre, £350; Drury-lane, £350; Haymarket, £220; Olympic, £80; the Royal Marylebone, £100; the Surrey, £140; the Victoria, £120; Sadler's Wells, £80; the Queen's, £75; the Norton-stagate, £90; the Pavilion, 75; the Garrick, £60. The saloons licensed to perform musical entertainments, at which money is taken at the doors, places of well-known celebrity, as follows:—The Grecian Saloon, £100; the Albert Saloon, 100; the Bower, £50; the Yorkshire Stingo, £40; making a total of £1900 taken at the doors of the various theatres.——The prisoners in Newgate, and the other city prisons, were regaled with bread, beef, and porter on New-year's day, at the expense of the sheriff. It is to be hoped that this is the only expense that the sheriff will be put to on account of the prisoners.——The Rev. Jonathan Ackroyd, a clergyman of the church of England, was convicted at the petty sessions of Bury a few days ago, of being a rogue and vagabond, and with having obtained money under false pretences. He was sentenced to three months' hard labour in the House of Correction at Salford on that charge, and is afterwards to stand his trial at the sessions on the second.——The Bishop of Winchester has remitted the sum of £200 to the trustees of the parish of Southwark, as an equivalent for the proceeds of the musical performance proposed to be held at the parish church, which his lordship had interdicted.——The Earl of Yarborough has given a piece of land at Brigg for the site of a Roman Catholic chapel.——The subscription fund to defray the expense of repairing the damage sustained by the fire of York Minster amounts to nearly £7,000.——A respectable young lady, named Ann Dunn, was committed for trial from the Clerkenwell police-office on Monday last, charged with having robbed twenty-five children of their clothes and bread and butter on their way to school.——The number of presents sent by the different coaches from Norwich to London during the Christmas week, amounted—by the Ipswich mail to about 400; Newmarket ditto, 400; Phenomena, 250; Telegraph, 346; Magnet, 1,400; Mack's Van, 280. Total, 3,076.——A Scotchman named McPherson, who resided at Ebury-street, Pimlico, spent several hours drinking with some fellow-countrymen on Saturday evening in honour of the old year, and was found dead on the stairs of his lodging-house next morning.——A poor woman was killed at Sheffield a few days ago by a kick, whilst endeavouring to prevent two neighbours from fighting.——A young man, named William Garbitt, aged 21, of respectable connexions, formerly a clerk, and formerly clerk to Messrs. Foster and Co., of that town, put a period to his existence, at Kidderminster, on Monday afternoon last, by taking prussic acid.——Mr. Steward, an upholsterer, residing at College-street Chelsea, was charged before the Magistrates, at Queen-square police office, with having created a disturbance during divine service at a Baptist chapel, in Pimlico; the defendant's excuse was that he wished to prevent his daughter being baptised, which ceremony, he understood, had been performed by the clergyman without his knowledge. The defendant was held to bail, to keep the peace, but he declined offering any sureties, and was sent to prison.——Catherine Singleton, the woman who was committed to Newgate, as implicated in the Whitecross-street murder, has been allowed to turn approver, but her evidence against Meagan (who deals the fatal blow) evidence of charge to one of manslaughter, it appearing that the parties were engaged in a scuffle at the time, and throwing shoes at each other. Meagan's wife was discharged. (In connection with this case, Mr. Broughton is at present engaged in sifting the conduct of certain police hangers-on, who extorted a confession made by the prisoner, which the latter indignantly denied. They are apparently men of very indifferent character, and have excited the strong suspicion of the worthy magistrate.)——The usual half yearly meeting of the London Dock Company was held at their house in Fenchurch-street, on Tuesday last, when a dividend of £1 17s 6d. per cent. was declared, being 2s. 6d. more than that agreed upon last July. —As the north mail was on its way south on Wednesday night-week, the axle broke while the coach was passing near Lusborrow-heel-bridge, near Caithness-suire. There were no passengers in the coach at the time, but the driver and guard were both thrown off and greatly injured, the former so severely, that he only survived until next day.——The Annual report of the Westminster savings' bank directors, shows an increase in the deposits for the last half-year, of £3,000.——During divine service at the parish church of Bramley, in Devon, on Christmas day, the rector called from the congregation a young man and woman, and, in the presence of all those assembled, expelled them at opposite doors from the sacred edifice. —John Hannah, a broker's porter, residing at Shoreditch, committed suicide a few days ago by cutting his throat. It is thought he was impelled to the commission of the fatal deed by absolute destitution.——The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Colonial Bank was held at the London Tavern on Tuesday, when a dividend of two per cent. was recommended.

William Cannell, who was charged with having fired at and wounded Enzabeth Magnus, with intent to kill and murder her, was brought before the Lord Mayor on Tuesday, it being expected that the poor woman would be able to appear to give evidence against her assailant, but it was stated to his lordship that, instead of being convalescent, she was then in the most imminent danger. His lordship consequently remanded the prisoner for a month.——A child was accidentally burned to death in Totnil-street, Westminster, on Sunday night last.——The line of French Mail Packets, to cross the Atlantic, will, it is expected, commence running next June. The packets will be fourteen in number; they are built to carry forty guns each, and will belong to the French government. The French port selected for the packet station is Cherbourg.——We are happy to state that Lord Worsley is rapidly recovering from the effects of his late severe accident.——The herring fishery off Boulogne has this season been so abundant that, up to the 20th ult., no less a quantity than 5,527,268 kilogrammes (100 kilos being equal to 220½ lbs. English) have been brought in. One boat alone is said to have realised 30,000f.——A wax model of a monument proposed to be erected at Bamburgh, to the memory of the heroin Grace Darling, has been made at Newcastle. It is a beautiful work of art, and reflects great credit on the able and ingenious artist.——As an instance of the uncommon mildness of the season, two hives of bees were busily working on the 26th inst. in the vicinity of Aberdeen.——The immense work, the ship canal which connects the St. Lawrence with the upper lakes, has been completed.——Lady Pollock, the lady of the hero of the Kyber Pass, was born at Taun, and is the daughter of the late Mr. Sheriff Barclay of that town. ——No sooner was the peace concluded between Great Britain and China than the officers of her Majesty's 98th Regiment sent an order to Mr. Thurston, billiard-table maker to the Queen, to make a first-rate table for their use at Hong Kong.——Lord Stanley has, it is understood, resolved to give the recommendation of the late committee of the House of Commons on the West Indies and West Africa a fair trial, so far as emigration from Africa to those colonies is concerned.——Mr. Bellamy, the celebrated buss singer, died on Tuesday morning, at the advanced age of 74.——Mr. and Mrs. Sartoris (late Miss A. Kemble) have taken the late mansion of the Governor of Gibraltar, Lieutenant General Sir Robert Wilson, and intend to winter in this country.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

INDIA, AFFGHANISTAN, AND CHINA.

(Abridged from a second edition of the Times of this morning).

The Indian Mail to the 1st of December has arrived, and we have letters and papers to that date. The return of all the British troops through the hostile defiles of the Khyber was fully concluded on the 7th of November. The first division, under General Pollock, succeeded in effecting their march without much difficulty. The second, commanded by General McCaskill, was not equally fortunate, in consequence, as report states, of the neglect of crowning the heights over a most dangerous part of the defile. The enemy, lying concealed in numbers on the watch, and finding this division embarrassed in its movements near Ali Musjid, during the night of the 3rd made an attack on the baggage, a considerable quantity of which fell into their hands. During the skirmishing two officers, Lieutenant Christie, of the Artillery, and Ensign Nicholson, of the 30th Bengal N.I., were killed, as well as upwards of 60 Sepoys and followers, and also a number of camp followers. Two cannon were also taken by them, but one of the guns was retaken on the following morning, as well as the carriage of the other, the Kyberees having concealed the gun itself. With this exception, nothing of consequence appears to have occurred in the return of the troops from Jellalabad to Peshawur, through the most difficult defiles in Asia. The third division, under General Wild, which formed the last one of the army, arrived at Jumrood, the frontier station of the Sikh territory, on the 6th.

The retreat of the British from Cabul was preceded by the destruction of the celebrated bazaar of that capital. Its destruction is stated to have been caused by its having been the principal theatre of the indignities with which the body of the British envoy, Sir W. H. M'Naghten, was treated, subsequent to his murder by Akbkar Khan.

Trophies of various kinds has been brought from Cabul; among them were more than twenty cannons; one of the latter, a large brass gun, having been found too unwieldy, was left on the road by General M'Caskill, but it was afterwards burst by Captain Thomas and the irregulars under his orders, who formed the rear guard. The destruction of this gun, which, it was feared, would be re-placed in triumph in Cabul, was considered as a great service, particularly as it was said that Lord Ellenborough had at one time expressed a desire to have it in India.

British troops were under orders to march through the Sikh dominions in six brigades; the first was to move on the 10th of November. Rumours were current of the probability of certain arrangements being formed between the Sikh army and Sir Henry Fane, the Governor-General, whereby the former was to agree to accept the protection of the British Government, in order to preserve hereafter his throne and life. The Governor-General, with his body-guard, had reached Meerut on the 14th of November, in his progress to Ferozepore, where fêtes were to be given on the arrival of the troops from Cabul, and near which place it was expected that interviews would take place between his lordship and the Maharajah, as Shere Singh is commonly called. The commander-in-chief was also on his way from Simla to Ferozepore.

Some apprehension appeared to have been entertained of a collision between the Sikhs and the British troops near Peshawur, and positive orders had been issued to prevent any British soldier or camp follower from entering any village near the camp, and from going to Peshawur.

The Governor-General has made public his intention "to station permanently a large British force of Europeans and natives between the Sutledge and Murkunda," and also to facilitate the navigation of the Indus and its tributary rivers, and to improve the state of the roads between the Sutledge and the Ganges and Jumna. A light-house was ordered to be erected on Minora-point, in the neighbourhood of Kurrachee.

The political agencies established in Scinde, appointed by Lord Auckland, had been abruptly terminated by an order of the present Governor-General, who has placed the whole management of those districts under the care of General Sir Charles Napier, now commanding the Bombay army stationed there. These had, according to rumour, been some further stipulations urged upon the Ameers of Hyderabad, to which they seemed unwilling to assent. Great activity prevailed in the communications between that general and the government of Bombay.

After Majesty's 41st Regiment was about to embark for Europe from Kurrachee, for which purpose transports had been ordered from Bombay.

There had been a heavy fall of rain at Bombay on the 15th of November, which was long and unseasonable event, had caused the cholera to rage among the natives for several days. The health of the island was restored at the period of the departure of the mail

The burning within the year of the five merchant ships from Bombay, which were stated publicly to have been doomed, had produced a strict examination into the facts on the part of the underwriters. Some traces of a conspiracy for the purpose had been discovered

In the interior of India tranquility prevailed, with the exception of the mountainous districts of Bundlekund, to quiet which there was a considerable force collecting in that direction.

The news from China extends to the 13th of Oct. It was said, that a clipper had brought news to a later date of that month, that all was in statu quo with waiting for the ratification of the treaty by the Queen, and that opium had risen in price. There is an observation made by our correspondent, in his postscript, to which it may be proper to advert. It is that the pillage and destruction committed on the valleys of the mountains during the retreat from Cabul, and in the dwellings of the most notorious robbers of Asia, and amidst the scenes of the bloody treachery of last January, can not be exclusively attributed to the British troops. The Sikhs were there also, and they had received too many lessons from the Afghans not to feel satisfaction in the retaliation. The horrible account of burning some wounded men by setting fire to their clothes is said to be a gross exaggeration.

[Next week we shall give a more detailed report of the Indian news, with several illustrations which have reached us too late for this week's paper]

WINDSOR, Thursday.—At half-past two o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal highness Prince Albert left the Castle in a travelling carriage and four for Claremont, escorted by a party of the 2nd Life Guards, under the command of Lieut. the Earl of Longford. The Duchess of Norfolk, the Marquis of Ormonde, Major-General Wemyss, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. Anson, followed in two other Royal carriages, who are the only personages who will be in attendance at Claremont. The Princess Royal, with her French governess, left for Claremont in the forenoon. The Prince of Wales remains at the castle under the care of Lady Lyttleton. The Honourable Misses Liddel and Lister and Mr. O'Gore remain at the castle.

CLAREMONT, Friday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Royal suite, arrived at Claremont, at four o'clock on Thursday afternoon, from Windsor castle, escorted by a party of Hussars. The Queen and Prince Albert walked this morning in the grounds of Claremont. The Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards went out on a shooting excursion, attended by Mr. George Edward Anson and the Hon. C. A. Murray. The Royal party returned about two o'clock. The Royal dinner-party at Claremont yesterday evening included the Duchess of Norfolk, Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, Lord Rivers, Hon. C. A. Murray, Mr. George Edward Anson, and Major-General Wemyss.

The eruption of Mount Etna still continues, and presents the same sublime and imposing appearance that it did at the commencement. Every morning a beautiful column is perceived by a zone of snow encircling the upper part of the cone, and thus forming a boundary between the cultivated region, abounding in luxuriant vegetation, and the region of terror and destruction. The fields, even at this season of the year, are clothed with verdure, and the surrounding country, which is rich and highly cultivated, presents the most charming pictures, especially when lighted up by the moon or by the flames of Etna. The lava continues to flow in a broad stream in the direction of the Valle del Bovo.

By a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholls, which appears in a provincial journal, we learn that her Majesty's steamer Spitfire was ordered from the Sappadilla Keys, bound to Honduras, with two companies of the 3rd West India Regiment. Only one man was lost.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—We observe that this popular theatre closes for the season on Saturday, the 14th instant, when Mr. Webster, the well-known and enterprising lessee, will take his benefit. Nothing in the drama the world can boast of could possibly more attractive than the bill of fare provided for the occasion, and we heartily wish him what he deserves, an overflowing "bumper." We understand that, brilliant as have been the entertainments at this theatre during the present season, arrangements have been already completed, by which they will be entirely outshone during the next. Mr. William Farren having undertaken the stage-management, an appointment which must excite in every playgoer the most lively anticipations. Mr. Webster has at length prevailed on the head landlord to permit of the introduction of gas, an alteration which will not be least conspicuous amongst the new improvements.

THE REVENUE.—By the official returns of the public income made up to Thursday, we regret to perceive a very considerable falling off for the year just completed. The circumstance is more to be deplored when consideration is given to the extraordinary efforts which have been made, in the course of the past year, to arrest the downward and ruinous career of failing finances with rising expenditure. The total decrease on the year, as compared with the quarter ending January 5, 1841, is £922,680. The decrease on the quarter just ended, as compared with the corresponding quarter last year, is £240,062. That our readers may have at one view the present and recent position of the revenue, in relation to the principal resources from which it is drawn, we subjoin a few statements collated from the general table:—

	CUSTOMS.
Total amount of customs duty for the year ending Jan. 5, 1842		£19,899,585
Ditto for Jan. 5, 1843		19,075,310
Exhibiting a decrease in Customs receipts of		824,275
	EXCISE.
Year ending Jan. 5, 1842		12,580,918
Ditto ditto 1843		11,407,504
Decrease in Excise		1,173,614
	STAMPS.
Year ending Jan. 5, 1842		6,709,446
Ditto ditto 1843		6,491,000
Decrease in Stamps		218,346
	TAXES.
Year ending Jan. 5, 1842		4,452,911
Ditto ditto 1843		4,243,592
Decrease in Taxes		209,319

Thus, in these four main trunks of our fiscal system, the deficit on the year amounts to the enormous sum of £2,425,554. In the produce from Crown lands there is a falling off of £29,000. To the credit account of the year goes the whole sum yet received under the Income-tax, and which is stated at £5,71,056. The Post-office receipts have risen from £455,000 to £505,000, an increase of £150,000.

On Tuesday evening last, the brig Mayflower, of Gainsborough, laden with oak for the dockyard, was wrecked on the Plymouth breakwater—crew all saved.

ANOTHER EXTENSIVE FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—Thursday evening, about half-past five o'clock, a fire broke out in the workshops of Messrs. Foster and Stewart, the extensive joiners and builders, in Lawton-street. It was filled with lumber and new work, all of which, with the buildings, were destroyed. The buildings on the same site were completely destroyed about nine years ago by a similar calamity.

Thursday night a fire broke out in the office of Stamps and Taxes at Somerset House, which was fortunately discovered immediately after, which enabled the firemen to get it under without the building sustaining any material damage.

Meagan, whose case is alluded to in another part of our paper, was tried this morning at the Central Criminal Court, on the charge of wilful murder; but, as we anticipated, he was only found guilty of the secondary crime of Manslaughter, and sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment.

FINE ARTS.

THE GABRIELLE OF DE LA ROCHE.

Art is not merely English, or French, or German, or Italian. Her presence has embellished many lands—her spirit animated many nations. She is universal in her best and brightest attributes, restricting her influences to no peculiar spot of earth, nor confining her charms to any one language or people. Beauty of form is still beautiful, although the artist be of a clime far distant from our own; and truth and fulness of expression must be recognised and appreciated wherever displayed, or by whomsoever produced. In fine, nature is still nature; and the germ of poetical feeling is similar in its manifestations wherever they may happen to be shown. The delineation—the realization upon canvass or upon paper—of the natural and poetic, requires qualities of the highest kind; and believing this, it is to us at once a duty and a pleasure to embellish our pages with fac similes of the productions of foreign artists, whenever such seem worthy of reflection. Already have we given specimens from the German—the Zeitlemoos, and a picture from the rising Düsseldorf school;—and more than once our French neighbours have afforded a picture for the gravers of our artists. In one instance we gave a wood-cut copy of a French portrait of Napoleon, in which that troubler of Europe is represented by the artist De la Roche, perhaps more truthfully than by Canova himself; to say nothing of the favourite David. We now give a specimen from another picture by De la Roche—the subject "Gabrielle." Its beauty was with us the motive for engraving it, and our subscribers will doubtless at once acknowledge the sufficiency of the reason. The expression of the face is melancholy even to sorrow; grief weighs heavy upon the eyelids, and the mouth has fixed upon it those signs of sadness which are akin to weeping. Staying one step short of the loud and noisy outward expressions of grief, the entire physiognomy has yet perhaps a deeper, sadder, expression, and the artist has confined the whole countenance within those classic outlines, which in themselves give an air of chastity and elegance to the portraiture of the sorrow-stricken girl. Perhaps its entire character might be summed up in the three words—it is classic, natural, and effective. To descend from the picture to its frame, even the border is elegant and in itself a clever piece of engraving, ornamental to that which it surrounds, and particularly useful in relieving from the pressure of a steam-press the picture set within it.

FLORICULTURE.

ELEGANT CLARKIA.

This plant is a comparatively modern introduction. To speak of its beauty is superfluous, as it is fully acknowledged by the fact, that, though known in English gardens but a few years, it is universally cultivated. There are three species usually grown as summer flowers, all of them distinguished by their curious unguiculate or clawed petals; our figure represents C. elegans the plant rising to the height of nearly three feet. Like other Californian annuals, the treatment they require is what is technically called half-hardy. The first sowing should be made upon a gentle hot bed, about the beginning of March, spreading the seed evenly on a stratum of very light earth; immediately after sowing shut the frame under which the seed is sown close down, but as soon as the plants appear above the earth some care is necessary to prevent them becoming drawn, a little fresh air should be admitted, by tilting the light about an inch every day, increasing the quantity in a gradual manner, until the plants are strong enough to bear exposure to the open air, by the middle of April they will be large enough to bear removal, and may be at once transplanted to the places they are designed to ornament, observing to shade them for the first week after planting, by whelming a flower-pot or some such thing over them, they also require to be watered every evening until established. These plants afford a constant supply of flowers from May till the end of July; and if another sowing is made about the time the first are transplanted, the succession may be continued until the plants are destroyed by the autumn frosts. This second sowing should be made after a shower of rain, while the earth is yet moist, for if the seed be committed to the earth while the latter is in a dry state, and similar weather continue for even a short time, the vitality of the seed is with difficulty aroused. The Clarkias are most ornamental when planted in masses, that is, a bed planted entirely with one kind; small beds filled in this manner, and judiciously arranged, offer a most beautiful and varied contrast. The plants, when disposed in this or any other manner, require to be planted a foot distant from each other.

WORCESTER.—MASONIC FESTIVAL.—In the course of the last week the festival of St. John the Evangelist was celebrated by the brethren in the "faithful city" with the customary observances. About 70 noblemen and gentlemen sat down to a sumptuous banquet, served in the magnificent masonic hall. F. Eginton, Esq., presided on the occasion. The loyal and masonic toasts engaged the attention of the assembly till a late hour. Never before has Worcester witnessed such a masonic assemblage.

ACCIDENT TO THE DOVER COACH.—MIRACULOUS ESCAPE OF THE PASSENGERS.—On Saturday night, about half-past seven o'clock, an accident occurred to the Phœnix Dover coach, which had just arrived from Dover, at the Bricklayers' Arms, in the Old Kent-road. The coachman had got down from the box, as customary, giving the horses in charge to a man at their heads. Several of the passengers also got down, leaving three others, two gentlemen and a boy, on the roof. In a few minutes the leaders were startled by the sudden cracking of a carter's whip, and, notwithstanding all the efforts of the man to stop them, set off at full gallop through the gate in the New Kent-road, and proceeded at a tremendous pace, with the reins dragging at their heels, towards Westminster-bridge. The passengers on the outside were in the greatest terror, and the shouts of the people in their endeavours to stop the horses but increased the animals' speed. They passed the Elephant and Castle without coming in contact with any of the numerous omnibuses plying there, and pursued their career along the St. George's-road, until they got to the Marshgate, in the Westminster-road, through which they dashed on the right-hand side, without the least damage. The branch coach of the Dover mail had but an instant previously passed through the gate on the same side, and had they met the collision would have been most fearful. The coachman of the branch coach, seeing the dangerous situation of the passengers, immediately pulled up and despatched a man after them. By the time the horses had reached the foot of Westminster-bridge, they began to slacken their speed, and the two gentlemen availed themselves of that circumstance to clamber over the roof of the coach and descended behind, which they effected in safety, but the boy was afraid to attempt it. Just as the horses reached the centre of the bridge a boy with a truck, another branch Dover coach, and a brewer's dray were coming in an opposite direction, and there being no room for them to pass, they all came with fearful violence against the dray, and by the collision the coach was overturned, and the lad was thrown violently on to the pavement, and miraculously escaped unhurt. One of the leaders was killed on the spot, and the forepart of the coach was smashed to pieces. The lad drawing the truck fortunately escaped with only a few bruises. The damage done to the coach is very considerable.

THE CANADA MAIL.—Adverting to a rumour which appeared in our publication of Saturday last, in which it was stated that the mail from Canada for England had been lost on its passage across the St. Lawrence, the coast containing it being sunk by the ice, we are happy in being able to inform our readers that the missing mail was fortunately and extraordinarily recovered. It was found seven leagues below the city of Quebec, shored and safely floating upon the ice, perfectly sound and dry, and was brought home in the Columbia with the rest of the American mail.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.

No. XXVI.

PETER BORTHWICK, M.P.

No political party ever gained possession of place and power, or seemed likely to be able to attain it, without finding in its ranks some of those hangers-on of more pretension than merit, who have been dragged into a certain degree of elevation by the progress of the whole party upwards. They occupy rather a peculiar, and, if they were at all sensitive, anything but an agreeable position; too incompetent to be employed in any of the higher grades of office, and yet too noisy and active to be altogether overlooked. Besides, in the days of adversity they have been generally employed in business that could not have so well been done by men of greater note; and, if provoked by too marked a contempt, they might make some awkward revelations—a danger not to be risked by discreet politicians. They are, therefore, tolerated as necessary evils—permitted indefinite length of speech in the House, and the run of the clubs out of it—a seat at a great man's table at those party dinners which are so far public that exclusion from them would be the "cut direct"—and the lively hope of a diplomatic or consular appointment, on the credit of which they may live, if they be clever enough to get others to trust them on the strength of it. Such are the general features of a trader in politics—a character not confined to any one party—nor, perhaps, altogether inapplicable to the gentleman we are about to introduce.

Yet Mr. Borthwick—or Peter, as he is generally called, having arrived at that stage of notoriety at which the Mr. can be dropped—is not without a spice of cleverness, if cleverness may be defined as the talent for "getting on." Of his birth and connections we know nothing—as is the case of many of the heroes of antiquity, both are wrapped in obscurity. He received some of his education, at least, at one of the universities, as it appears he was a Fellow Commoner of Downing College, Cambridge. His first appearance in what may be called public life was during the height of the agitation of the slavery question, when he delivered lectures in the different provincial towns in favour of the gradual emancipation of the slaves, as opposed to the plan for giving them immediate freedom; on the same subject he held disputations with the abolitionists, with what success in individual cases is not ascertained, but on the whole he must have given satisfaction to his employers, the West India proprietors, for at the close of his labours he received a vote of thanks from them, accompanied by something more substantial, a splendid service of plate and a public dinner. At one period of his life he seems to have turned his attention to the stage, both as writer and actor; but finding his "occupation gone" in these respects, he took to the public line as a politician, and after his exertions as a lecturer, above alluded to, he got himself returned for the borough of Evesham in 1834, and sat for that town till the dissolution in 1837. In the ensuing election he was again returned, but split upon the "rock ahead" of sailors on the sea of politics—a petition. He was unseated, and, till 1841, England continued to exist as a nation, though deprived of his services as a legislator. At the last general election, however, he was again returned, though then "residing abroad;" and in Parliament he still sits.

Peter Borthwick's oratory is, in matter and manner, of that style of mediocrity to which, if displayed in poetry, men, gods, and columns unite in denying immortality. He is fluent enough, and has a full command of words, but as to ideas and illustrations they are the most perfect commonplace. The rising of Peter is the signal for honourable members to lean back in all the repose of inattention; the reporters at the same moment lay down their pencils, knowing from frequent experience, probably by orders from headquarters, that Peter is not worth the space he would fill if permitted. By no journal is Peter more cavalierly treated in this respect than by the Times. He represents no party, is the advocate of no particular interest, and, as there is nothing to be feared from his opposition, nothing but his single vote to be gained by his support, there is no motive for listening to him; so Peter "suffers not thinking on" accordingly. Much of this arises from the peculiar constitution of the House of Commons; for, in a mixed assembly, we are not at all sure but Peter would have the advantage of many greater names. His enunciation is particularly clear and correct, and, though savouring a little of the elocution master, his delivery of what he has to say is very commendable. It is in the matter of his discourse that Peter fails the most.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXII.

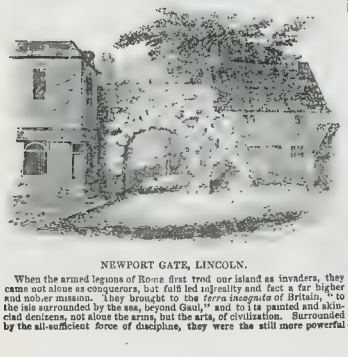
FULHAM CHURCH.

The delightful belt of country around London has before afforded us subjects of illustration, and we this week again select a suburban church, from one of the many which give interest to the banks of the Thames. All Saints, Fulham, is situated at a short distance from the river; its venerable tower of grey stone, 96 feet in height, rising above the houses that intervene between them. There is no authentic account of the date of the building, although there is good reason to suppose that the tower was erected either in the close of the fourteenth or early in the fifteenth century. It contains ten bells, which have been long and deservedly celebrated for their melodious peals. The last important alteration in the interior of the church was effected in 1840, when, at an expense of nearly £2,000, of which sum £1,600 was obtained by voluntary contributions, it was very materially improved. Several large tombs and monuments, which had interfered with the accommodation of the parishioners, were removed into the belfry, where they now form a convenient and handsome monumental chapel, through which the church may be entered from the west. The double pews were converted into single ones. A new and far better position was gained for the desk, the pulpit, and the font. The approach and sight of the communion-table were cleared from the obstruction of several large masses of the old walls. And as the result of all these alterations, together with an enlargement of the area of the building at the north-eastern end, 261 new seats were gained, of which number 172 are free, while many of the remainder were rendered more commodious than before. The Bishop of London, who often preaches here, has since presented to the church a new window of stained glass, which has been placed over the communion-table. The present vicar is the Rev. R. G. Baker.

There are many traditions floating in the neighbourhood, all more or less having reference to Bishop Bonner, who resided here. It is said that dungeons and instruments of torture have been discovered, with traces of subterranean passages under the palace in which he resided.

In the churchyard, which abuts toward the west upon the gardens of Fulham Palace, where the Bishops of London have resided for upwards of twelve centuries, are the tombs of the following prelates of that see, who were all buried here, Bishops Compton, Robinson, Gibson, Sherlock, Hayter, Lowth, and Randolph; and within the church are tablets to the memory of Bishop Henchman, who died in 1675, Bishop Gibson, and the late Bishop Porteus. The churchyard also contains the remains of many other distinguished men, amongst whom we may mention, Enseley, Archbishop of Dublin; Sir Andrew Snape Douglas, commander of the Queen Charlotte on the 4th June 1797; and latest but not least regretted—Theodore Hook, who long resided in the corner house contiguous to the church, as shown in our engraving. His talents are too fresh in the recollection of every reader to render any lengthened reference necessary. As a wit, a novelist, and a political writer, he was known but to be admired; and had Fulham no other claim to interest, here is one sufficient to mark it out.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.



NEWPORT GATE, LINCOLN.

When the armed legions of Rome first trod our island as invaders, they came not alone as conquerors, but full led inReality and fact a far higher and nobler mission. They brought to the terra incognita of Britain, "to the isle surrounded by the sea, beyond Gaul," and to its painted and skin-clad denizens, not alone the arms, but the arts, of civilization. Surrounded by the all-sufficient force of discipline, they were the still more powerful possessors of knowledge, and opposed to the naked bodies of the Britons, the fierce valour of our fore-fathers only availed to render the slaughter of the English warriors more general and complete. But subjugation of the land was yet a greater gain to the conquered than to the conquerors. From sunny Italy they brought the arts of peace. Roads soon stretched across the breadth and along the length of the land, teaching the power of concentrated exertion, and bestowing the advantages of internal traffic and communication. Temples arose, dedicated to at least less sanguinary gods than those which at the bands of Druids required and received human sacrifices; and houses, fortifications, and streets were constructed with such powers of durability, that even to our day may portions here and there be traced out—the existing, tangible records of labours completed full sixteen centuries ago. The very word street carries with its every-day and commonplace signification a kind of undercurrent memory of our long-gone Roman masters, and many of our best roads, for which M'Adam has most of the praise and all the profit, owe their firm foundations to the Roman era. Here and there, too, may the curious trace out a Roman camp. In Strand-lane, London, a narrow and far from cleanly or prudent byway from the Strand to the Thames, is still a very perfect Roman bath—to the north, in Bilton, the self-taught historian of smoky Birmingham, traced out the immense wall built under Roman guidance to arrest the inroads of the then barbarous Scots—and at Lincoln still stands an archway which bad Roman workmen for its founders. Our sketch displays it as it still exists—a circular arch spanning one of the roads out of the ancient city of Lincoln—Lincoln above hill. Close by are the undermined remains of the old castle, capping a bold eminence; and, crossing the street, a few minutes' walk places one under the shadow of the cathedral—certainly one of the finest which England still may boast. Here not long ago was hung Great Tom, a giant bell, whose tones were said to be heard full twenty miles over the surrounding country; it has, however, given place to a modern and less ponderous successor, cast from the metal of the old bell. But the name of the architect of the cathedral, equally with the builder of the arch, has been lost in the current of time, leaving only their works to be their monument. Newport Gate—the name new sounds oddly, as saying much the arch, upon which the force of sixteen hundred winters has been expended in vain, yet still serves to show how a word will sometimes hold in use long after its proper application has passed away—stretches, as it should do, over a Roman road, running almost straight as an arrow for many miles from the city. The arch itself is formed of six and twenty large stones, placed together apparently without mortar, and having no key-stone. The gate is formed externally of similar materials, and had originally two smaller arches on either side the principal entrance. Of these, one is lost; the other, by sinking the road, has been rendered serviceable, and long may it continue so, and remain with Newport, an old and visible memorial of one of those stages through which the varying destinies of our country passed,

Ere was achieved,
Her present proud pre-eminence.

VIEWS IN PARIS.—No. II.

THE PALAIS ROYAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Here is a sketch of the grand edifice constructed by Cardinal Richelieu in 1629, and terminated in ten years, on the site of the Hôtels Mercœur and Rambouillet. Le Mercier was the architect. It was first called the Hôtel Richelieu, then the Palais Cardinal, and finally the present name, the Palais Royal. Richelieu bequeathed it to Louis XIII.; and his widow, Ann of Austria, with her son, Louis XIV., lived in the building. Louis XIV., in 1692, bestowed it as a marriage gift on his nephew, Philip of Orleans, on the union between the latter and Maria Frances of Bourbon. What was done with the edifice by Philippe Egalité is well known. To recruit his exhausted finances he transformed his princely residence into a bazaar, the receptacle for the gambler and the sensualist. The façade in the Rue St Honoré was built after the designs of Moreau, and the architect Louis constructed the wings surrounding the garden. There was formerly a noble saloon in the right wing of the palace, capable of containing more than 3000 persons. Molière's comedians and the Italian company performed there; but it was burnt down in 1763, and a similar fate attended in 1781 the Opera-house built on the site. There are now two theatres in the Palais Royal, one bearing that name in the angle of the Rue Montpensier, and the other (the Théâtre Français) in the Rue Richelieu. The palace front in the Rue St. Honoré has two pavilions with Doric and Ionic columns. There are two courts, a magnificent façade with pavilions with Ionic columns, surmounted by a pediment. The circuitous galleries and arcades are a promenade in all weather. The state apartments were last inhabited by Queen Christina on her arrival from Spain after the forced abdication at Valencia. The immense square on passing the porticoes is very striking, with its large circular basin and its pretty fountain emitting water in all directions. The garden is 700 feet long and 300 broad, and was once a most fashionable promenade. The two parterres, with grass and flowers, with the statues of Apollo and Daus, have still a fairy-like appearance. The exquisite piece of statuary, the woman with the snake coiled round the ankle, stops every spectator. Thanks to Louis Philippe, the gaming-tables are closed for ever, nor are there in the subterranean rooms the sinks of vice formerly witnessed. The most singular of these tenements is now the Café des Aveugles, where a blind band, blind actors and actresses, exhibit their talents, accompanied by a famous drummer called the "Savage," who makes the welkin ring with his battle piece on a series of drums. At this café you only pay for your refreshments, and a motley group is to be seen. A celebrated ventriloquist, called the "Man with the Doll," is now in the corps dramatique. Ladies no longer walk in these garden with powdered hair and trains, and men with bag-wig and sword. The parterres are now generally surrounded by children and nursery-maids, and the foot passengers are those who wish to take the short cut to the Place Carrousel from the Rue Vivienne. The shopkeepers swell the list of bankruptcies, such is the falling off of trade, which may be attributed as much to the cheating propensities of the tradesmen. Rents have lately fallen considerably in the Palais Royal owing to this decay, for splendid shops and magazines start up in every direction in other quarters. Although not in its palmy days, there is enough still to dazzle a provincial in the splendid shops of the Palais Royal. Everything in the world may be obtained there, whether for the epicure, the gourmand, or the virtuoso. Let me recommend you, as the first course, to enter that blacking shop. The polite attendant will take off your hat, or cloak, or coat. He will point gravely to an elevated seat, with a staring red velvet covering. Do not be alarmed. Put your foot on an iron scraper, and there you are, sitting three feet above the level of the floor. Take the newspaper, which will be offered to you, and read. Never mind the two men who will seize each limb. Raise your head and descend. Let the two assistants continue their avocation. Then walk to a little counter and pay twopence. Look at yourself in a mirror. Can you recognise your figure. You entered the salon, bespattered with mud, and your whole toilette in disorder. You walk out a "cavalier sans tâche." Now you are civilised. Your well polished boots, well brushed habiliments entitle you to turn into the Café Foy. "Garçon," you cry, "a glass of absinth." A voice like the deep thunder will roll out "Bon." It is the celebrated rival of Lablache, the waiter whose voice "in the lowest depths is deeper still." You have now an appetite. Where shall we dine? At Very's, at Vefour's, or at the Trois Frères Provençaux? Ah! then you disdain the Parisian bons shops. You scorn to economise, and eat a dinner for one shilling and eightpence—beginning with oysters, a soup, a course of fish, a made dish, a piece de resistance, fish, flesh, or fowl, and often game, and a dessert. I see you recoil at the "cheap and nasty system." You are suspicious as to the animals you may take a slice of. Your laudlady has talked to you seriously of mussing cats, stray bowwows, and of a horse that was seen in the last stage of consumption at the door of Yon's and Richard's. Oh! you are aristocratical. You must enter those fairy saloons, vulgarly called restaurants. You must have marble tables and gilded columns. You must have white and gold, bronze candelabra, and myriads of waiters to anticipate every wish. You would have your iced champagne, your Château Margaux or Laffitte, your Clos Vougeot with the cachet, your Chambertin, your Sauterne, your Sillery, your Chablis with the oysters. You must have the perfection of the cuisine Française, so luxuriant and varied. You must have a purée à la Crecy, then some hors d'œuvres, an anchovy salad or some thou, a filet de bœuf sauté au vin de Madère, a ragoos au vin de Champagne, a perdrix à la puree, a blanquette de veau, a vol au vent. You would take an escalope de saumon aux truffes, a poulet Normand. Never mind what Abernethy has written. You have passed the Rubicon, so fall foul of the entremets; take your dessert, and then sally forth to the Rotonde to enjoy the air and assist digestion, where a chasse café and a petit verre will aid your intent. You are then ripe for Dejazet, if to laugh; or, if you are inclined to slumber, choose a French tragedy at the Théâtre Français.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 3rd January, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The true commencement of our season has at last arrived—the Opera-house Ball has taken place—that ball which has preserved, amongst other ancient habits, that of being considered the official inauguration of the Parisian winter. We accordingly find that our fashionable circles are already in full activity. The English embassy has been the first to open its ample portals; the Sardinian ambassor has followed the example; and on Monday last the ambassadress of Austria has done the honours of her hotel with that exquisite grace and amenity of manner that is habitual to her. Amidst all these gaities, however, we have as yet seen nothing new or very remarkable in the ladies' dresses that has not before been the subject of comment in my former letters. Let me, however, except from this a most delicious novelty which I observed at one of our most fashionable réunions, in the shape of trimming to a ball dress. It was composed of roulleaux of blue, rose-coloured, or bright green marabout feathers going round the bottom of triple flounces of white or rose tulle, and I assure you it was employed with the most brilliant and happy effect But it is not with dress that our élégantes are at the present moment the most taken up. The occurrence of the jour de l'an has turned all thoughts in another direction; and those little presents, those kind remembrances, which sustain and recal friendship, have engrossed the thoughts of every one here. As usual, these presents have a fashion in themselves, as we generally find that some particular article enjoys a predominance in public estimation; and, if we are to believe report, Cashmeres have formed the most general, and perhaps the most acceptable, keepsakes of any that have been offered for the New Year's gift. A fashionable writer in one of our periodicals remarks—"Would you know that which you should offer to the woman you love, reflect for one moment upon that which women love most. It is an old maxim, that small presents cement friendship; but it is still more true, that large gifts do more good. Amongst those things which are always certain to succeed we may class the Cashmere." "The Cashmere is always in the first rank of estimation, if the lady is young, pretty, or if she is coquettish; it is still more acceptable if she is old, ugly, or wise." And it is upon this principle, I suppose, that presents of this sort have been so general. Perhaps the next in female estimation, as it certainly stands in point of fashion, is the bracelet, which, as now made here, is certainly one of the most beautiful and elegant ornaments that can be imagined. The elastic ones are the most in vogue, and they certainly have the great advantage of adapting themselves to all the proportions of the arm on which they are worn, whether high up the arm or otherwise; and they still possess the farther merit that they cannot be lost, inasmuch as they are formed without clasps or other fastenings. I do not know whether in any of my former communications I have mentioned the embroidered velvet mittens, which have lately been so much the fashion, or the white Cashmere reticules, embroidered with gold, or coloured silk, or needlework; if I have not I should now call your attention to them, as they form one of the most coquettish and charming trifles now in vogue. As I have before remarked, the season is at the present moment but just commenced; it is, therefore, hardly possible to say what is the most prevailing fashion; I trust, however, that my next communication will be more satisfactory, and, wishing you the compliments of the new year, I shall now take my leave.

MUSIC.—ORIGINAL PAPER.

ON DRAMATIC MELODY OR RECITATIVE.

According to the Venerable Herodotus, par excellence, the Father of History, Archilochus, who lived in the times of Candaules and Gyges, kings of Lydia, circa the 14th Olympiad or 724 years A.C., was the inventor of recitative or dramatic melody. This is sufficient authority for its high antiquity, although probably its success during the life of the inventor, and its subsequent neglect down to comparatively modern times, were partially attributable to the turn of mind which was unfortunately super-induced by the disappointments and disgraces, for other causes, which the Parian had to encounter. Alluding to this Horace says—

Archilochum proprio rabies armavit Iambo.

The Ancients all concur in their admiration of those who recited well; and perhaps the wonderful effects ascribed to the different modes of the Greek music were chiefly or, it may be, wholly owing to the skilful dramatic melody with which the poetry was accompanied. Indeed as it is agreed on all hands that harmony, in its modern acceptation, was anciently unknown, it is highly feasible to assume that the passionate excitements alluded to were caused by the changes and sudden transitions which the modulative music of the day so readily admitted, and which even now, judiciously used, are the soul of our highest order of composition, sacred recitative.

On the birth of the opera in Italy, the performance simply consisted of a dialogued action or story, delivered in a kind of florid chant, which gradually assumed all the chromatic beauties reflected upon by each new discovery in the art of counterpoint, till it reached a perfection about the commencement of the present century, from the strength and beauty of which it has been since rapidly degenerating. For here it may be said that as the cradle of every art or science in progress of time generally becomes its grave, the Italian stage of the present day exhibits a similar tomb-like appearance, in respect to the vivid and startling truth of the recitative or dramatic melody of the days of some by-gone Maestri. Be it understood that this censure is addressed only to the framers of the modern recitative, to the systematic constructors who, in perhaps a laudable love for melody, have nevertheless erroneously placed continuous melody where they should not, and who thereby lay passion and feeling and their compounds and changes at the mercy of a pretty phrase, which must be repeated a dozen times, because, forsooth! the first time it was heard (unconnected with any meaning) it was deemed pretty! True recitative or dramatic melody is superior to all this; as is evident in the immortal works of Gluck, Handel, our own Purcell, Arne, and a few others. The real fault of the now to be rejected popular recitative is that it is too generic—the same notes will equally well announce a marriage feast or a funeral, a parade to a battle or an invitation to repose! How often do we hear a scena between two lovers, one all fire and jealousy, the other all tenderness and devotion, preposterously and alternately coupling the most contrary feelings (contrary as indicated by the words) with one and the same strain! Nothing can be more at variance with truth or probability. It is an outrage, moreover, upon music's eloquence.

So much for those who wilfully corrupt dramatic melody from the purity of its intention, leaving the means, as many of the maestri of our day most certainly have, of doing better and nobler things. A very few words will suffice for the remaining censure, which is due to those who, through indolence or impertinent reliance upon a fine organ, are careless or indifferent as to how the meaning of their words (either in recitative, or parlante, singing, but more particularly in recitative) is given or conveyed; and who are so ignorant as not to know that the voz humana, when not coupled with sense, if it had the sound "most dulcet of enchantment," would fail to charm and captivate even the most common ears.

And now for the reverse of the picture, the pleasing task of recalling some bygone worthies to the recollection of many who have been delighted by them, and presenting others to their more particular notice, who in the present day are worthy examples of the beauty and power of dramatic melody.

Who is there, recollecting Incledon's "Comfort ye, my people," that will not lament such recitative is now-a-days a rarity? Then, again, the mighty and majestic Bartleman in "Thus saith the Lord," and "Behold, I tell you a mystery,"—the singer appearing almost on a pantry with the inspired penner! Brahams! Deeper, and deeper still," so often cited for its intense judgment and feeling, here claims especial notice for its possession of every requisite to dramatic melody. Let not the scrupulous or over-lastidious be offended by the use of the term dramatic, as applied to sacred subjects; the mysteries of the Passion were originally dramatic: but here no more is intended by the term, than that greater pictorial or descriptive power which the form of that mode of presentation exhibits, ad captandum, the select as well as the profanum vulgus. Is not Milton's "Samson Agonistes" a dramatic poem? And what can, with the exception of its divine prototype, be more full of holy truth, strength, and beauty?

But to recur to the more immediate object or subject of this paper, namely, the invention of od Archilochus, and see what use (the abuse has been already complained of) some few distinguished artistes of the present day; and, we are proud to say, they are still of native growth, however foreign "gardening," as Evelyn would say, "may boast of their culture and improvement." First and foremost among these proudly stands Mrs. Alfred Shaw; a lady physically and mentally endowed with every quality that can constitute a great singer. It is a common thing to hear the Italians say, that a fine voice is ninety-nine parts out of a hundred towards perfection in the vocal art; but this, like the Greek orator's opinion of the all-influential power of action in eloquence, is far from being of so mighty an importance as they would have us believe. There is something far beyond it: judgment, taste, feeling, and clearness of enunciation, have made many a great singer in the absence of physical advantages—witness Pacmerotti, of the last age, and Garcia, the father of Malibran, whose voices, unaided by their exquisite skill, would perhaps have been deemed inharmonious and unpleasant. But how much more must we be delighted with a singer, who, in the possession of one of the finest organs in the world, enchants us with "sound plus ultra than mere melodious utterance—a singer who while she fills the ear with sweet sounds, touches the heart by the deepest pathos, and wraps the judgment also in the most enthusiastic admiration of her exquisite taste and skill! Such a singer is Mrs. Alfred Shaw—such a one she always gave promise to be—and such she has verified herself by her performance of "Artaxerxes." From the opening words, "Dear Artabanes! glad I meet thee here," gladdened and delighted were we throughout every succeeding scene to the final close of the Opera. It would far exceed our limits to enumerate all the passages which she gave with such exquisite fidelity to the various feelings which they required; in fact we should have to print every line allotted to the part of "Artaxerxes" in the libretto, and say as Johnson said of Goldsmith, nihil tetigit non ornavit! But of what nature was her ornament? No impertinent intrusions upon the sacredness of her text, no silly roulades, no ostentatious and misplaced exhibitions of vocal power in unmeaning agility; all was solemn, tender, impassioned, or dejected, as each sentiment she had to utter demanded; in short, her recitative or dramatic melody did ample justice to the finely-conceived melopeia of the composer, who, in this department of his opera has left us a model of grandeur and truth which has not been since surpassed. We have dwelt thus long upon the declamatory parts of Mrs. Shaw's performance because we deem them the lowest portion of her merits, and are happy to see that they have been appreciated so thoroughly by one whom we fearlessly pronounce the greatest singer of her time. The aria parts do not come so immediately under our discussion, but suffice it to say they were as exquisitely given as the grander portions of the opera. The well-known "In infancy" was sung with peculiar tenderness and expression.

Although it is a slight digression from the exclusive subject of this paper, we cannot refrain from speaking in the highest terms of Miss Ranforth's aria, or song part of Mandane, which was admirably executed throughout: but may we venture, with the kindest respect for the undoubted abilities of that amiable young cantatrice, to request her to consider and enunciate her musica parlante with a little more clearness of intonation, and follow in the glorious footsteps of the vindicatrix of English song, who nightly by her side evinces the mighty magic there is in true recitative or dramatic melody!

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Miss Sebilla Novello will make her appearance shortly at Drury-Lane theatre, in an English version of "La Gazza Ladra;" and it is very probable that her sister, Clara, will also appear at the same house, for a limited period in the spring.

It is stated that both Dupper and Staudigl will appear at Covent-Garden in Rossini's opera of "Guillaume Tell."

A new vaudeville is in rehearsal at the Princess's theatre, the libretto by a popular author, and the music by Messrs. E. J. Loder and C. Hodgson Purcell. According to a statement made by Mr. E. F. Rimbault, F.R.S., in the Musical World, Purcell composed nearly forty dramatic pieces, although he died at the early age of thirty seven.

ZINGARELLI.—It is stated that the celebrated hymn, "God save the Emperor," was composed by Zingarelli, and not by Haydn, as has been generally understood. The latter introduced the melody, with variations, in one of his quartets, and thereby had the credit of being the composer of it.

"La Donna del Lago" (English version) is to be brought out at Covent-Garden; the part of Malcolm by Mrs. Alfred Shaw.

"FAITHLESS FANNY."—On Monday the Chamber of the Civil Tribunal was engaged in hearing the suit instituted by Mdlle. Therese Elssler against M. Leon Pillet, the manager of the French Opera, for having made a seizure of furniture at her residence, under the idea that it belonged to her sister, Fanny Elssler, against whom he had obtained a judgment. The plaintiff proved that the property belonged to her alone, and the tribunal, after having heard counsel on both sides, decided that the seizure was illegal, and ordered it to be restored.

LITERATURE.

The commencement of a new year seems to offer to us a fit opportunity of explaining to our readers the principles by which we are resolved to be governed in the future conduct of this department of our journal. Circumstances, into the detail of which it would be needless to enter, have hitherto prevented us from devoting so much attention to the concerns of literature as we could have wished, and as many of our friends no doubt expected. Arrangements have, however, we are happy to announce, been made, by which the desires of our readers will in future be amply supplied, and we have great pleasure in informing all who take an interest in the success of this journal, that we mean henceforth regularly to set apart a considerable portion of our space to criticisms on the literary novelties o the day. We hope thus to open up a fresh and ample source of gratification for that wide circle of the community by whom our exertions in other fields have been so highly appreciated and zealously supported, and in doing so we have the satisfaction of knowing that, by a strict adherence to the plan we have chalked out for ourselves, we shall at the same time be enabled to accomplish a public object, of no small importance, with reference to its bearing on the highest interests of literature, which appears to us to be very inadequately, or rather not at all, performed by any other organ of public opinion at present existing. While some critics are too pedantic, some too splenetic and narrow-minded, some too superficial, some too bigoted to their own views, and most of them too limited in their range, we intend to present in our pages a complete and faithful picture of the literature of the time, of such dimensions as not to fatigue the mind by the inordinate demand on its attention, yet fully sufficient to embrace the whole extent of the subject, and pursue it into all its ramifications. We determine, in short, henceforward to notice every book that is of a character to interest the public generally, or any considerable portion of it. Should the work appear to challenge particular accuracy of analysis, we shall prepare a complete and adequate abstract of its contents, and in all cases we shall furnish a due proportion of those extracts, which are so indispensable to a right judgment that they have been pronounced by one of the most acute of critics—by Hume himself, to be the staple of criticism. We shall be guided as to the length of our comments, and as to the æsthetical opinions we may deem ourselves called upon to pass on the works submitted to our review, solely by a strict and unbiassed regard to the relative importance of the materials from which we prepare the literary banquet of the week. No corner shall be left unexplored of that wide and attractive domain in which we shall expatiate—

"That wild where weeds and flowers promiscuous shoot"—

—that garden which tempts with no "forbidden fruit." We hope, paradoxical as the expectation may appear, to suit the tastes of all the world—to be neither too scholastic for those who wish to combine amusement with instruction, nor too popular for those who are in search of something better than the mere commonplaces of which reviews are too frequently made up. It need hardly be remarked that, from the commanding position which this journal has now attained, and the great influence which our immense and yet select circulation ensures to it, among those classes whose approbation is most to be coveted - results which are the fruit of an expenditure on the part of its proprietors, and of efforts on the part of its managers, never yet surpassed, perhaps not equalled, by any newspaper—a notice from us must be an object of ambition to authors and publishers generally. These are some writers, we are aware, the disgrace, and, so far as their petty influence extends, the bane, of a free press, who are not ashamed to make the expression of their critical opinions an article of traffic—a matter of sale or barter. On this subject we pledge ourselves to a rigid adherence to that line of conduct which, as our readers well know, has always been maintained by us in other departments. Our criticisms shall really be what they profess to be—independent and conscientious. We are the members of no clique, the slaves of no interest, the partisans of no faction, the fanatic defenders of no exclusive system. To do our part in elevating the standard of public morality and taste, to cherish pure and lofty aspirations in the national mind—this is the end we propose to ourselves, and one which we trust to satisfy to the full the cravings of an honourable ambition to co-operate in the mighty task of accelerating the progress of improvement. Unswayed by prejudices, undeterred by menaces, inaccessible to solicitations, we shall form our judgments on mature deliberation, and state them with perfect candour. We shall hold on the even tenor of our way without fear and without favour. We lavish no flattery on the great, we pay no servile homage to mere rank or power, and we shall not hesitate to weigh the conflicting claims of rival authors in an impartial balance, whatever may be the position which individuals may hold in the estimation of the many. Should we find that position to be unwarranted by their intrinsic merits, we will strip the daw of his borrowed plumes—we will shoot the folly as it flies—for we will be no parties to a system of public delusion; but never shall we withhold from well-earned fame its meed of our hearty applause—never shall we condescend to soil our pages by making them the vehicle of personal abuse, nor shall we ever act the part of the cormorant sitting on the tree of knowledge. To refrain in any case from freely canvassing the pretensions of a writer, to neglect diligently to investigate the subject of the book, if it be of a didactic character, or if it be of a lighter kind, to omit to form a careful and well-considered opinion of its real value, would be to abdicate the highest and most honourable functions of a journalist, and to set the seal to our own incompetency or unworthiness. Yet, while we assert our right to make our voice heard with the foremost, and while we shall take care to make our decisions respected, they shall be given with moderation and delicacy. While we place a brand on those authors who dishonour their high calling by pandering to the prejudices of uneducated minds or the vicious tastes of depraved hearts; while we set our faces against cant, impurity, and the cause of mercenious ornaments; while we stigmatise as they deserve sloth, negligence, and stupidity, in the performances of an appointed task which is in every case the result of a man's free choice; while we pluck up by the roots those foul weeds that sometimes attain a rank and unwholesome growth in the hothouse culture of high civilization — we shall be ever ready to appreciate in a kindly and sympathising spirit, those who scrupulously fulfil their duties while they labour to elevate literature imposes on every well regulated mind; we shall award the palm that "imps the wings of song" to commanding powers; we shall render the cordial tribute of our admiration to learned research or laborious industry; we shall draw from their obscurity the modest merits of struggling genius. Such shall be our path. But we will not trench on our readers' patience by any further professions. With the observations we have made we may make our way to that immense multitude in all parts of this great empire whom we now address, in the words of the immortal poet of the Augustan age—

"Together let us beat this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert yield;
The latent tracts, the giddy heights explore,
Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar."

THE MAGAZINES

Claim precedence in the first week of a new month. "Blackwood" is brilliant—a better number we have not seen for many a day. Kit North resumes his old station as king of the magazines—he is monarch of the monthlies, the facile princeps of periodicals. Putting aside the political article, with which we have nothing to do, the contents of the number are various and piquant enough to satisfy the most jaded palate. "Lesurques, or the Victim of Judicial Error," is a very striking tale, the subject of which is well known to those acquainted with the history and biography of post-revolutionary France, and which turns on the uncertainty of evidence respecting personal identity, and the lamentable consequences to which it so frequently leads. It is dramatically put together, and full of interest. The continuation of "Caleb Stukely" is superior, we think, to any of the chapters that have yet appeared. In the present portion the object of the writer seems more particularly to be, to expose the hypocrisy of that class—not a very numerous one, we hope, in this country—who make a trade of religion, and turn the temple of the Most High into an office for money-changers. The article is exceedingly well done, though in parts rather over-coloured. "Caleb Williams" and "Falkland" have evidently been in the writer's mind in some parts of the story, though he is fully entitled to the credit of originality. As we would not willingly offend even the most sensitive of our readers, and as some persons, we know, dislike to see this subject handled in anything like a ludicrous form, we refrain from extracts. Mr. Lander's "Imaginary Conversation between Tasso and Cornelia" exemplifies strongly this writer's singular knowledge of the finer affections of our nature. The paper is free from the objections which have been urged against some parts of his writings, as acrimonious and needlessly egotistical, and will well repay a careful perusal. Next comes an amusing paper from Mr. John Fisher Murray, who, we are happy to see, has commenced a new series of the "World of London." The following passage gives us a good summary of that inexhaustible subject, the follies of the fashionable world and fashionable novels:—

"Let us look at the shelves of a circulating library, groaning beneath that generally despicable class of volumes called fashionable novels—when we take up, only to lay down in disgust, "Notoriety, or Fashionables Unveiled," "Pavilion, or a Month at Brigotun," "Memoirs of a Peeress," "Marriage in High Life." "Aunt's Revenge," "Nephew's Wife," we cannot but infer that it is not the vices or absurdities of what is ignorantly called fashionable life that creates the never-ceasing demand for trash and nonsense, but rather a morbid appetite for vanity and small-talk, a lady's-maid's curiosity of the secrets of her betters, a servile love of imitating what is unworthy imitation, and of following that which is not worth following, solely because it is supposed that these ridiculous caricatures represent the real life of

"The twice ten thousand for whom earth was made."

When we recollect, to our shame, that not only these swarms of trashy volumes, which penetrate even into the back-sitting, and may be seen unfolded in the paper-patched windows of eighteenpenny mantua-makers in the lowest quarters of our metropolis, and a never-failing succession of ravenous readers, but that newspapers—Sunday newspapers, forsooth—devoted to smutty epigrams, low abuse, vile insinuations, and openly indecent allusion to the connections, habits of life, and even personal appearance, of fashionable and would-be-fashionable people, receive a disgraceful and dangerous support, we must come to the conclusion, that in this, as in all other merchandise, the demand creates the supply, and that it is among the lower orders of the middle classes that these caricaturers by profession of the upper, their slanderers and their eulogists, find sympathy and encouragement.

There is a sort of "hero-worship," as Mr. Carlyle would term it, attaching to the most absurd, ridiculous, and even vicious models of people who might be fashionable; a counter-jumper, barber's clerk, medical student, or cadet of gentility, across the memory of that great man whom we are happy to be able to style the late "nation," the pawnbroker in the Haymarket no considers classic ground, and the "Waterford Arms" is a most select wine-bibbing establishment. If he does not break a dozen bells, or wrench three or four brace of knockers in the season, this penny-a-scribbling creature hardly thinks he attains to his fractional proportion of humanity. This may be related, that the great ambition of young scape-graces of fashion to the committal or their diurnal and nocturnal outrages upon property, is the mischievous gratification they derive from the awkward imitation of their betters, and the most effectual method of bringing these aristocratic pranks into disrepute will be to treat them as merely vulgar outrages, and punish the perpetrators accordingly. If, indeed, the small-fry of society would set themselves to imitate all that is worthy imitation in the better sort of their betters, following good examples instead of bad, it would be something to talk of. But since it is not to be expected that they will pursue virtue, piety, good sense, and good breeding for their own sakes, and as these attributes, when they exist in fashionable life—and they do exist among the most fashionable of fashionable people—are in their nature refining and unobtrusive, wine at that is not in good society is pushed into notoriety, for the example of the many, we must take pains to point out crown, the queen in her rabbit-skin robes, the smock-frocked countryman, the top-booted jockey, and all the dramatis personæ of the performance that every moment of every day, during every fair, is for ever "going to begin." You may hardly have observed, sliding quietly through all this tinselled and spangled poverty, a plain carpenter-like man, in a decent suit, who looks as if he had never seen a performance in the whole course of his life, and as if he never cared to see one. This man is, or rather was, the late Mr. Richardson, who died worth thirty thousand pounds, and all the clowns, harlequins, pantaloons, dancing ladies, walking dandies, kings with their crowns, and queens in their rabbit skins, and the real, are poor pinch-belted devils, caricaturing humanity for some twelve or fourteen shillings a week, finding their own paint and frippery. Now, whenever you wish to form a correct idea of the two great classes of fashionable life, call to your remembrance the gentleman who, like the late lamented Mr. Richardson, never performs in any of shows, and the berouged, bedraggled creatures who exhibit on the platform outside for their living. To be sure, there may be a little difference in names. The proprietors of the show may be dukes, and earls, and marquises, and so forth. The mountebanks outside may be called counts, chevaliers, knights of the order of the golden fleece, or of the thimble, or of Malta. But the realities are the same. Fashionable life is a show, truly fashionable people are the proprietors, who are never prominently or ridiculously seen therein; and these several orders of over-dressed, miser-fed, empty-pocketed mountebanks, are the people put on the platform outside, to astonish the eyes and ears of the groundlings.

The "Dream of Lord Nithsdale" is but a feeble poetical essay on the well-known touching and sublime anecdote of Lord Nithsdale's escape from the Tower, by the aid of his wife, in 1716. We cannot say it does justice to the theme. "Two Hours of Mystery" is a story but will afford all who read it a hearty laugh. Great part of the humour consists in the exhibition of the peculiarities of a crochety, pragmatical, but kindly-hearted Scotsman, a kind of animal of the better class not at all unfrequent. The "East and South of Europe" is a review of Lord Londonderry's late book of travels, which contains a good deal of miscellaneous information conveyed in a light and pleasant way. We present our readers with a picture of Vienna and Prince Metternich:—

Vienna has had her share in the general improvement of the Continent. She has become commercial, and her streets exhibit shops with gilding, plate-glass, and showy sign-boards, in place of the very old, very barbarous, and very squalid displays of the last century. War is a rough preacher, but it is evidently the only one for the Continent. The foreigner is as bigoted to his original dinginess and discomfort as the Turk to the Koran. Nothing but fear or force ever changes him. The French invasions were desperate things, but they swept away a prodigious quantity of the cobwebs which grow over the heads of nations which will not use the broom for themselves. Pendaticles and foibles a thousand years old were trampled down by the iron heel of the conscript; and the only glimpses of common sense which have visited three fourths of Europe in our days were let in through chinks made by the French bayonet. The French were the grand improvers of Europe, by living, though only for their own objects. They made high roads for their own troops, and left them to the Germans; they cleared the cities of streets loaded with nuisances of all kinds, and taught the natives to live without the constant dread of pestilence; they compelled, for example, the Portuguese to wash their clothes, and the Spaniards to wash their hands. They proved to the German that his ponderous fortifications were brought from bardments on his cities, and thus induced him to throw down his crumbling walls, fill up his muddy ditches, turn his barren glacis into a public walk, and open his wretched streets to the light and air of heaven. Frankfort, Hamburgh, and a hundred other towns, have put on a new face, and almost begun a new existence. Thus Vienna is now thrown open to its suburbs, and its suburbs are spread into the country.

The first days were given up to dinner at the British ambassador's (Lord Beauvale's), at the Prussian ambassador's, and at Prince Metternich's. Lord Beauvale's was "nearly private. He lives on a second floor, in a fine house, of which, however, the lower part was understood to be still unfurnished. His lordship sees but few people, and as dom gives any grand receptions, his indifferent health being the reason for living privately." However, on this point the marquis has his own conceptions, which he gives with a plainness perfectly characteristic, and very well worth being remembered. "I think," says he, "that an ambassador of England has a monumental court, with eleven thousand pounds per annum! should not live as a private gentleman, nor consult solely his own ease, unmindful of the sovereign he represents. A habit has stolen in among them of shaving a little spare change to augment private fortune when received! Thus is wrong. And when France and Russia, and even Prussia, entertain constantly and very handsomely, new embassies and legations, generally speaking, are consigned to and shut up." However the Lord Beauvale and his class may relish this honesty of opinion, we are satisfied that the British public will perfectly agree with the marquis. A man who receives £11,000 a-year, to show hospitality and exhibit state, ought to do both. But there is another and a much more important point for the nation to consider. Why should eleven thousand pounds a-year be given to any ambassador at Vienna, or at any other court of the earth? Cannot his actual diplomatic functions be amply served for a tenth of the money? Or what is the actual result, but to furnish, in nine instances out of ten, a splendid sinecure to some man of family and fortune, without any, or but slight, reference to his faculties? Or is there any necessity for endowing an embassy with an enormous income of this order, to provide routes, and balls, and a central spot for the crowd of loungers who visit their residences; or to do actual mischief by alluring those idlers to remain absentees from their own country? We see no possible reason why the whole of ambassadorial establishment ought not be cut down to the salaries of fifteen hundred a year. Thus men of business would be employed, instead of the relatives of our cabinets; dinner-giving would not be an essential of diplomacy; the ambassador's house would not be a resort for the ramblers and trifiers who preferred a jelly and lavish life abroad to doing their duty at home; and a sum of much more than a hundred thousand pounds a-year would be saved to the country. A hint to Lord John Russell on national part on the subject. He gives his ambassador a sum on which a private gentleman can live, and no more. He has not the slightest sense of giving state feasts, furnishing large palaces, supplying an Arabian Jonathan with balls and suppers, or astonishing John Bull by the tunnel of his appointments. Yet he is at least as well served as others. His man is a man of business; his embassy is no showy sinecure; his ambassador is no showy sinecurist. The office is so understood step to distinction at home; and the man who exhibits ability here is sure of eminence on his return. We have not found that the American diplomacy is consigned to mean hands, or inefficient, or despised in any country. The relative value of money, too, makes the folly still more extravagant. In Vienna, £11,000 a-year is equal to twice the sum in England. We thus virtually pay £22,000 a-year for Austrian diplomacy. In France about the same proportion exists But in Spain the dollar goes as far as the pound in England. There £10,000 sterling would be equivalent to £40,000 here. Is this waste to go on? We remember a strong and true exposé, made by Sir James Graham, on the subject, a few years ago; and we are convinced that, if he were to take up the topic again, he would render the country a service of remarkable value; and, moreover, that, if he does not, it will be taken up by more strenuous but more dangerous hands. The whole system is one of lavish absurdity

The Russian ambassador's dinner "was of a different description. Perfection in cuisine, wine, and attendance. Sumptuousness in liveries and lights; the company, about thirty, the elite of Vienna."

But the most interesting of those banquets, from the character of the distinguished giver, was Prince Metternich's. The prince was residing at his "Gartlen" (villa), two miles out of town. He had entered it expressly for late years, and it now consisted of three, one for his children, another for his own residence, and a third for his guests. This last was "really a fair edifice, so contrived with reflecting mirrors as to give the idea of being transparent. It was ornamented with rare malachite, porphyry, jasper, and other vases, presents from the sovereigns of Europe, besides statues, and copies of the most celebrated works of Italy." The marquis has seen this eminent person since 1823, and time had played its part with his countenance. The smile was more languid, the eye less illumined, the person more aught than formerly, the hair of a more silvery hue, the general and expressive face more distinctly marked; the erect posture was still maintained, but the gait had become more solemn; and when he rose from his chair he had no longer his wonted elasticity. But this inevitable decline of the exterior seems to have no effect on the "inner man." "In the prince's conversation I found the same talent, the unrivalled esprit. The fluency and elocution, so entirely his own, were as graceful, and the memory was as perfect, as at any former period." This memorark e man is fond of matrimony; this present wife, a daughter of Count Zicky Ferrara, being his third. A son of the second marriage is his heir, and he has by his present princess two boys and a girl. The princess seems to have alarmed her guest by her vivacity; for he describes her in the awful language with which the world speaks of a confirmed bluestocking: "Though not so handsome as her predecessor, she combines a very spirited expression of countenance with a clever conversation, a versatility of genius, and a wit" [illegible] humorous, which makes her somewhat formidable to her acquaintance." We dare say that she is a very showy tigress.

Here, again, is a portrait of Abdul Mchjid, Padishah of the Osmanlics, and Vicar of the Prophet:—

The interview with the Sultan was the last, and was interesting and characteristic. The marquis had naturally expected to find him in the midst of pomp. Instead of all this, on entering a common French carpeted room, he perceived, on an ordinary little French sofa, the sovereign cross-legged, and alone. Two small sofas, half-a-dozen chairs, and several wax-lights, were all the ornaments of this very plain. But the Sultan was diamonded all over, and fully made amends for the plainness of his reception room. As to his person, Abdul Mehjid is a tall sallow youth of nineteen or twenty, with a long visage, but possessing fine eyes and eyebrows, so that, when his face is lighted up, it is agreeable and spirituel.

The "Curse of Glencoe" is a short poem, by B. Simmons, on a well-known anecdote of Colonel Campbell of Glenlyon. It is a decided improvement on some of this writer's late productions; and brings to our mind, although in a different walk, his earliest poems on incidents in the life of Napoleon. There is no bombast in it, and not much mannerism. "Taste and Music in England" is not a bad article, though there is no more in it about music than about any other of the fine arts. So much for "Blackwood."

"Fraser," as it is still called, comes out pretty fairly for the new year. We are glad to perceive a decided improvement in some of this periodical. "Oliver Yorke at Home" contains some capital morceaux of verse, and the "Pleasures and Objects of Literature Indicated" is an unpretending but meritorious paper, although we differ from some of the views contained in it. "Jack Moriarty and his Contemporaries" is an agreeable account of old academical recollections, the scene Trinity College, Dublin, and full of anecdote. Macauley's "Lays of Ancient Rome" is a fair review of the book, written in a spirit not to be complained of, although some of the views here again are more than questionable. We are tempted to place before our readers the following passage, quoted by the Reviewer, from Mr. Macauley's noble ballad of the Armada, which we believe is by no means generally known.

Night sank upon the dusky beach, and on the purple sea:
Such night in England ne'er had been, nor ever shall be.
From Eddystone to Berwick bounds, from Lynn to Milford Bay,
That time of slumber was as bright and busy as the day;
For swift to east, and swift to west, the warning radiance spread;
Hush on St. Michael's Mount it shone it shone on Beachy Head.
Far on the deep the Spaniard saw, along the southern shore,
Cape beyond cape, in endless range, those twinkling points of fire;
The fisher left his skiff to rock on Tamar's glittering waves,—
The rugged miners poured to war from Mendip's sunless caves:
O'er Longleat's towers, o'er Cranborne's oaks, the fiery herald flew;
He roused the shepherds of Stonehenge, the rangers of Beaulieu.
Right sharp and quick the bells all night rang out from Bristol town,
And ere the day three hundred horse had met on Clifton Down:
The sentinel on Whitehall Gate looked forth into the night,
And saw o'erhanging Richmond Hill the streak of blood-red light.
Then bugle's note and cannon's roar the death-like silence broke,
And with one start, and with one cry, the royal city woke.
At once on all her stately gates arose the answering fires;
At once the wild alarum clashed from all her resting spires;
From all the batteries of the Tower pealed loud the voice of fear;
And all the thousand masts of Thames sent back a louder cheer;
And from the farthest wards was heard the rush of hurrying feet,
And the broad streams of flags and pikes dashed down each roaring street;
And broader still became the blaze and louder still the din,
As fast from every village round the horse came pouring in:
And eastward straight, from wild Blackheath, the warlike errand went,
And roused in many an ancient hall the gallant squires of Kent.
Southward, from Surrey's pleasant hills, flew those bright couriers forth;
High on bleak Hampstead's swarthy moor they started for the north;
And on, and on, without a pause, untired they bounded still,
All night from tower to tower they sprang;—they sprang from hill to hill,
Till the proud peak unfurled the flag o'er Darwin's rocky dales,
Till, like volcanoes, flared to heaven the stormy hills of Wales,
Till twelve fair counties saw the blaze on Malvern's lonely height,
Till streamed in crimson on the wind the Wrekin's crest of light,
Till broad and fierce the star came forth on Ely's stately fane,
And tower and hamlet ran in arms o'er all the boundless plain,
Till Belvoir's lordly terrace the sign to Lincoln sent,
And Lincoln sped the message on o'er the wide vale of Trent,
Till Skiddaw saw the fire that burned on Gaunt's embattled pile,
And the red glares on Skiddaw round the burghers of Carlisle.

"The Life of Sir Murray Maxwell" is interesting to those who are fond of naval matters, as who is this country ought not to be! "Berryer" is an article on the well known French politician, who comes in for a full share of the writer's praise. We do not object to this—far from it, but when the writer says that the Berryer [illegible] is "the combined talent, the Mirabeau and the Burkes, the Foxes and Pitts," he asserts what is a mere ridiculous absurdity. One of the very best bits in the magazine, which we with pleasure give increased publicity to, is the following. It will be remembered that a paragraph some time since appeared in the newspapers, stating that a bone in the throat had caused serious annoyance to the Duke of Wellington.

THE DUKE'S LAST VICTORY OVER BONEY-PART.

The brave old Duke! the brave old Duke!
Who thrash'd the Corsican twice and left;
Who never England's cause forsook,
But served her most when most bereft.
Unclouded glory gilds his grey,
Oh! never may its sun be set!

The feast was high in Walmer's Hall,
Beside a Queen's right hand sat he,
When Galina's Genius, black with gall,
Stole, like a fiend, across the sea.
"Hill," cried she, "'s in the Vale of Death,
And now to stop Vitalian's breath"

A savoury steam was on the air
When first she touch'd our English ground;
The Rept'le sniff'd, and basten'd where
She guess'd the hero sought for food.
"Ha! Ventrebleu! vat dat I see?—
There's partridge, too!—toujours perdrix!

Tant mieux, great men have met their fate
By truffes, mushroom, or grape-pippin;
I now can exercise my hate,
If the old warrior's throat I whip in
A beetle bone; why! bless my heart,
Then he is man for Boney-part!"

And, presto! chipping, en artiste,
The spinster of a drumstick, stuck it
In the brave veteran's throat. "How triste
And pale he looks! He kick de bucket.
Ha, ha! soon life sall quit de corps!"
Chuckled the hell-hag. "Vive la Mort!"

Death thank'd her, yet his smile was grim
It put no stature in her;
"Not thus, not thus I send for him,
By nobler means the Duke shall die.
The Conqueror of Napoleon
Belongs to me, and not to you."

"Behold my sceptre! His trade Shall for the nonce be no misnomer."
A doctor came and eas'ly
T' extract the bone; but, stiff as comb, or Harrow, it would not budge an ace,
But, stark, most Waggishly—to place.

Death stood aghast, old Galina grum'd,
Le docte were more serious frown,
"If I can't coax you up, my friend,
Then by the gods you shall go down!"
Into the pharynx another tool sprang,
And the Boney-part went down—Probang!

MORAL EDITORIAL.

Whenever Galina's osseous sprout
Sticks in our Queen's right throat or gown,
If we should fail to fish her out,
Why then, by Jove, we'll kork him down!

"The Dublin University Magazine" is a fair number of average merit, which in this case means considerable merit. It opens with the first number of a new publication by Mr. Lever, the editor, entitled, "The Loiterings of Arthur O'Leary." It bears the stamp of his style, though not equal to some of his former productions. Does not Mr. Lever, like Mr. Dickens, write too much and too fast? "The German Anthology," containing translations from Freiligrath, is not over much to our taste. Freiligrath is a favourite poet of ours, and we do not like to see him murdered. In one word, he is untranslatable, except by some alter ego, an English Freiligrath, a Wraith or double of the Deutsches Bild. The other articles call for no particular remark. There is (pardon us gentle contributors) a want of quotable matter.

"Tait's Magazine" contains little that is remarkable this month. There are some translations from the French court and city poets of the last century fairly executed; but the best article is the notice of Klowitt's "Rural and Domestic Life of Germany."

In the "New Monthly" there are three admirable papers: the "Ellistoniana," which gives us some very amusing anecdotes of the celebrated comedian; Mrs. Trollope's "Barnabys in America;" and "My Grandfather's Dream," a tale full of deep and startling interest, by Sheridan Knowles. Our readers will be amused with the following wicked prank of Elliston:—

During the run of "Rochester" at the Olympic, in the memorable season of 1818, Karles, who performed the character of Charles the Second, and who, like the royal personage he represented, was never at any time averse to the pleasures of the cogged air sufficiently avowed his independence, was unable to make his appearance before the audience. Elliston, who thought on these occasions the least that was said was the soonest mended, took no notice of this little accident to the audience, but quietly went and informed the tenderings of the theatre for the part. The substitution was immediately discovered, for Karles was too popular in the part, and many of the audience had seen the piece too often to suffer there to be deceived so easily, and loud cries for "Karles! Karles!" mingled with hisses, resounded through the theatre. Amongst others, a testy-looking little gentleman, whose rotundity of person and dogged air sufficiently avowed his independence, was one of the most vociferous. The tumult rose to such a degree at length, that Elliston was obliged, malgré lui, to make his appearance. "What is the meaning of the disturbance?" he asked, in an authoritative tone. "Karles! Karles!" was the universal reply, the testy little gentleman's voice raising above the storm. "Karles! Karles! who calls for Karles?" roared Elliston, portentously, at the same time setting an indignant glance full on the testy little gentleman. The audience were abashed, and even the little gentleman felt for a moment rebuked, but, recovering himself with a great effort, he resolutely answered, "I call for Karles!" "And what for?" said Elliston, still keeping his basilisk eye fixed on the little man. "Why did you call for Karles?" There was another pause. The universal gaze was directed with one concentrated focus on the testy gentleman. At was pla n, was considered the champion of the house, he seemed to feel this, for big drops of perspiration stood on his brow. Elliston repeated the question more solemnly. "And why did you call for Karles? I ask for why did you call for Karles?" In the agony of exasperation the baited little man at last mumbled out, "Why, because his name is in the bills!" This was conclusive, was unanswerable; the audience felt it so, and a roar [illegible] rose followed the effort. They evidently thought the little gentleman had got Elliston in a cleft stick, but they had mistaken their man. Not at all disconcerted, Elliston coolly answered, "And a very good reason, too! You have a right to call for Karles—It is the glorious privilege of a British audience; but suppose Karles!" (here his voice became tremulous) "should be at this moment stretched on a bed of illness, with his dangerous wife, and his sickness children clustering around him—the doctor vainly trying to assuage the fever that is parching his lips and firing his brain, a fever aggravated, let me tell you, by the recollection of the duties he must leave unperformed here, though well he knows the generous sympathy and considerate indulgence ever manifested by a liberal public to the calamities of its favourites. Who but a fiend" [illegible] "here he glanced a flash of indignant fire at the little man, who perspired from every pore)—"who but a brute, I say, would call for Karles in this his season of prostration—his hour of suffering!" "Shame! shame! shame!" cried the audience. "Thank heaven!" exclaimed Elliston, with great energy, encouraged by such support, "there is but one such person, and there he sits," pointing to the discomfitted little gentleman. "Turn him out! turn him out!" now resounded from all parts of the house. "But I have paid my money!" sputtered forth the little man, his lately blanched cheeks now becoming red, almost purple with anger. "No money returned!" said Elliston, with a roguish twinkle. "Out with him! turn him out!" Accordingly turned out the little gentleman was, sans cérémonie, in spite of all his protestations, amidst the acclamations of the house. Elliston then complimenting them on their humanity, love of justice, impartiality, and sense of discrimination, retired amidst thunders of applause, leaving the underling to murder the part of the Merry Monarch, to the perfect satisfaction and satisfaction of the audience. Terrasting his name with his cheek, he muttered aside as he passed the prompter, "Haven't I humbugged them nicely? Ah! there's nothing like humbug!"

"Bentley's Miscellany" and "Ainsworth's Magazine" are periodicals of the same class, and pretty much upon a par, this month, as usual, in point of merit. Both will amuse those who only read to be amused, but nothing which hardly exacts the trouble of attention, and hardly leaves an impression on the mind. In "Bentley" Jack Ledbury is as humorous as formerly. The "Figures for the Million" furnish an opportunity of introducing some clever illustrations by Crowquill. Ingoldsby's legend, "The Lay of St. Medard," is full of fun.

Of the "Sporting Review" and "New Sporting Magazine" we must content ourselves with saying that they this month fully maintain the character they have acquired as chroniclers of the doings of the sporting world. They will prove highly interesting to all who take delight in the chase, the race, and the angle; and what Englishman is there of whom it may not be said, as of Horace's Roman—

"Gaudet equis, canibusque?"

In the "Sporting Review" the illustrations are particularly beautiful, especially one by Spalding, a scene of the olden time, representing a huntsman, accompanied by two dogs, taking aim across a ravine at a deer which is bounding on an opposite hill-side, with a fine old park in the distance.

OTHER PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS.

We must not omit a few lines, for this is all we can spare, for the periodical novels, as we may call them, of Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Dickens. "Hector O'Halloran" continues with unabated vigour and spirit. The encounter of the Guerilla party with the French voltigeurs is admirably told, and full of animation.

The first number of "Martin Chuzzlewit," the new work of the famous Boz, is not of a character decided enough to enable us to speak with much confidence as to its future probable success. The opening passage, intended as a satire on the follies of aristocracy, struck us as exceedingly tame, and wanting in that force and path which used to distinguish Boz. Cannot he take the friend's advice given by Blackwood in the last number, and be less in a hurry to multiply the number of his books? We will, however, enable our readers to judge for themselves, by setting before them an extract, merely premising that the passage we have marked, a description of an English landscape in late autumn, is by far the best in the number:—

It was pretty late in the autumn of the year, when the declining sun, struggling through the mist which had obscured it all day, looked brightly down upon the little Wiltshire village, which on its easy journey of the fair old town of Salisbury. Like a sudden flash of memory or spirit kindling up the mind of an old man, it shed a glory upon the scene, in which its departed youth and freshness seemed to have returned. The wet grass, at west in the light; the sandy patches of verdure in the hedges—where a few green twigs yet stood together bravely, resisting to the last the tyranny of dripping winds and sandy frosts—took heart and brightened up; the stones, which had been dull and sullen all day long, broke out into a cheerful smile; the birds began to chirp and twitter on the raised boughs, as though the hope of coming days had relieved their winter hard gone by, and spring had come already. The vane upon the tapering spire of the old church glistened from its lofty station in sympathy with the general gaiety, and from the ivy-shaded windows such gleams of light shone back upon the glow-worm, that it seemed as if the quiet buildings were the boarding place of twenty summers, and all their raddiness and warmth were stored within. Even those tokens of the season which emphatically whisper of the coming winter graced the landscape, and, for the moment, tinged its livelier features with no ill preservative of sadness. The fallen leaves, with which the roads were strewn, gave forth a pleasant fragrance, and rustled up the scene, while at last of distant feet and wheels, created a repose in gentle unison with the light scattering of seed hither and thither by the distant husbandman, as with the noiseless passage of the plough as it turned up the rich brown mould, and wrought a graceful pattern in the stubbled fields. On the motionless branches of some trees autumn berries hung like clusters of coral beads, as though nature would not be behindhand in the contrasts she could show of all the garniture, stood, each the centre of its little heap of bright dyed leaves, watching their slow decay; others again, still wearing theirs, had been partially plucked and crackled up, as though they had been afraid that the stems of some were pale, in ruddy mounds, the apples they had borne that year; while others (hardy evergreens this class) showed somewhat sullen and gloomy in their vigour, as charged by nature with the ark wherein that it is not to her more sensitive and joyous favourites she grants the highest term of life. Still, athwart their darker boughs the sunbeams struck out paths of deeper gold; and the red light, haunting in among their scarlet branches, used them as fons to set its brightness off, and cast the lustre of the dying day. A moment, and its glory was no more. The sun went down beneath the long dark lines of hill and cloud which piled up in the west as a city, wall heaped on wall, and battlement on battlement; the light was all withdrawn; the shining church turned cold and dark; the stream forgot to smile; the birds were silent, and the gloom of winter dwelt on everything.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE TOWER.

We last week took occasion to congratulate our readers upon the fact of the numerous exhibitions of the metropolis having proved so great a source of attraction to the middling and lower classes, and upon the manifest tendency towards mental improvement which such a circumstance implied. One of the consequences of our article has been an expressed desire on the part of many correspondents that we should from time to time furnish cursory descriptive illustrations of the various public places of resort for instruction, amusement, or curiosity; and thus, as it were, present a sort of guide to the exhibitorial lions of London, always welcome in its season, and sometimes a treasure to the holiday folk. We do not quite promise compliance with the full extent of what is desired of us, for we have ever to study the contingencies of news events; but we will, on the present occasion, step a little out of our way to meet the spirit of the suggestion of our friends, by presenting them with a few pictorial sketches of the ancient Tower of London—dashes of its former antiquity and present "form and pressure"—and loose, easy descriptions of those features of notice which are sure to thrust themselves upon the visitor's gaze. We have selected the Tower, too, for another reason—because the present number is in a manner devoted to London—because we are ushering into the world our two magnificent views—garnering the treasured records of a work full of ancient illustration—and climaxing the fame of the subject with a song, celebrating and emblematizing the mighty "City of the World." It is therefore in keeping with the whole character of the week's paper that the Old Tower should be lionized upon its pages; and we have the more pleasure in introducing the following illustrations to our readers. Let us commence with a general view of

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

The Tower of London was anciently a royal palace, occasionally inhabited by the various sovereigns of England, from the Norman conquest to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Fitz-Stephen says it was originally built by Julius Cæsar; but there is no evidence of the truth of this assertion, beyond the circumstances that one of the towers is called Cæsar's Tower, and that coins of the emperors Honorius and Arcadius were discovered on a part of the site, when digging for the foundations of the new Ordnance-office, in 1777.

It is, however, certain that William the Conqueror erected a fortress where the Tower now stands, to overawe the inhabitants of London, on his first gaining possession of the city. About twelve years after, in 1078, the Conqueror erected a larger building, either on the site of the first fortress or near it. This building is that now called the White Tower. In 1092, William Rufus laid the foundation of a castle on the south side of the White Tower, between it and the river, which was finished by his successor, Henry I. Rufus also surrounded this fortress with a stone wall. During the reign of Richard I., in 1190, the Chancellor Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, increased the fortifications, and surrounded the whole with a deep ditch on the outside. In 1240, Henry III. added a stone gate and bulwark, with other buildings, to the west entrance. He repaired and whitened the large square tower built by the Conqueror, on which occasion it probably first took the name of the White Tower; and in the subsequent part of his life he greatly augmented the fortifications, and extended and deepened the great ditch, or moat. Edward I. followed his father's example, and erected some strong outworks towards the west, as a defence to the main entrance. By the command of Charles II., in 1663, the ditch was completely cleansed, the wharfing rebuilt with brick and stone, and sluices made for admitting and retaining the water of the river, as occasion might require. This moat was again cleansed during the popular discontents in George the Third's reign, and the outer walls were repaired at the same time.

The right of the city to Tower Hill was long disputed by the crown. In the reign of Edward IV. some king's officers having erected a gallows and scaffold for an execution on this spot, the citizens remonstrated, and the king disavowed the act by proclamation; since which time, all persons executed on Tower Hill for high treason are previously consigned to the custody of the sheriffs of London, who preside over the awful ceremony there as in all other places within their jurisdiction.

The extent of the Tower, within the walls, is twelve acres and five roods. The exterior circuit of the ditch surrounding it is 3150 feet. On the river side is a broad and handsome wharf, or gravelled terrace, separated by the ditch from the fortress, and mounted with sixty pieces of ordnance, which are fired on the royal birth-days, or in celebration of any remarkable event. From the wharf into the Tower is an entrance by a drawbridge. Near it is a cut connecting the river with the ditch, having a watergate, called Traitors' Gate, state prisoners having been formerly conveyed by this passage from the Tower to Westminster for trial. Over Traitors' Gate is a building containing the water-works that supply the interior with water, and near it is the Bloody Tower, which, in Henry the Eighth's reign, was called the Garden Tower; it did not receive the former appellation till the time of Queen Elizabeth. Whatever sanguinary deed might have led to its obtaining that epithet, there is no real cause for supposing that the ill-fated Edward V. and his brother were smothered in this tower, nor, indeed, that they were ever confined in it.

Within the walls of this fortress are several streets. The principal buildings which it contains are the White Tower, the ancient chapel, the Ordnance-office, the Record-office, the Jewel-office, the Horse Armoury, the grand Store-house, and the Small Armoury, besides the houses belonging to the constables and to other officers, the barracks for the garrison, and two suttling-houses, commonly used by the soldiers.

The principal entrance to the Tower is toward the west. It consists of two gates on the outside of the ditch, a stone bridge built over the ditch, and a gate in the inside. These gates are opened every morning with the following ceremony:—The yeoman porter, with a sergeant and six men, goes to the governor's house for the keys. Having received them, he proceeds to the innermost gate, and, passing that, it is again shut. He then opens the three outermost gates, at each of which the guards rest their firelocks while the keys pass and repass. On his return to the innermost gate he calls to the warders on duty to take King George's keys, when they open the gate, and the keys are placed in the warders' hall. At night the same formality is used in shutting the gates; and as the yeoman porter, with his guard, is returning with the keys to the governor's house, the main-guard, which, with its officers, is under arms, challenges him with "Who comes there?" he answers, "The keys," and the challenger replies, "Pass, keys." The guards, by order, rest their firelocks, and the yeoman porter says, "God save King George," the soldiers all answering, "Amen." The bearer of the keys then proceeds to the governor's house, and there leaves them. After they are deposited with the governor, no person can enter or leave the Tower without the watchword for the night. If any person obtains permission to pass, the yeoman porter attends, and the same ceremony is repeated.

The Tower is governed by its Constable, at present the Duke of Wellington: at coronations and other state ceremonies this officer has the custody of the crown and other regalia. Under him is a lieutenant, deputy-lieutenant, commonly called governor, fort-major, gentleman-porter, yeoman-porter, gentleman-gaoler, four quarter gunners, and forty warders. The warder's uniform is the same as that of the yeomen of the Queen's guards.

The Tower is still used as a state-prison, and, in general, the prisoners are confined in the warders' houses; but, by application to the privy council, they are usually permitted to walk on the inner platform during part of the day, accompanied by a warder.

The fire which took place towards the winter of 1841 destroyed a great portion of the property in the grand armoury, and materially altered the exhibitorial features of the edifices. The armoury, said to have been the largest in Europe, was 345 feet in length, and was formerly used as a storehouse for the artillery train, until the stores were removed to Woolwich. A considerable number of chests filled with arms ready for any emergency were in a portion of the room which was portioned off; and in the other part a variety of arms were arranged in fanciful and elegant devices.

A fearful destruction of property, at once curious and valuable, took place in this department, but one beautiful piece of workmanship was happily preserved. It consisted of the celebrated brass gun taken from Malta by the French, in 1798, and sent, with eight banners which hung over the same, to the French Directory by General Buonaparte, in La Sensible; from which it was recaptured by the Seahorse, Captain Foote. The sword and sash which belonged to the late Duke of York were also saved, through the intrepidity of Captain Davis; who, however, severely cut his hands by dashing them through the plate-glass frame in which the sword and sash were enclosed.

The Lion's Tower, the Spanish Armoury, the Horse Armoury, the Small Armoury, and the Royal Train of Artillery were all objects of peculiar interest to the holiday visitors to this remarkable place. In glancing at its architectural features we must not forget the White Tower and the Chapel.

The White Tower is a large square building, situated near the centre of the fortress: it was built under the superintendence of the celebrated architectural ecclesiastic of the Conqueror's time, Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester. Its walls are of great strength, being from 12 to 13 feet thick at the basement story, and about 10 feet thick upwards. Within it consists of three lofty stories, beneath which are large commodious vaults. In the first story are two grand rooms, one of which is an armoury for the sea service, and contains arms sufficient for ten thousand seamen; and in the other rooms upon this floor, in closets and presses, are abundance of engineers' tools and implements of death. Here likewise is the Volunteer Armoury, which contains arms for 30,000 men, piled in curious order, together with pikes, swords, &c., in immense numbers, arranged in stars and other figures. In the upper room, also, and in the ancient chapel, on the second floor, are kept the various records of the Court of Chancery, consisting of bills, answers, depositions, and other proceedings of that court in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. In a part of the chapel are warrants of Privy Seal from the reign of Edward I. to the year 1483, and many of the reign of Richard III.; and in another part are bills under the signet, from the reign of Richard II. to that of Charles I. inclusive. The models of all newly invented engines of destruction, which have been presented to Government, are likewise preserved in this tower.

TOWER GATE.

THE CHAPEL.

The Chapel, just mentioned, is dedicated to St. John, and is extremely curious for its antiquity. It consists of a body and aisles, separated from each other by an arcade of thirteen plain semicircular arches, which spring from twelve massive columns and two half-columns; the large square-headed capitals are sculptured in the early Norman style. The east end is semicircular, and above the arcade is a second range of substantial plain arches.

One and one only visible evidence of the palatial splendours of the Tower in times past now remains within its walls,—the Regalia. The small tower in which the jewels have been kept for nearly the last two centuries stands at the north-eastern angle of the great area, close by the large pile of building recently destroyed by the fire; during which they were hastily removed to a safer part. The first express mention of the jewels being kept here occurs in the third Henry's reign, when, on that monarch's return from France, he commanded the Bishop of Carlisle to replace them in the Tower as they were before. Seldom, however, did they remain there for any length of time. Once they were pledged by Henry III. to certain merchants of Paris, another time by Edward III. to the merchants of Flanders, and again, soon after the accession of Richard II., to those of London, during which period they were deposited in the hands of the Bishop of London and the Earl of Arundel. Henry VI. also pledged to his rich uncle, Cardinal Beaufort, as security for 7000 marks, an immense quantity of such valuables, the mere enumeration of which occupies above three pages of Mr. Bayley's history; and which were all to become the absolute property of Beaufort, if the borrowed money were not repaid by the feast of Easter, 1440. An inventory of the jewels in the Tower, made by order of James I., and given in the same work, is of still greater length: although Henry VIII., during the Lincolnshire rebellion in 1536, must have somewhat reduced the value and number of the contents; for he then ordered his minister Cromwell to go to the Jewel House and take therefrom as much plate as he thought could possibly be spared, and coin it immediately into money.

Of the present state of the Regalia our space will allow us only to give a short account. There are five crowns, known respectively as St. Edward's (so called from its having been made at Charles II.'s coronation to replace the previous crown, which the Confessor was supposed to have worn), the Crown of State, the Queen's circlet of gold, the Queen's crown, and the Queen's rich crown. Of these the first and the fourth are the proper coronation crowns. The crown of state is remarkable for having three jewels, each of almost inestimable value, a ruby, a pearl, considered the finest in the world, and an emerald seven inches round. The other chief treasures are the Orb, an emblem of universal authority, borrowed from the Roman Emperors, which is held by the monarch during the act of coronation; the Ampula, or Eagle of Gold, containing the anointing oil; the Curtana, or Sword of Mercy, borne naked before the Sovereign during the coronation procession into the Abbey, between the two Swords of Justice, Spiritual and Temporal (what a significant type of ideas now happily fast disappearing from among us is that Spiritual Sword!); St. Edward's Staff, also carried before the Sovereign in the procession—a sceptre of gold four feet seven inches and a half long, with a small foot of steel, and a mound and cross at top; four other sceptres of gold and precious stones, one of which was discovered, in 1814, behind some old wainscoting in the Jewel House; the Queen's Ivory Rod; another short sceptre of ivory and gold, made for James II.'s Queen; Bracelets, or armillæ, worn on the wrists during the coronation; royal spurs, salt-cellar, &c. It was not until the reign of Charles II. that the Regalia was allowed to be publicly exhibited. The office up to that time had been one of honour and emolument; thus, for instance, in the reign of Henry VIII., the great minister, Cromwell, was the "Master and Treasurer of the Jewel House."

We take from Knight's "London" the account of Col. Blood's attempt to steal the Crown from the Jewel House, in 1673. Although often told, the story will still bear repetition, and, indeed, cannot well be omitted from any account of the Tower, however brief.

Thomas Blood was a native of Ireland, and is supposed to have been born in 1628. In his twentieth year he married the daughter of a gentleman of Lancashire; then returned to his native country, and, having served there as lieutenant in the Parliamentary forces, received a grant of land instead of pay, and was by Henry Cromwell placed in the commission of the peace. On the Restoration, the Act of Settlement in Ireland, which affected Blood's fortune, made him at once discontented and desperate. He first signalised himself by his conduct during an insurrection set on foot to surprise Dublin Castle, and seize the Duke of Ormond, the Lord Lieutenant. This insurrection he joined and ultimately became the leader of; but it was discovered on the very eve of execution, and prevented. Blood escaped the fate of his chief associates, the gallows, by concealing himself for a time among the native Irish in the mountains, and ultimately by escaping to Holland, where he is said to have been favourably received by Admiral Ruyter. We next find him engaged with the Covenanters in the rebellion in Scotland, in 1668, when, being once more on the side of the losing party, he saved his life only by similar means. Thenceforward Colonel Blood appears in the light of a mere adventurer, bold and capable enough to do anything his passions might instigate, and prepared to seize Fortune wherever he might find her, without the slightest scruple as to the means. The death of his friends in the insurrection we have mentioned seems to have left on Blood's mind a great thirst for personal vengeance on the Duke of Ormond; whom, accordingly, he actually seized on the night of the 6th December, 1676, tied him on horseback to one of his associates, and, but for the timely aid of the Duke's servant, would have, no doubt, fulfilled his intention of hanging him at Tyburn. The plan failed, but so admirably had it been contrived that Blood remained totally unsuspected as its author, although a reward of one thousand pounds was offered for the discovery of the assassins. He now opened to those same associates an equally daring but much more profitable scheme, had it been successful; which was thus carried out:—Blood one day came to see the Regalia, dressed as a parson, and accompanied by a woman whom he called his wife; the latter, professing to be suddenly taken ill, was invited by the Keeper's wife into the adjoining domestic apartments. Thus an intimacy was formed, which was subsequently so well improved by Blood, that he arranged a match between a nephew of his and the Keeper's daughter, and a day was appointed for the young couple to meet. At the appointed hour came the pretended parson, the pretended nephew, and two others, armed with rapier-blades in their canes, daggers, and pocket-pistols. One of the number made some pretence for staying at the door as a watch, whilst the others passed into the Jewel House, the parson having expressed a desire that the Regalia should be shown to his friends, whilst they were waiting the approach of Mrs. Edwards and her daughter. No sooner was the door closed, than a cloak was thrown over the old man, and a gag forced into his mouth; and, thus secured, they told him their object, signifying he was safe if he submitted. The poor old man, however, faithful to the trust reposed in him, exerted himself to the utmost, in spite of the blows they dealt him, till he was stabbed and became senseless. Blood now slipped the crown under his cloak, another of his associates secreted the orb, and a third was busy filing the sceptre into two parts; when one of those extraordinary coincidences, which a novelist would scarcely dare to use, much less to invent, gave a new turn to the proceedings. The keeper's son, who had been in Flanders, returned at this critical moment. At the door he was met by the accomplice stationed there as sentinel, who asked him with whom he would speak. Young Edwards replied, he belonged to the house, and hurried up stairs, the sentinel, we suppose, not knowing how to prevent the catastrophe he must have feared otherwise than by a warning to his friends. A general flight ensued, amidst which the robbers heard the voice of the keeper once more shouting "Treason! Murder!" which being heard by the young lady, who was waiting anxiously to see her lover, she ran out into the open air, reiterating the cries. The alarm became general, and outstripped the conspirators. A warder first attempted to stop them, but at the discharge of a pistol he fell, without waiting to know if he were hurt, and so they passed his post. At the next, one Sill, a sentinel, not to be outdone in prudence, offered no opposition, and they passed the drawbridge. At St. Catherine's Gate their horses were waiting for them; and as they ran along the Tower wharf they joined in the cry of "Stop the rogues!" and so passed on unsuspected, till Captain Beckman, a brother-in-law of young Edwards, overtook the party. Blood fired, but missed him, and was immediately made prisoner. The crown was found under his cloak, which, prisoner as he was, he would not yield without a struggle, "It was a gallant attempt, however unsuccessful," were the witty and ambitious rascal's first words; "it was for a crown!" Not the least extraordinary part of this altogether extraordinary affair was the subsequent treatment of Colonel Blood. Whether it was that he frightened Charles by his threats of being revenged by his associates, or captivated him by his conjoined audacity and flattery (he had been engaged to kill the King, he said, from among the reeds by the Thames side above Batterses, as he was bathing, but was deterred by an "awe of majesty"), it is difficult to say; the result, however, was, that, instead of being sent to the gallows, he was taken into such especial favour, that application to the throne through his medium became one of the favourite modes with suitors. Blood died in 1680.

RENFREWSHIRE.—APPALLING OCCURRENCE.—It is our painful duty to record one of the most distressing occurrences, both as regards loss of property and loss of life, which has taken place for many years past. On Friday night the 30th ult., about nine o'clock, the embankment or breast of Glanderston Dam, near Barrhead, gave way, and the contents of the reservoir, accumulated at the time to an extraordinary extent by the storm, rushed down the channel of the burn with fearful and irresistible velocity, carrying death and destruction in their train. The first place which suffered from the destruction of the flood was the Print-works of Springfield, occupied by Messrs. Hardie, Stark, and Co., where three entire houses were swept off; two gables of two other houses and the counting-house, or under flat of the master's house, where the water rushed in at the one side making a breach at the other, and carrying with it the whole furniture and other contents. The only human victim was the son of a person named Maxwell, who used to drive the field cart. His father had sent him to hang up his coat to dry at a stove in the works. The latter went into the house and escaped the rush of water, but the boy was carried off. Four persons in one house were saved on the rush of the water by breaking their way through the roof, and so sudden was the rise on them that the watchman, the last of their number, had to be held up by the neck by his companions for some time before he effected his escape. In a few minutes afterwards the house was swept down, and the whole material of the building rendered a mass of floating rubbish. The next place which suffered from the flood was the Print-works of S[illegible] Arthurlie, occupied by Messrs. Hays and Sons, and situated about a quarter of a mile below Springfield. Here the destruction of property was not so great as at Springfield, but the loss of life was far more appalling. Two dwelling-houses, a large out-shed, and a byre, with all they contained, were instantaneously carried away; and we are sorry to relate that, with one of the houses, the entire family of occupants but one child were instantaneously drowned and buried in the ruins. With the exception of the husband the other family shared the same fate as their neighbour. The names of the unfortunate occupants of the first of these houses alluded to were Robert Johnstone and his wife, both aged about 50, one widowed daughter, Henrietta, aged 23, with her child, a girl about four years of age; another daughter, Margaret, aged 15, and a son, Archibald, aged about 17. This family had retired earlier than usual with the intention of rising early on the following morning to pay a visit during the approaching holidays to some relations at Cumbernauld. The inmates of the other house who were drowned were Mrs. M'Intyre, aged about 40, and her child, about four years old. M'Intyre, the husband, was absent at some part of the works at the time, and, with one girl belonging to the deceased family of the Johnstones, he is all that is left of the ten persons occupying the two houses referred to. The bodies of the whole of the sufferers had been found next forenoon but that of Robert Johnstone, but workmen were busily engaged digging up the rubbish for his remains, and for what of the furniture and other articles that could be found. There were two cows in the byre swept off, both which were drowned also. Besides this damage at the print-works, the accumulated current also swept down a portion of the garden-wall at Arthurlie House, the property of Mr. Lowndes. At two farm-steadings a little farther down a good deal of property was likewise carried off, as likewise the bridge at Darnley. During the forenoon a great number of visitors were hurrying to the fatal spot from miles round the neighbourhood, and a deep gloom seemed to pervade the countenance of every one who had been there, or who resided in the vicinity.

BRADFORD.—MISCONDUCT OF A RELIEVING OFFICER.—An account appeared in the papers last week, on the death of a poor woman named Craven, at Bowling, near Bradford, in consequence of the refusal of a relieving officer to allow her a medical attendant during her labour. Our readers will be glad to learn that the board of guardians have promptly marked their sense of his misconduct. At the weekly meeting of the board on Friday week, Mr. John Farrar presiding, Mr. Pollard, the magistrate, brought the case under the notice of the board. As there appeared to have been some very improper neglect on the part of Henry Sutcliffe, the assistant overseer of Bowling, he had thought it his duty to bring the case before the board for investigation that day. Several witnesses having been called and examined, Mr. Pollard addressed the Chairman with much emphasis and warmth of feeling. He said that it was a case of base and gross neglect on the part of an officer of that board, and, that, too after repeated remonstrances for similar misconduct. He would, therefore, move, without further remark, that Henry Sutcliffe be dismissed from his office. Mr. Cowling, guardian for Idle, seconded the motion. An amendment was moved, that Sutcliffe be not dismissed but on the votes being taken, the original motion was carried by a majority of two.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE, Jan. 2.—PRIZES.—The Seatonian.—The subject for this year is, "Faith, Hope, and Charity." The Hulsean.—The trustees have given notice of their intention to give a prize of about £160 for the best dissertation on "The obligation of the Sabbath, with a History of the Institution, and its influence from the earliest times to the present day."

The Hulsean Prize for the last year has been awarded to John Davies, B.A., and Scholar of St. John's College.

The directions contained in the recent charge of the Lord Bishop of London are complied with by a large number of the metropolitan clergy. On Sunday last the Rev. Dr. Spry, rector of St. Marylebone, preached for the first time in his surplice. At Trinity Church, in the same parish, notice was given that in future the recommendations of the Bishop on the subject of preaching would be adopted—that all notices would be read by the clerkman from the reading-desk, instead of by the clerk as heretofore; that the sacrament of baptism would be administered immediately after the second lesson in the afternoon; and that the church would be opened for divine service every morning during the week at ten o'clock, and every afternoon at four

Sir William Ingilby, Bart., has appointed the Rev. H. W. Powell, M.A., rector of Heapham, Lincolnshire, and for nearly fifty years the curate, to the rectory of Ripley, Yorkshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. J. Cracroft. Sir William Ingilby has also appointed the Rev. H. W. Powell, curate of Ashby-cum-Fenby and Newton-le-Wold, to the rectory of Heapham, vacant by the promotion of the Rev. W. Powell.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD COURT.

The commissioners appointed to discharge the gaol of Newgate of the prisoners committed since the last adjournment, at the court on Monday, were present, the Right Hon. Sir Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Sheriffs, several Aldermen, and other of the City authorities. The calendar did not present any remarkable feature. The Recorder, after the grand jury had been sworn, addressed some observations to them in reference to the charges contained in the calendar, and they then retired to their room.

(Before the Recorder.)

Thomas Ridout, 19, a barman, was indicted for stealing the money of Mr. George Gurney, his master. The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The sentence was that he be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for six months.

William Johnson, 36, was indicted for stealing at the city and parish of weight of tea, the property of Messrs. Nicholson and Co. Mr. Clarkson prosecuted; and Mr. Payne defended the prisoner. The prosecutors are the proprietors of the China and East India Wharf, and the prisoner had formerly been in their service, but was discharged a short time back. On the 20th of December he was observed to be loitering about the premises, and a bag of tea was seen to fall from a loop-hole. The prisoner picked up and walked off with. He was pursued, when he threw away the tea and got off, but was afterwards taken at his lodging. The man who was supposed to be the prisoner's accomplice in the robbery had absconded from the employment, and had not since been heard of. The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and he was sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for twelve months.

George Edward Champ, 43, described in the calendar as a clerk, but who it was stated, was formerly a solicitor in extensive practice, was indicted for wilful and corrupt perjury. The alleged perjury imputed to the defendant was, that he made an affidavit of the service of a writ of summons upon a person named Myers, and some evidence was adduced to show that this had not been done. The charge was not, however, at all clearly made out, and the prisoner having received an excellent character from a number of respectable witnesses, the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. The trial occupied the court until nearly eight o'clock.

William Jones, alias Taylor, 26, pleaded Guilty to a charge of uttering a forged order for the delivery of goods, with intent to defraud William Leaf and another. The prisoner was proved to have twice before been convicted of felony, and upon one occasion he underwent an imprisonment of twelve months. The Recorder ordered the prisoner to be transported for seven years

Henry Erstgate, 36, was charged with feloniously uttering a forged £5 Bank of England note, with intent to defraud the governor and company of that corporation. It appeared from the evidence of a young woman, named Anne Wilkaker, that she had been in intimate terms with the prisoner, and, according to her own statement, she was "unfortunately" going to be married to him, and on the 13th of December he gave her a £5 note, for the purpose of taking out a wedding-ring. She had no sooner got the note at a linendraper's, and it was shortly afterwards discovered to be a forgery. The prisoner was apprehended by an inspector of police, and he at first said his name was Miles, and that he lived in Miles-street, but he was called "Miles's boy." He accounted for having possession of the note he gave to the young woman, by stating that he had taken it at a fight in the country. After the prisoner was taken into custody, other forged notes were found, wrapped up in a piece of paper, near the spot where he was secured; and Mr. Freeman, one of the inspectors of notes to the Bank of England, proved that these forged notes were the same plate as the note that was uttered by the prisoner. The prisoner, when called upon for his defence, said that all he had to state was, that he took the note in question at a fight, for a box which he had won, and he knew not where it was "Guilty." The recorder, having told the prisoner that it appeared, by a communication made to him, that he had been sentenced to three years' imprisonment for assaulting a gentleman, with intent to rob him, ordered him to be transported for fourteen years

NEW COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Bullock and Alderman Thomas Johnson.)

Thomas Edwards, a young man, 20, was indicted for stealing a gold watch, a guard, two seals, a watch-chain of the same metal, also a quantity of wearing apparel, and valuable articles of jewellery, the property of Henry Augustus Sullivan, Esq. The prosecutor stated that he was a lieutenant in the 6th Regiment of Foot, now lying at Portsmouth, of which corps the prisoner is a private, but he had been in his service five months before the robbery, when the property was stolen. The greater part of the articles stolen had been traced, and were in court. The prisoner had access to the wardrobe, but the watch and jewellery were under lock and key.—The prisoner said nothing in defence, and he was sentenced to be transported for seven years.

Several cases of petty larceny, devoid of interest, having been disposed of, the court adjourned at five o'clock.

REMOVAL OF CONVICTS.—In consequence of the crowded state of Newgate, the convicts, who were found guilty at the November and December Sessions, were moved at the end of last week, the men to the hulks, and the women to the ship of reception, preparatory to their voyage to the colonies, to which they are sentenced to be banished, excepting those who have been erected as the first inmates of the Model Prison at Pentonville.

Thomas Stewart (formerly a clerk in the house of Sir C. Fraser Nelson and Co., of Cornhill) was indicted for stealing a coat and a variety of other articles, of considerable value, the property of James Brodie Gordon, Esq.

—The prisoner pleaded guilty.—Mr. Bodkin (who appeared for the prosecution) said that this was a very peculiar case, and his lordship had probably read an account of it in the newspapers. Indeed it was impossible he could never read the newspaper accounts of matters that are likely to come here.—Mr. Bodkin said, the fact was that the prisoner and prosecutor were at the Jerusalem Coffee-house, and the prisoner stood there with the coat he took to the house of Mr. Gordon, and obtained not only the coat on his application, but availed himself of the opportunity afforded him of obtaining other property.—Sentenced to seven years' transportation.

Elizabeth Woodham, aged 13, was indicted for stealing five sovereigns, the property of Eliza Smith, in the dwelling-house of Charles East. She was also charged on another indictment with stealing one sovereign, the property of the same lady.—The little culprit pleaded guilty to both the charges.—It turned out on inquiry that the child was an habitual pilferer, and had repeatedly robbed her parents.—The Common Sergeant said he really did not know what to do with the prisoner. After a short conference, his lordship said he would respite the judgment to the next sessions.

MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS.

The quarter session for the present month commenced on Monday, before Mr. Sergeant Adams, chairman, with a bench of magistrates at the Court-house, Clerkenwell-green. The calendar contained the names of forty-seven prisoners, thirty-five of whom were charged with felony. Of the latter, nine were under fourteen years of age, fourteen between the age of fourteen and twenty, and twelve above twenty years of age.

William Pick, aged 20, the party who escaped from the gaol, was then arraigned, and pleaded Guilty.—In answer to the court, Mr. Chesterton, the governor of the House of Correction, stated that the prisoner had been convicted of felony last January, and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment and hard labour. On the 20th of December last he was employed in the open shed, when he got over a paling, seven feet high, into the garden, and from thence got across to the outer wall of the prison. He was unable, from the height of the wall, to descend, and accordingly he made a complete circuit of the prison, and eventually escaped by getting over some houses into the Bagnigge-wells-road. The subsequent conduct of the prisoner's father, in rendering every assistance to the officers of the gaol, had been so good, that the visiting justices had commended his conduct, and expressed a hope that the court would take it into consideration. The learned chairman said the good conduct of the father, accompanied by a recommendation from the visiting justices, led the court to make an exception in the prisoner's favour. The prisoner was then sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment and hard labour, to commence from the expiration of his original sentence

SURREY SESSIONS, JAN. 3.

The General Quarter Sessions for the county commenced to-day at the Court-house, Newington, before Mr. Puckle and an unusually full bench of magistrates, there being upwards of fifty justices present. In the course of the morning Mr. Pritchard, the new high bailiff of Southwark, attended in full court dress, and was formally introduced to the magistrates on his appointment to office. Captain Parrott called attention to the report of the prisons, relative to the insufficient dietary of Guildford prison. In 1837 the noble lord who was the Secretary of State, in his annual return of all diets to be made to the Home Office, and in consequence Mr. Russell, the inspector, visited Guildford. Mr. Taylor at that period wished the dietary to be increased, and he wished to know why this had not been carried into effect. After some conversation, in which Lord Lovelace and Mr. Keuble took part, a motion was carried that a committee be appointed to inquire into the dietary and labour, and to report the same to the court on the next adjournment day.

The number of prisoners did not exceed 24. There was no case of importance.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—MORE POLICE BEINGS.—A man, named George Porter, was brought before Alderman Sir John Pirie, charged under the following remarkable circumstances:—James Franks, City policeman 24 P, stated that a few days ago a man, named King, and his wife, having been held to bail for a violent assault upon a female, in two sureties in the amount of £50 each, the prisoner and another person offered themselves on Saturday last in the justice-room, as security for the appearance of the defendant to answer the assault. It occurred to witness that the prisoner, in swearing he was a housekeeper, and that he resided at a certain number in a street near Bishopsgate, was not telling the truth, and he subsequently ascertained beyond a doubt that his statement was correct, and apprehended the prisoner for having thus given false bail.—Sir John Pirie: Why did you not, when you saw him present himself as one of the bail, state these circumstances?—Policeman: Because I was not quite sure of the fact.—Sir John Pirie: But, as I suspected him strongly, I went to the house of which he said he was the occupier, and found that he had nothing at all to do with it. I then thought it my duty to take him into custody.—Sir John Pirie: But why did you not, when the man was about to be sworn, mention your suspicions and cause him to be questioned on the subject? Why did you let him commit perjury, having such an opportunity as he was not a housekeeper in the place he described?—Policeman: I was not quite sure he was the man I took him for.—Sir John Pirie: This is a very extraordinary transaction upon your part, policeman. What do you say, prisoner at the bar?—The prisoner, in tears, handed in what he said was a written account of what occurred, and solemnly declared that he was not so culpable, although he admitted that he did not occupy the house described, as was the policeman, who knew him well, and desired him to be one of the bail, directing him at the same time what to say and do on the occasion.—Sir John Pirie: Do you swear that you consented to swear the false oath?—Prisoner: I was asked, and now he turns against me.—Sir John Pirie: Did you drink with this man, policeman?—Policeman: I took a pint of beer with him.—Sir John Pirie: Before he was sworn as one of the bail?—Policeman: Yes.—The prisoner: My lord, he had several pots of beer at my expense, and I can prove it; and he knew well I was no housekeeper. He knew all about it.—Policeman: I assure your lordship that I did not know; I only suspected that he perjured himself.—Sir John Pirie: I will not entertain a charge made by a fellow capable of such conduct. It is most improper that such a person should be in the police, and I shall report his conduct to Mr Hodge, the commissioner, who, I am convinced, will take care that the force will not be long disgraced by him. Prisoner, you are discharged; but mind what you are about, and let this case be a warning to you.—Mr. Hobler: Let the prisoner understand that, if a credible prosecutor had appeared, the punishment which would, in all probability, be inflicted for the perjury, would be transportation for seven years

GUILDHALL.—A young man, who stated himself to be a silk-weaver, named George Wentworth, was put to the bar before Sir Peter Laurie, charged with stealing a shawl, value £1 10s., from the door of Mr. Hogg, a draper in Fleet-street.—Mr. Hogg stated that he saw it in the prisoner's hand, and the prisoner told him he had done it on purpose to be sent to prison. This appeared to be the case, for he told the constable that he intended to steal it. He was hungry, for a penny was given to him at the station-house previous to the commission of the offence, and he spent this on bread, which he ate. He was watched by a police-officer in plain clothes, and he could do to seek work, but could not obtain it. According to what he read of the poorhouses they were much worse than the prisons.—Sir Peter Laurie observed that these forged letters were not to the point. He had no doubt but that the poor were treated worse in the unions than the criminals in the gaols. He did not believe that this was the fact; at least he hoped it was not, but that the reports made by police-officers were the result of heated imaginations, whose overcharged descriptions were not read without danger. —The prisoner said he should be glad if Sir Peter would send him to trial. He wished to be sent to any country, so as to get to the sea. He was willing to do any work that would bring him a comfortable maintenance, but he should not find it in this country. The poor were most scandalously scoffed and cuffed by the police officers, according to what he could see; and no man of independent spirit would like to end his days in a workhouse. He would rather hang himself.—The clerk said probably he had not thought of the consequences of his conduct.—The prisoner: I forgot what Cato said upon that subject.—Sir Peter remarked Cato was not a Braintree waver; and Cato was wrong.—The prisoner replied there had been many a one since.—The complainant's wife had received £14, a little value, but the same prejudice had cost a neighbour £14, a vagabond having broken his window that he might be relieved in a gaol rather than a workhouse. This was a state of feeling of very common occurrence, and Sir Peter Laurie said the means taken by the prisoner to be sent out of the country would not attain the end. It might lead to imprisonment, but courts of law would not encourage the circumvention of justice by making the offender with some particular sentence which would not be a punishment. Hundreds more had been tried last year than the year before, and he did not know where the increase would end, if persons in distress would commit felonies to get into gaols, rather than obtain admittance to the workhouse. For his part, he should like to see a very large portion of the criminals sent out of the country every year; for persons who were punished by imprisonment, upon their release, usually returned to their old practices. They lost their character, and could not find employment or countenance in society again.—The prisoner was remanded until the alderman might hear how he would dispose of the case.

Michael Meegan, the shoemaker and shopkeeper in Whitecross-street, was finally examined before Mr Broughton, the sitting magistrate, charged with the murder of Thomas Leary, one of his journeymen. He was defended, as before, by Mr. Hertsgr.—Mr. Vine, the chief clerk, read over the depositions of the numerous witnesses, taken at very great length, and Mr. Broughton told the prisoner that it became his painful duty to commit him for trial for murder.—The prisoner, during the reading of the depositions, addressed policeman Wallis, and declared that his statement of the confession was all false. During all the former transactions he had an air of confidence, and almost indifference, which, however, was evidently only maintained by an effort. When informed that he was committed for murder, he burst into tears, and as he passed from the bar to his cell, it was painful to behold the expression of anguish which his face exhibited. He was in the evening conveyed to Newgate for trial.

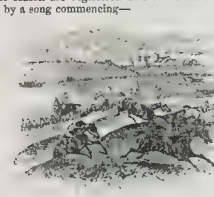
MOORE'S SPORTING ALMANACK for 1843 is, as it should be, a racy affair, the head and front holding forth a dashing view of Attila winning the Derby in 1842; followed by a variety of information as to the winners of last year, and the horses entered for the next. Trotting matches find place also, with a portrait of a celebrated performer in that line; whilst the steeple-chase triumphs of the past season are registered and illustrated. The whole is wound up by a song commencing—



There's nothing like a Derby Day in all the world that I see,
So racy—but you can't deny—so flashy and so spicy;
"Thunder and turf!" wild Paddy roars, but unto the oath's a blunder,
For on the Derby Day you get the turf without the thunder

There is a course—of course there is—where muster all the forces;
With stand, where no one can withstand the running of the horses:
The living people on their sport at once become dead setters,
And there's not a man in all the field but mixes with his betters!

At ev'ry tavern and hotel, and crib of lush and sottery,
There are a large and rumerous few getting up a lottery;
Here they con o'er the list of Moore as merry as O'Shanter;
Their horses can't err if they win the Derby in a canter!

It is, beyond question, the best sheet sporting almanack we have published.

SCOTLAND.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH OF A BRIDEGROOM.—On the evening of Saturday last the celebration of the marriage of a couple at Potento, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, was abruptly put a stop to by the death of the bridegroom, a young man named Robert M'Dougall, servant to Mr. Kidd, a miller. The arrangements for the marriage being completed the Rev. Dr. Mitchell, the clergyman of the parish, arrived at three o'clock, when the marriage ceremony was gone through; and the company assembled were thereafter enjoying themselves, as on similar joyous occasions, when the mirth was suddenly terminated, and their rejoicing turned into mourning by the bridegroom falling back upon his chair and expiring, at nine o'clock, without either uttering or giving a moan.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.—TRIAL OF THE AYRSHIRE COLLIERS.—Willis a Gibson, Robert Wood, James Graham, and Robert Donnachie (all young men), were placed at the bar charged with mobbing and rioting, committed with loaded fire-arms and other weapons, and for the purpose of intimidating workmen, labouring or willing to engage in lawful occupation; as also assault and murder. The case alluded to was that in which a general strike took place among the Ayrshire colliers in autumn last, and that, among others, the colliers and other labourers in the service of John Taylor Gordon, Esq., struck work. After the evidence had been entered into, the Jury returned a verdict finding the charge of murder not proven against any of the prisoners; but unanimously finding Gibson guilty, and, by a majority, Wood and Graham guilty of mobbing, rioting, and assault.

TRIAL OF ALEXANDER M'KENZIE FOR ATTEMPT TO MURDER.—On Saturday the trial of Alexander M'Kenzie, cattle-dealer and farmer, came on for t e assault, with intent to murder James Duff, in the neighbourhood of Dundee. M'Kenzie was charged under the act, George the Fourth, cap. 38, with assault, committed by means of loaded fire-arms, and with intent to kill, in so far as, for the purpose of evading payment of a sum of £1000 sterling, which he was indebted to James Duff, grazier, he did, on the 15th of October, 1842, in or near a wood or plantation called the Gillie Wood, being part of the policy or pleasure grounds of the Earl of Camperdown, in the county of Forfar, into which he had decoyed the said James Duff, wickedly and feloniously attack and assault him with a loaded pistol, and with discharging the same with intent to kill him, whereby he was wounded in the back to the effusion of his blood, and serious injury of his person, and imminent danger of his life. The prisoner, who appeared to be in great distress, pleaded guilty. The Lord Advocate restricted the libel. By the law the crime to which the prisoner had pleaded guilty was undoubtedly capital; and he, along with his learned friends, were consulted, had felt very great difficulty as to the course to be pursued. After due deliberation, however, he had come to the conclusion, that, consistently with his duty, he might in this case restrict the libel to an arbitrary punishment, in the belief that the sentence which the court might award would be sufficient for the vindication of the law. After short addresses from the court, the prisoner was sentenced, by the Lord Justice Clerk, to transportation for the whole period of his natural life. On his removal from the bar, M'Kenzie appeared to be in the deepest anguish.

THE YORKSHIRE BANK.—The fate of the Yorkshire Agricultural and Commercial Bank is at length finally determined. The directors have failed in all their efforts at negociation with other establishments to take their business on terms which would afford their unfortunate shareholders any advantage, and they have therefore no resource left but to wind up their affairs. The London and Westminster Bank, their agents in town, continued to meet all the demandsu ntil the close of business, on Tuesday, but they are enabled to proceed no further, and have consequently discontinued payments for them. Independent of the general security which the London and Westminster Bank holds on the shareholders of the defunct Yorkshire Bank, they have special guarantees which should go considerably beyond covering their advances, although, as usual in all such cases, some of them may not be immediately convertible. No essential loss is, however, for a moment anticipated, nor is the amount of such magnitude as to produce any temporary inconvenience.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE.—On Sunday night last, about eleven o'clock, a fire broke out in the rick-yard of Mr. T. Hine, of Newnham, near Baldock, by which the whole produce of the farm, with the exception of some hay, was entirely consumed, consisting of five wheat ricks, two oat ditto, two barley ditto, and one rick of clover seed. There is no doubt of its being the work of some evil incendiary. The damage is estimated at upwards of £2000. Mr. Hine is insured in the Norwich and Phœnix fire-offices.

YORKSHIRE.—THE FAILURE OF THE YORKSHIRE BANK.—A meeting of the shareholders of the Yorkshire Agricultural and Commercial Bank was held in the Merchants' Hall, York, last week. Mr. Blanchard, the chairman ntered into a long statement. It appeared that the whole of the original capital had been lost, and that the liabilities of the bank amounted to upwards of £170,000. After a very stormy meeting, during which several of the shareholders declared they had embarked the whole of their fortunes in the company, and that they were now ruined, it was resolved that a call of £1 per share, in addition to the two calls of £1 each lately granted, should be made for the purpose of meeting the deficiency, and that the affairs of the company should be wound up as soon as possible.

WINCHESTER.—There was a larger attendance of magistrates at the Quarter Sessions on Tuesday than usual, owing to the election of a successor to Captain Robins, who has resigned the situation of chief constable of the county police, a situation to which a salary of £400 a year is attached. Sir W. Heathcote filled the chair; and, among the magistrates present, were noticed the Earl of Malmesbury, Lord Calthorpe, Lord H. Cholmondeley, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Right Hon. W. S. Bourne, Hon. G. G. Calthorpe, Hon. W. H. A. A'Court Holmes, M.P., &c. Sir C. Hulse nominated, and Mr. Cavendish Compton, M.P., seconded the nomination of Captain Morant; and Mr. Hughes Hughes nominated, and Admiral Sir John Ommaney, K.C.B., seconded the nomination of Captain W. C. Harris; and at the close of the poll (three of the magistrates present having declined to vote) the numbers were—For Capt. Harris, 64; for Capt. Morant, 57; whereupon the chairman declared the election to have fallen on Capt. Harris, and delivered to the gallant officer his baton of office. The four members for the county voted for Capt. Morant.

LORD ROLLE'S WILL.—The following we believe to be the exact testamentary disposition of the deceased's property:—The whole estate, real and personal, is given to the second son of Charles Rodolphus Lord Clinton, with remainder to the third son of Lord Clinton; remainder to the eldest son of Lord Clinton; remainder to the second son of Earl Fowlett. The landed estate is encumbered with an annuity of £10,000, to Lady Rolle, widow of the deceased, who has, besides, Bicton, one of the country seats, for life, and the house in Upper Grosvenor-street absolutely. It is worthy of notice that the only male relatives of the deceased are not mentioned in the will.

NORTH SHIELDS.—SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—Whilst the workmen were employed in excavating a new road leading from the New Quay, North Shields, northwards towards Bedford-street, a heavy fall of earth most unexpectedly fell down from the face of the cutting, and buried five of the workmen underneath, who were loading the carts. The unfortunate men were soon dug out, when three of them were found to be quite dead, and the two others are seriously bruised; but hopes are entertained of their recovery. From inquiries which we have made we learn that no blame can be attached to any one but the contractor; and the foreman of the work examined the place a very short time previously to the accident, and it then appeared quite safe. The latter was himself in the midst of the men at the time of the accident, and narrowly escaped with his life.

THE MARKETS

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since this day se'nnight the arrivals of wheat of home produce up to our market have been on a very limited scale, and, comparatively speaking, of middling quality. On each market day the stands at Mark-lane have been scantily filled with samples, owing to which, and the increased attendance of both London and country buyers, the demand for all descriptions has been extremely active, at improvement on previous quotations of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and good clearances have been readily effected. In free foreign wheat a fair amount of business has been transacted, at a rise of fully 1s per quarter; but bonded sorts have commanded little attention, yet they are noted quite as dear. Superfine barley has sold freely, at 1s per quarter more money, and the value of grinding and distilling sorts has been well supported. The oat trade has ruled tolerably steady, but in beans, peas, and flour next to nothing has been passing.

ARRIVALS.—English. Wheat, 3870; barley, 5910; oats, 10,140; malt, 5680 quarters; flour, 5230 sacks. Irish: barley, 500; and oats, 10,510 quarters. English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 54s; ditto white, 54s to 58s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting do., 30s to 32s; chevalier, 29s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 24s to 26s; potato do., 22s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 32s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 18s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 23s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 23s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have a few parcels of cloverseed offering at 30s to 50s per cwt. Canary is still very duh, and the value of all other kinds of seeds remains unaltered.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; English, ditto, 44s to 46s; hempseed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 32l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 1d; barley, 21s 3d; Oats, 17s 2d; rye, 28s 1d; beans, 28s 3d; peas, 31s 0d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 9d; Barley, 27s 0d; Oats, 17s 5d; Rye, 29s 3d; Beans, 29s 11d; Peas, 32s 3d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 9s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 9s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Bread. The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—Since our last the deliveries of tea have been extensive, and we have a slight improvement in the demand, at full prices, low common congou being held at 1s 3d per lb. cash. For public sale on Tuesday next 15,000 packages are declared.

Sugar.—For all descriptions of sugar we have had an improved demand, and prices are fully maintained

Coffee.—The demand to-day for coffee is firm, but we can notice no advance in figures.

Spices.—We have had very little doing in spices, and the rates are rather drooping.

Cotton.—Little business has been done in this article, though prices remain firm.

Tallow.—This market is flat, and P. Y. C. on the spot is selling at 47s 9d per cwt.

Oils.—There is rather an improved inquiry for sperm; but other kinds of oils are very dull.

Provisions.—The cold weather has produced more demand for Irish butter, and a fair business has been done at firm rates—90s to 93s having been paid for fine. Dutch sells well; the best at 110s per cwt. The bacon trade is flat, and there are few sellers at 35s to 40s, according to quality. Lard dull in demand, and cheaper. Hams are dull, and rather lower.

Coals.—Adamson, 16s 6d; Hetton, 17s; Wylam, 17s; Tees, 21s; Hartley, 16s 6d; Clinnell, 16s 6d; Cassop, 20s 9d; Killingworth, 18s 6d; Newmarch, 17s 9d; Stewarts', 21s; Lambton, 21s; Northumberland, 17s 3d. Ships arrived, 56.

Wool.—This market remains steady, at full rates of currency.

Potatoes.—Though the inquiry for the best potatoes is steady, prices remain unaltered.

Smithfield.—Our market has been well supplied with stock this week, which has moved off slowly at the annexed rates:—Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We have had a fair demand for meat in these markets, and prices have had an upward tendency. Beef, from 3s 2d to 3s 10d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

During this week a considerable demand has existed for British grown wheats, and an advance of from 3s. to 4s. per quarter from the lowest prices has been obtained. There are strong grounds to anticipate that this improvement must yet progress, because the stock of foreign wheat, duty paid, latterly in granary, has been very materially reduced in quantity, and it is now well ascertained that the last wheat crop cannot be called an abundant one, although, in quality, it is superior to the growth of the last three years. Manufacturers for the consumption at home calculate very confidently on an improved demand for fine and fancy goods during the ensuing season, and are already making those arrangements which may become necessary to furnish the expected increased consumption when the time arrives for favourable sales.

During this week we have had mails from the West Indies, and, although the letters are not of very late dates, still their contents are generally interesting and satisfactory. The free immigrants who had arrived at Jamaica and in the Bermudas have proved themselves to be good workmen, and it is probable that Africa will now no longer be without resources with as many good labourers as may be required. The season had likewise been favourable, and a large crop is said to be coming on. The sales of British goods were also going rapidly into consumption, although, except these above-named islands, of course, enabled them to increase the consumption both in quantity and in quality.

From the manufacturing districts the information received in the course of this week has been again most satisfactory indeed, more so, than could have reasonably been expected, considering the influence of holidays now. For some weeks the demand has been active, orders have been large, and cheerfulness and hope, as to the future, have, on all occasions, the last advance in prices has been fairly maintained. The servants and labourers in all departments of the manufacture are now, once more, in general employment at raised wages more than equal to the maximum of living, and there is no immediate chance of their present situation no longer being satisfactory, or subject to change. Large shipments are to be made to our East India possessions, and to our colonies, as the great southern one, during the coming season, for the supply of the usual autumn demand, and in addition to these an increased one was born in prospect, and British goods remaining for sale were not limited. Nearly a week has now been spent in active work, in Scotland, and in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the result of the observations which, personally, I have made in the way of British woven goods, are pleasing for these goods continue to command attention, and many articles of Chinese production, which only a few short years since, interfered with our agricultural produce as well as the industries of our people, are being rapidly swept at home. In labour prices, likewise, generally over the country, prosperous are also evident, from both the revival in this vital department of productive employment for the industrious classes within the United Kingdom. On the whole, should the present favourable appearances of a revival of agricultural prosperity be eventually confirmed, no former year ever beamed more favourably on the inhabitants of the British empire than the one of which this is the first week.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT OUR LAST NUMBER.

There are several kinds of egotism. We rejoice in one—it is the egotism which derives its nutriment from the general approval of society—that best pleasure of vanity which springs out of the bosom of a flattery that is not unjust. We find ourselves lauded for "duty"—for the pleasant duty of doing good—for the endeavour to banish acrimony and injustice from the columns of a newspaper, and to substitute in their stead a cordial spirit of cheerful Christian feeling, of sound unprejudiced opinion, of pure humane philosophy, deriving its moral from the every-day action of the great drama of life. We cannot feel any other sentiment than that of joy at being told, on all hands, that we have succeeded in our aim—that so far as we have gone we have achieved the triumph of virtue and impartiality. It is a proud reflection for us that in this upright course we have ploughed our way through the grand difficulty of envy, and put down even the jealousies which so ordinarily attend an unexampled success. We have drawn forth contemporary testimonials in our favour, which, coming from the authoritative and influential morning journals of the day, demand an equivalent of respect in acknowledgment, and strongly exhibit the conviction entertained by the chief arbiters of public taste, that we have opened a new path to civilization, improvement, and knowledge; in a word, that we are making pictures lore, and spreading a cloth for the fair feast of wisdom, by making illustration, as it were, the careful housekeeper of the pen! We are old birds. We have long haunted the fields and hedge-rows of literature, and lain our feathers amid the stubble of the press; but we are not (nor do we believe are any of our most prosperous editorial brethren) old enough to remember a precedent for so remarkable an exception to the rule of press silence about contemporaries as has been made in the behalf of the Illustrated London News. Weekly newspapers have been before quoted according to their intelligence by the daily press, but when were they criticised? When had they ever bestowed upon them the dignity of special selection and review? Our journal in this respect is proudly singular. Already the Times, the first journal in the empire, and carefully chary of its patronage, has noticed us twice in terms of strong encouragement. The Herald, a paper which has done as much to uphold family honour and the finer principles of Christian humanity as any other daily organ of the age, has seized upon the tone in which our journal has been conducted as indicative of a better order of newspaper literature for the uninstructed than has ever hitherto appeared. The Post, the organ of aristocracy and fashion, has signalised us as the fit, elegant, and refined companion of the drawing-room;—and the Advertiser, the accredited agent of a large, respectable, and populous class of the community, has recommended us to the busy, bustling, trading, travelling world as a sort of hotel and tavern domiciliatory mirror of the news and spirit of the times. Our Colosseum print, or rather our duplex engraving of London in 1842, has reinvoked the kindness of our contemporaries, and gratitude demands that we should at once record the opinions expressed upon the appearance of that publication.

London in 1842.—A splendid print under this title has been published by the proprietors of the Illustrated News, representing a bird's-eye view of the great metropolis from the summit of the Duke of York's column. The pictorial effect is really very fine; the perspective is well managed; the accuracy with which individual objects of interest are represented is as admirable as the beauty and the boldness of the general picture; while the nicety of execution, along with the softened blending of lights and shades, reflects high honour on the artist, and shows the extent to which wood-engraving has been perfected in this country. There could not be a more appropriate and acceptable present (in so portable a form) for country friends; and we can imagine the interest with which the "young ones," to whom London is "but as a dream," would gaze upon this fine picture of its glories.

(From the MORNING POST, of Thursday, Jan. 12.)

Illustrated London News.—The proprietors of this ably-conducted paper have just presented to their subscribers a tableau mouvre view of the west end of London and the parts adjacent, which for neatness of finish and execution surpasses anything of the kind that we ever inspected. It is said that M. Claudet, with his apparatus, perched himself, like Amadeus, upon the top of the Duke of York's column for the purpose of taking the view. Whoever be the artist, he has given an accurate representation of London as it is at the present moment, and all the steeples, including the scaffolding round the Nelson monument, are handed down to posterity with wonderful precision; and in addition to the usual mass of valuable information and beautiful illustrations which adorn this journal, a compendious index is appended, which will render the volume when bound up invaluable as a book of reference for the events of the past year. The first volume is now published entire, and we most cordially congratulate the proprietors on the unprecedented success with which their endeavours to improve the public taste and morals have been attended. The extraordinary increase in their circulation must also necessarily tend to deprecate that of the infamous trashy prints which have long been a disgrace to the weekly press of this country, and which we hope to see superseded by the healthful influence of the Illustrated London News.

(From the MORNING HERALD, of Wednesday, Jan. 11.)

It is with much satisfaction that we have observed the rapid progress which has been made in general estimation within the last few months by a publication of an entirely novel and decidedly meritorious character. This publication is the Illustrated London News, a weekly newspaper, which not only bids fair altogether to supersede many of its less worthy rivals, but has already made considerable progress towards effecting that desirable object. The weekly prints to which we allude have long enjoyed a factitious reputation, founded ostensibly upon their assuming to address themselves more particularly to the wants and wishes of the people at large, but, in reality, working for the abasement of all moral feeling, subverting all religious principle, and widely extending opinions of the most disloyal and pernicious character. These publications had unhappily absorbed a large number of that class of readers who have only the opportunity of seeing a newspaper once a week, and to their evil influence may be attributed much of the discontent which has from time to time manifested itself among the working people.

The scope and tendency of the Illustrated London News are entirely the reverse of that which we have condemned; its purpose is to improve at the same time both the mind and the taste of the people; to elevate the moral tone of the weekly newspaper readers, and combine amusement with instruction. This end has been fully attained by the judicious management of those who conduct the Illustrated London News; it presents at once an epitome of all the intelligence which the labours of the daily press have accumulated, and adds to that information original articles of abiding merit, connected with the most important or interesting topics of the day,—the whole illustrated in the fullest and most satisfactory manner by the ablest artists. The first volume of this work now lies before us, richly embellished with the most attractive engravings, and replete with the most compendious information. Its cheapness would excite our wonder at the possibility of giving so much for so small a sum (the price being only sixpence), were we not assured, from good authority, that its circulation already nearly equals that of the most prominent amongst the Sunday papers. This is a natural result; for the attraction being as much for the eye as the understanding, the weekly purchaser will inevitably be led towards that which gives him pleasure to look at as well as to read. It is not to be inferred that the London Illustrated News has created a new class of readers,—such a result is only the work of much time; but it has done even better, it has drawn within its vortex numbers of those who formerly read the only publications accessible to them, which added nothing to their information but a knowledge of vice or infidelity. At the same time we are gratified to learn that the list of subscribers comprehends a large number of the well-informed and highly-educated.

The most recent achievement of the London Illustrated News is the publication, in one enormous sheet, of a superb view of the metropolis, taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures—one a north and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest is well brought out, and the most conspicuous features of the great city are at once discovered. To publish a plate like this was a great undertaking, but it has been as successfully accomplished as it was boldly conceived.

To ensure the complete success of the London Illustrated News, it has only to continue steadily in the career which it has so well begun.

(From the MORNING ADVERTISER.)

London in 1842.—This is the title of a magnificent plate which has been presented by the proprietors of the Illustrated London News to their subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It is certainly the most extraordinary example of pictorial illustration which has ever yet been offered by a newspaper, and giving convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process, applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood engraving. The extent of the prospect, comprising the whole length and width of the imperial City, from two points of view, the breadth of the masses into which the artist throws his subject, the richness of the groups, the skilful contrasts of light and shade, all combine to make this the most

VIEW OF THE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTION.

OPENING OF THE LIVERPOOL COLLEGIATE INSTITUTION.

The Liverpool Collegiate Institution was opened last week in a manner worthy of the occasion, and under circumstances which cannot fail to impart the highest gratification to all in this country who value the blessings of sound Scriptural education, combined with useful learning. The building, which is situated in Shaw-street, is of immense extent. The foundation-stone was laid about two years since by horible "Picture of London" which has ever been produced. It is, in short, the sole means by which foreigners and country readers can form to themselves any idea of the grandeur of the British metropolis, which, we may be pardoned for reminding our readers at this holiday season, is known to be paved with gold. The present number of the Illustrated News is accompanied by a supplement of equal size. Both are replete with interesting letter-press, illustrated by wood cuts of various excellence, and well, as must present a rich banquet to the lovers of pictorial art, the taste for which we rejoice to remark daily acquires greater strength and extension throughout the country.

Such are the opinions expressed by the daily journals with reference to the last number of the Illustrated London News. We have now a few words to say about it ourselves.

It is probable that few scenes of domestic excitement ever exceeded that of its publication. The numerous officials in our establishment—exceeding in number those of any other in the metropolis in the publication department—became exhausted and powerless with the excess of business; and, for a brief moment, the office was necessarily closed. When re-opened, the multitude of newsmen rushed in, and then every temptation was held out to us to break faith with our subscribers. The men stood over the railings of our spacious folding-office with clusters of notes, and such exclamations as "Who'll let me pay for a fifty quires?"—"A hundred quires here, and the money!"—"Let me leave the cash, and get the prints on Monday!"—"You won't refuse to sell, will you?"—"Money's scarce, you'd better take it," &c., greeted our remonout publishers on all sides; but we beg earnestly to impress upon our subscribers that we did refuse—that we took not one shilling, and delivered not one copy of the print beyond the ticket-number which we had previously arranged with the newsmen that we would bind ourselves to supply. We could have sold two hundred thousand papers, and we refused to let the prints that accompanied them exceed our subscriptions. Still, we have had complaints; and these we beg at once, in the fullest independence of spirit, to retort upon the newsmen. They were bound to give to every subscriber his print, and to no others; they had them, and if they otherwise disposed of them, they cheated their customers and they cheated us. This we wish to be emphatically understood.

The result of the entire publication has been, however, a great triumph to the newspaper: we have at least a thousand letters of thanks and congratulation—we have entered a new year with spirit and enterprise—we have won the best approbation of the most powerful organs of public opinion—and, what makes as pleasing and satisfactory a reflection as any we have indulged in, we have anxiously, honestly, and conscientiously kept our word.

Lord Stanley; and for beauty of form and elegance of design the structure reflects the highest credit on all who have taken part in its erection. The fact is, moreover, worthy of record, that the munificent sum of £24,000 was liberally subscribed towards the erection by the inhabitants from their private sources; and that although £4000 were granted by the late Radical corporation towards the founding of the Mechanics' Institution, the Collegiate Institution has been brought to its completion without any public grant whatever.

The course of religious education which will be pursued in this admirable institution may be briefly comprised in this, that the exercises of the schools will be commenced and terminated with prayer, at which the attendance of every pupil will be required, and that the reading of expositions of the holy Scriptures will form a portion of the daily business of the schools.

The spacious lecture-hall of the institution was densely crowded.

On the platform were seated large numbers of the clergy and gentry of the town. About half-past one o'clock the Mayor entered, accompanied by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, the Rev. the Rector of the parish, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., Sir Howard Douglas, M.P., Mr. J. W. Patten, M.P., and many other of the distinguished among the clergy and laity.

It was intended that the inaugural address should be delivered by Lord Stanley, the patron of the institution; but, in consequence of his lordship having been obliged to attend upon her Majesty at Windsor, that duty devolved upon the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, who discharged it in such a manner as to command the unqualified approbation of all present.

The proceedings of the day were commenced by the performance of several pieces of sacred music, and the offering up of an appropriate prayer by the junior Rector.

The Rev. Mr. Brookes then delivered a brief introductory address.

The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone then rose, and was received with unbounded applause. When silence had in some degree been restored, he proceeded to say, that at the opening of an institution intended mainly for the benefit of the middle classes of society, he, who was himself sprung from that middle class—he, who with his family, still claimed to belong to that middle class—felt that he might be expected and presumed to entertain some sympathy with the principal object of this beneficent institution; that he was there desire to open and to smooth the way for those who might be inclined to enter in the path of honourable advancement, and that upon this account, if not upon personal qualifications, he might with sincerity and earnestness address them on the question which had assembled them. (Hear.) He thanked God they were here removed from the arena of party discussion; but it was admitted on all hands that we had arrived at a state in the progress of society in which we must give a broad basis to public institutions, in which we must feel interest in them, and in which we must challenge for them the approbation and support of the mass of the intelligent community. But how were these institutions supported? The church did not stand upon the footing of superstition—the monarchy and the peerage were not supported by violence. True it was, indeed, that prescription had a weight and value in civil affairs—true it was that Englishmen were distinguished among the nations of the earth, not only by an indomitable energy, but likewise by a dislike of unnecessary change, and a reverence for the traditions of their forefathers. All these things had hitherto been proved, and he trusted we had not yet arrived at the period when that could be denied to society; but it was also true that the constitution of this country called upon the people for their free and intelligent support. (Hear.) We must know how important it was, by the communication of knowledge and the formation of right habits of mind, to secure a warm attachment—an intelligent assent on the part of the population—to the institutions which we loved and which we revered; and it was, therefore, acting on those convictions that, so far from desiring to see education restricted in the country, he trusted that every year that passed over our heads might, on the contrary, witness its freer and freer diffusion on sound and true principles. (Great cheers.) He begged to be allowed to say that, considering this institution as intended for the benefit of the middle classes of society, he could not help feeling, as the audience had, indeed, already been told, that those who had conceived the idea of such a design had applied themselves to the supply of a deficiency which was great and glaring among the people of Liverpool. There was this difference between the members of the middle and the members of the lower class. The members of the lower class in many instances exhibited a comparative indifference on the subject of the reception of education. To them the duty was not immediate and palpable. They pursued their daily purposes—he did not say equally well without education, but still education was not to them a necessary in order to enable them to labour with their hands; but when we looked at the middle classes, to which class the pupils were likely to carry on the commercial concerns of great towns, then we saw than an education there must be. (Hear, hear.) They must have it either good or bad, and it was for us to consider whether a good education was to be provided for them, or whether they should be left to the temptations of that more flattering system of education which seemed, indeed, to provide equally well for their purposes, but which was deficient in the essential requisites of the truly valuable. Did we not live in an age when everything was made subject to question and doubt—when men's minds were stimulated into an activity which was salutary, no doubt, in many respects, but which required the guide both of sound Scriptural principles and enlarged habits of thought? (Great cheers.) It was a critical period in the history of nations when men began to question themselves with respect to things about them—when doubts were suggested before the means of solving those doubts were at hand—when there was a great disposition to question the merits of this and that institution, and when there was not the same power to examine the merits on which such institutions might depend. This was eminently an age of inquiry, and, in that sense, of scepticism. Did we hold it desirable to check that spirit of inquiry? No such thing. It was a certain state which belonged to our condition and circumstances; it came upon us as a dispensation of Providence that everything should be subjected to discussion. Let that discussion be made; but let it be made wisely and fully felt as approaches to a right understanding, not under delay or haste—not under prejudices and party feelings, but with all those aids and appliances of sound knowledge and of right habits, and, above all, with all those reliances on a higher power, which Christianity alone could give. With those advantages he could meet discussion, and we need not fear for its issue. (Cheers.) What was it they were then assembled to celebrate? Not the magnificent scale of the institution, not the beauty of its architecture, not even the high authority under which they met. But it was the deep conviction in the mind of every one present that the existence of the institution was a living and a permanent testimony to a great indestructible principle—namely, to the principle that education, if it was to be effectual, if it was to be valuable, if it was to deserve its name, must be a religious education—(cheers)—and that in order to deserve the name of a religious education it must be founded, not upon those vague generalities which were supposed to be common to all men, or, at least, to all men who assumed the name of Christians, but upon the definite revelation which it had pleased God to give, and by which each man amongst them must hope to stand or fall. There were those who thought that the first object of education was to give to a man such information as should serve the purposes of his temporal advancement, as should enable him to pursue with efficiency and success the calling he might be about to adopt for himself; and if they had that view of the nature of education—if they felt that education was merely designed to put tools into the hands of a man, which tools he might employ in order to shape all the materials which earth afforded—if they held such a belief as this, the natural consequence was they could see no necessity of founding education on the definite basis of religion. (Hear, hear.) They said we were unhappily perplexed by religious divisions, and they were led to add, "Let us avoid all those difficulties, let us found our public education upon the communication of a description of knowledge about the utility of which there is no doubt, and let us leave religion to be dealt with by other men according to their will and pleasure." He hoped this was not an unfair view of the question. (Hear, hear.) He hoped this was not an unfair version of the view which many were led to take, and he was bound to say, under the influence, as he thought, of a most unfortunate delusion (hear, hear); but still from motives which we were bound to respect, and by no means implying an indifference on the part of such individuals to the importance and value of religion itself. The opposite principle was this:—That, although it was important to supply every man with the means of honourable pursuit of his earthly calling, yet there was something very important still—that the great purpose of education, the first and permanent purpose of education, was not so much to supply a man with tools and instruments whereby he might fashion all things to his pleasure; but it was to fashion and mould man himself; it was so to act upon and form his mind, so to develope his faculties, so to cherish the imperishable seed of life eternal, that he might be conscious of the utter ruin of his condition, that he might not bind his view to temporary and perishable objects, but that, recognizing that which was the state of his first parents before their fall, he might recognize the great truth that to recover that state was the great end of his being upon earth—that a union with God was the law of his original nature, so reunion with God was the great purpose for which he was now placed upon earth, and to which, not the Christian religion alone, but likewise the whole experience of life—all that befel him—be it his secular position—be it his social position—whatever was his—whatever was around him, constituted the great discipline devised by the Divine wisdom for the purpose of contributing to the accomplishment of that great work—the renovation of the nature of God in the race that had fallen away. (Great applause.) Now, this was the real and fundamental question, whether education was a system for giving to a man the means of pursuing his temporary calling, or whether, without excluding that purpose, it was a system for operating on the mind and character of man himself? If it were the first, it was easy to understand why, in a country which laboured under religious divisions, we should not seek to encumber our education by making religion a part of it. But if it were true that this was one of the most subtle and mischievous delusions that ever went forth for the ruin of mankind—(hear)—then surely it was equally true that religion should be included in the matter of education, and not only that it should be one item among many, but at the head in the long catalogue of accomplishments, but that it should be the ruling and pervading principle, the principle to which all others were to be subordinate—(hear, hear)—and with respect to which all the foundations of an institution were to be regulated, and all its ends were to be directed and arranged. (Loud and continued cheers.) It was a great truth, that education, to be valuable and to deserve the name, must be a religious education, and to be religious must be founded on the definite revelation of God. (Great cheers.) He believed that if they could frame a system which should present to mankind all branches of knowledge save the one that was essential, they would only be building up to heaven a Tower of Babel, which, when they had completed, would be the more signal in its fall, and which would bury those who raised it in its ruins. (Great applause.) He believed that if they could take a human being in his youth and make him an accomplished man in natural philosophy, in mathematics, or in the knowledge necessary for the profession of a merchant, a lawyer, or a physician,—that if with any or all of those endowments they could store his mind,—yea, if they could endow him with the science and power of a Newton, and send him forth, and if they had concealed from him, or rather if they had not given him a knowledge and love of the Christian faith, he would go forth into the world destitute of everything that constituted the true and sovereign purpose of our existence—every worse, every fatal aspect that sovereign purpose. (The right hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid repeated bursts of applause.)

The Rev. J. Conybeare, the Principal of the Institution, here briefly explained the principles upon which it would be conducted; after which the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung, the apostolical benediction was pronounced by the Lord Bishop, and the company separated.

In the evening the Mayor entertained a large party to dinner at the Town-hall of the principal supporters of the undertakig. It may not be out of place to remark, that the mayor, who is brother to the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, is the treasurer, and one of the life-governors of the Collegiate Institution; that he has invariably evinced a most laudable anxiety to promote such a noble undertaking, and that his father, Mr. John Gladstone, one of the most eminent of the Liverpool merchants, contributed no less a sum than £1000 towards its erection.

The first stone of this institution was laid October 22, 1840, by Lord Stanley, with an inscription upon it purporting that the institution is for "the education of the commercial, trading, and working classes, in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England." The style of architecture is the old English Gothic, in which our forefathers so much delighted in the times of the Tudors, but perhaps improved; and the edifice, when complete, will be an enduring monument of the genius and talented taste of the architect, Lonsdale Elmes, Esq., whose design obtained the first premium from among those sent in by 28 other competitors, all of whom were restricted to the Tudor style. The west or principal front (represented above) is towards Shaw-street; it is 280 feet in length, and comprises a centre and two slightly projecting wings. The magnificent arch which rises above the central porch, and the lofty oriel windows carried up through two stories, with the richly carved canopied niches, and statues of Lord Stanley and Lord Francis Egerton surmounting them, convey an idea of grandeur which is rarely to be met with. The main building contains four stories, varying from 14 to 17 feet in height but as the highest is lighted from the roof, only three tiers of windows are observable to the street; and the two upper ones being combined in a general composition, produce the grand effect of a single range of windows. The four stories comprise 48 apartments, all 25 feet in width, and varying in length from 20 to 50 feet, to be appropriated as school-rooms, a board-room, secretary's room, a library, lecture-rooms, museum, painting and sculpture gallery, the latter of which is 218 feet in length, and well lighted from the roof. There are likewise retiring-rooms, wash-rooms, &c., in each story, and 3 separate staircases. An octagonal building behind contains upon the ground-floor a series of dining-rooms, kitchen, &c., and above, a handsome, well-ventilated lecture-hall, of quintagonal form, 50 feet high from the floor to the ceiling, with two galleries containing accommodation for 3000 persons. It was in this "theatre" that the opening took place. A spacious music-room, with rising seats for nearly 300 performers, opens from the lecturer's platform through a lofty arch; in this recess is placed the organ of the Philharmonic Society, who will in future here hold their concerts. In this portion of the building, conveniently situated for the purposes of the lecturers, are a laboratory, apparatus-room, lecturer's room, small music-rooms, and retiring-rooms.

The cost of the institution will be about £30,000, nearly the whole of which sum has been already raised by voluntary subscriptions; some of the donors standing eminently conspicuous as the contributors of the munificent sums of £1000 each, and none more so than the father of the distinguished gentleman who delivered the inaugural address. The Rev. J. Conybeare was elected principal of the institution in November last: the income of this office from capitation fees and a fixed salary will be not less than £1000 per annum. The institution will open for the reception of pupils towards the close of the present month: it will comprise three distinct day schools, at different rates of charge, viz., 20, 10, and 3 guineas respectively, with separate apartments, playgrounds, divisions of the lecture-hall, &c., to each, so as to accommodate the three great classes of society. The Bishop of Chester is the visitor; Lord F. Egerton, the president; the rev. rectors of Liverpool, the chairmen; and the list of governors, and the board of management contain the names of the most eminent and influential of the clergy, merchants, bankers, and tradesmen of the town. The course of instruction will comprehend every useful and ornamental branch of education; and the religious tuition, we learn from the inscription on the foundation-stone, will be in conformity with the doctrines of the Church of England. There will likewise be evening schools, for the instruction of adults, in literature, art, and science; and, from the amount of talent which the three day schools will place at the command of the directors, these schools will afford advantages of an extraordinary description to the inhabitants, upon the most moderate terms.

IRELAND.

REFORM IN THE IRISH COURT OF CHANCERY.—A correspondent informs us that a great sensation has been produced by the appearance of a general order from the Lord Chancellor, requiring the names, ages, duties, attendance, or non-attendance, as the case may be, of officers of all classes deriving salaries or emoluments in the Court of Chancery. In the words of our correspondent, "the explosion of a bomb-shell in the court could not have produced more alarm than this unexpected order, and speculations of all kinds are afloat as to its object and tendency." Our correspondent states that there are some officers, with very high salaries, who seldom appear personally—that others have been absent, from illness or other causes, during a whole year. It is added, that serious apprehensions prevail in the other equity, as well as in the law courts, that a similar order will be immediately issued, with a view to important modifications in the whole system.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in Ireland determined at its last meeting to postpone all proceedings in reference to the present position of the Church until after the meeting of Parliament, in order that they might ascertain whether her Majesty would direct the attention of Parliament to it in the speech from the throne.

The Mining Company of Ireland appears to be in a most prosperous condition. The gross profits of the last half-year are 11,951l. 9d.

The Evening Packet contradicts the rumour that Lord Eliot is about to leave Ireland for Canada.

A requisition is in progress in Drogheda for a great meeting at the Tholsel, to petition against the present system of poor-laws.

Mr. Cornwall Lewis, who succeeds Mr. Nicholls, as chief commissioner of poor-laws, entered on the duties of his office on Saturday last.

The Freeman's Journal states that there has been great falling off in the trade of Dublin during the past year. The decrease is observed to have chiefly occurred in the importation of timber, corn, and fruit—the number of cargoes of timber entered this year being only two thirds of that of the previous one.

DUBLIN, JAN. 10.—THE WEATHER.—At length the winter has set in with great severity. There was a heavy fall of snow and sleet last night, accompanied by a strong gale of wind. The temperature has decreased considerably, and the air is exceedingly sharp and cold. In the north and west a great quantity of snow has fallen, and the roads are almost impassable in many places. The mail coaches, yesterday and to-day, were much later than usual in their arrival at the Post-office here.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.—The members of this academy dined together yesterday, at Radley's Tavern, Commercial-buildings. Sir William Hamilton, Astronomer Royal, presided. The chief secretary, Lord Eliot, was a guest upon the occasion. His lordship goes to London next week.

SCOTLAND.

EDINBURGH.—ATTEMPTED MURDER.—About six o'clock on Saturday evening a boy, about 13 years of age, named Alexander Mercer, was walking along the bank of the canal, opposite Gilmore-place, Edinburgh, when a man, respectably dressed, came up to him, knocked him down, and, threatening to cut his throat, proceeded to carry his threat into execution by drawing a razor from his pocket, with which he inflicted a deep wound in the boy's throat, cutting through his neckerchief, and piercing to, but happily not dividing, the carotid artery. The screams of the boy were heard at a distance, but the darkness of the night, and the solitariness of the place, prevented any immediate assistance; happily a canal-boat coming up at the time scared the man from proceeding further; and he ran up the bank of the canal. It happened strangely enough that Scott, the police superintendent of the city (Edinburgh), was passing that way at the time, and met the man running away; conceiving, from the man's appearance, that there was something wrong, he followed him up the towing-path, along the stone bridge to Viewfort, where he lost sight of him. In the meantime the boy had risen from the ground, and staggered further down the bank, where he was observed by several people, and a surgeon was sent for; but, as no one could be found while the blood was flowing profusely, a man lifted him in his arms, and conveyed him to the Police-office (Edinburgh), whence he was instantly sent to the Infirmary. Happily, he was free from danger on Saturday, and was able to give an account of the transaction. There can be no doubt that the assassin must be insane. He is described by the boy, and by Scott (the hangman), who followed him, as about 35 years of age, 5 feet 9 or 10 inches high, stout made, large limbed, and of whiskers coming forward to his mouth, dressed in dark surtout and trousers, with black hat. He was of rather respectable appearance.

HORRID MURDER AND PARRICIDE.—We have just received from a correspondent in Mull an account of a most unnatural and atrocious murder—the murder of a poor old woman by her own son. It appears that the son, who, strange to say, is deaf and dumb, and who had always been characterized for want of affection to his parent, committed the foul crime by giving her such a dreadful beating, cutting and maiming her, on the preceding Monday, that she lingered in great agony, and died last Saturday. The name of the place where the unfortunate woman lived is Kilean, and it is some satisfaction to know that the culprit, a destroyer of the most sacred relation of social life, has been apprehended, and is safely lodged within the walls of a prison.

TWEED BANK.—Last week the estate of Whitesome Hill, the property of the bank assignees, was again offered for sale by auction at the Kirk o' Lamb Inn. The upset price was £30,000, which sum was offered by Mr. R. Home, solicitor, on behalf of Mr. James Forster, of this town. There were no other bidders, and as there being no reserve bidding, the property was declared to be sold. The patronage of Whitesome church was next offered, at the upset price of £500, but not sold. An offer of £420 was made, but not accepted.

IMPORTATION OF TEAS FROM CHINA.—On Monday morning the ship Crest, Captain Wharton, arrived in the London Dock, direct from China, with a valuable and extensive cargo of teas, consisting of congous, &c. Within these few days there have been several arrivals of vessels from Calcutta, Singapore, &c., also with valuable cargoes, the product of the eastern hemisphere. Many more are daily expected to arrive from China, &c.

INDIA AND CHINA.

In a third edition of last week's ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS we published a portion of the intelligence received by express from Marseilles, bringing accounts from Bombay to the 1st December, and from China to the 7th October ult., and we then promised to give in this day's paper ample details of the occurrences of the month of November, which we now proceed to fulfil.

After destroying Cabul, Jellalabad, and Ali Musjid, demolishing several hostile forts, and laying waste the country on their line of march, the armies under Generals Pollock and Nott have once more effected their return to the plains. Much wanton slaughter and useless devastation appear to have been committed—a fact which cannot be too deeply deplored. The troops were to leave Peshawur about the 10th November en route to Ferozepore. Some opposition was encountered in the passes, and owing to the neglect of the generals to crown the heights considerable loss was sustained by the rear-guard of General Pollock's and the entire command of General M'Caskill, which being embarrassed in its movements near Ali Musjid, the mountaineers during the night of the 3rd made an attack on the baggage, a considerable quantity of which is said to have fallen into their hands. During the skirmishing two officers, Lieut. Christie, of the artillery, and Ensign Nicholson, of the 30th Bengal Native Infantry, were killed, as well as upwards of 100 sepoys killed and wounded, besides a number of camp followers. Two cannon were also taken by them, but one of the guns was re-taken on the following morning, as well as the carriage of the other, the enemy having found means of concealing the gun itself. With this exception nothing of consequence appears to have occurred in the return of the troops from Jellalabad to Peshawur.

General Nott's division (the third), which formed the last one of the army, arrived at Jumrood, the frontier station of the Sikh territory, on the 6th. This division, through its march from Candahar to Ghuznee and to Cabul, and through the passes from Cabul, has earned for itself much praise.

Dost Mahomed and the other Affghan chiefs in captivity at Loodiana ..ave been ordered to be liberated.

Shah Poora, a son of Shah Soojah, has been recognised as Sovereign of Cabul by the principal chiefs in the neighbourhood of that city; the new monarch is only 16 years of age.

The British troops were under orders to march through the Sikh dominions in six brigades; the first was to move on the 10th of November. Rumours were current of the probability of certain arrangements being formed between the Sikh sovereign Shere Singh and the Governor-General, whereby the former was to agree to accept the protection of the British Government, in order to preserve hereafter his throne and life. The Governor-General, with his body-guard, had reached Muruchuinira on the 14th of November, in his progress to Ferozepore, where four days were to be given on the arrival of the troops from Cabul, and near which place it was expected that interviews would take place between his lordship and the Maharajah, as Shere Singh is commonly called. The commander-in-chief was also on his way from Simla to Ferozepore.

The whole of the political offices in Scinde have been abol-shed, and their duties are henceforth to be performed by extra aides-de-camp attached to the staff of General Napier, and under his control.

A treaty has been concluded with the ameers of Hydrabad, by which we secure a new and advantageous frontier; and a chain of military forts is to be established for the protection of commerce, to commence from Kurachee, by Sukkur to Bahawulpour.

Active preparations have been commenced in Bundlekund, but nothing of much moment has occurred there.

The Governor-General had, it was reported, some measures in contemplation which were calculated to lessen the pressure on the finances of the Indian Government in the extraordinary expenditure.

A heavy fall of rain took place at Bombay on the 15th November, which unseasonable event had caused the cholera to rage among the natives for several days, but the health of the island was restored at the period of the departure of the mail. The burning within the year of the five merchant ships from Bombay, which were stated publicly to have been doomed, had produced a strict examination into the facts on the part of the underwriters. Some traces of a conspiracy for the purpose had been discovered.

From Candahar no news of little importance, amongst our details will, however, be found a singular document—a translation of the manifesto of the Chinese commissioners at the conclusion of the treaty of Nankin. It recognises the liability of the Chinese Government for the opium which was destroyed.

Extracts from the official despatches received from Major-General Pollock, C.B., and Major-General Lumley, Adjutant-General of the army, from Major-General Pollock, C.B., commanding in Afghanistan, dated Camp Khoord Cabul, Oct. 18:—

Having detached Major General Sir Robert Sale with the 1st and 2nd brigades, the Mountain Train, 1st Light Cavalry, 3rd Irregular Cavalry, and Christie's Horse, the Gospundurrah pass, for the purpose of turning that of the Khoord Cabul, in consequence of which movement we entered through the principal defile without a shot being fired. Previous to my departure from Cabul, I destroyed with gunpowder the grand bazaar of that city, called the Chahar Chuttah, built in the reign of Aurungzebe by the celebrated Ali Murdan Khan, and which may be considered to have been the most frequented part of Cabul, and generally known as the grand emporium of this part of Central Asia. The remains of the late envoy and minister had been exposed to public insult in this bazaar, and my motive in effecting its destruction has been to impress upon the Affghans that their atrocious conduct towards a British functionary has not been suffered to pass with impunity.

Extract from a letter to the Governor-General from Major-General Pollock, dated Jugoolaok, Oct. 16.

It is very gratifying to be able to state that we have met with no opposition since we left Cabul, except what must always be expected where the whole population is armed, and we have consequently had small parties of thieves occasionally firing on the rear-guards. During each night that we encamped not a shot has been fired, and on the line of march not a man is to be seen on the hills.

ORDERS BY MAJOR-GENERAL SIR R. SALE, G.C.B.

Camp, Chumkunie, Nov. 4, 1842.

The troops will halt until further orders. The Major-General positively prohibits any soldiers, European or native, or camp followers, from entering any of the villages in the neighbourhood of camp, nor are they to be allowed to proceed in the direction of Behawkur, into which city they will not get entrance. Any one found disobeying this order will be severely punished. This order to be read and explained to the men, and by beat of tomtom throughout the lines and bazaars.

From Major-General W. Nott, commanding Division of the Army, to Captain G. Ponsonby, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Camp, Giant's Tomb, Oct. 15, 1842.

Sir,—I beg to report, for the information of Major-General Pollock, C.B., that the rear-guard of the force under my command was yesterday attacked by large bodies of the Huft Kotul Pass. I sent 200 sepoys and a wing of her Majesty's 40th Regiment, and two companies of her Majesty's 41st, under command of Major Hibbert, to the assistance of Captain Lessan, of the 42nd Regiment Native Infantry, who had charge of the rear. Our sepoys defeated and dispersed the enemy. Captain Leeson speaks in high terms of the gallantry of the officers and sepoys under his command.

Major Hibbert and the wing of her Majesty's 40th, under Captain Blackbourne, and two companies of her Majesty's 41st, under Captain Blackbourne, behaved with their accustomed gallantry: my thanks are due to all the troops engaged. I enclose a list of killed and wounded.

Total Killed, 12 men and 3 horses
Ditto Wounded 40 men, and 10 horses.

Grand total of Killed and Wounded, officers and men, and 13 horses.

Officers Wounded—Lieutenant and Brevet Captain W. Jervis, 42nd Regiment Bengal Native Infantry; Lieutenant N. W. Chamberlain, Christie's Horse; Assistant-Surgeon J. H. Serrel, 42nd Regiment Bengal Native Infantry.

From Major-General G. Pollock to T. H. Maddock, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India.

Camp Ally Boghan, Oct. 27, 1842.

Sir,—I have the honour to report, for the information of the Right Honourable the Governor-General of India, my departure from Jellalabad with the whole of the troops, excepting General Nott's division, after destroying the fortifications of that city.

GENERAL ENGLAND'S FORCE.

From Major-General R. England, Commanding Scinde Field Force, to T. H. Maddock, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

Camp, near Dadur, Oct. 10.

Sir,—I have the honour to acquaint you, for the information of the Right Hon. the Governor-General in Council, that the troops destined to descend the Indus by the Bolan Pass finally evacuated Quetta on the 1st instant, and have accomplished their march through that defile without much difficulty.

2. In carrying into effect the movement of this large body, which, with the acquisition of the garrison of Quetta, consisted of more than 7,000 fighting men, with details of cavalry, 13 pieces of artillery, and an increased retinue of invalids and of camels, I divided it into three columns of route, retaining the last in as light a form of equipment as possible, in the hope and expectation that, if the tribes through whose country we should pass were inclined to attack us, they would prefer to make their chief efforts on the last departing division; and I therefore sent the greater part of the sick and public stores with the leading divisions accordingly.

3. It has proved that this conjecture was right, because the two preceding divisions have been wholly unmolested in their progress through the pass, whereas, on the morning of the 3rd, I found the Kakurs posted in some numbers on the steep ground which commands the upper extremity of the narrow zigzag near Sir-i-bolan.

4. These insurgents, however, had only time to deliver a few rounds on the column, when their attention was fully engaged by the flanking parties which covered our left, and which I now reinforced by a strong detachment of the 6th Regiment Bombay Native Infantry, and by nearly the whole of the 5th Regiment of Irregular Infantry, under Major Woodhouse and Capt. Macdonnell, respectively.

5 I had every reason to be satisfied with the handsome manner in which our troops ascended these stupendous heights, and cleared them of the enemy; and Major Woodhouse speaks very highly of the conduct of a party of Brahoe horse which accompanied him in this affair.

6. On this occasion also Major Outram gave me his able assistance, as well as in flanking the lower extremity of the Bolan Pass near Kudie, where I had good reason to expect again to meet some hostile tribes; but the total disappointment of the Kakurs on the 3rd, and the effectual flanking arrangements made on all occasions by our troops, seem to have prevented any renewal of interruption.

7. I beg leave to enclose a list of the casualties which have occurred during their passage of the Bolan defile

8. As I now consider the chief difficulties of this march to have terminated, I trust I may be permitted to express the opinion of his lordship the Governor-General the general good conduct of the troops I have had the honour to command during these prolonged and laborious operations; and to endeavour to submit the names of Major Waddington, commanding engineer; Major Wyllie, major of brigade; Major Boyd, acting assistant-quartermaster-general; Capt. Davidson, deputy commissary general; and Surgeon Wright, in chief medical charge; and to claim his lordship's favorable estimate of the exertions of these officers in their several departments and capacities; and it is with the utmost satisfaction that I am enabled to assure his lordship that, owing to the discipline which has been exacted, these British columns, in emerging from the Bo an Pass, will leave amongst the peaceable inhabitants of the country they have quitted a well-merited character for forbearance and humanity; whilst in the deliberate and systematic order of their march, during which every enemy has been beaten off and no store lost or captured, the power of our arms has been alike equally and imperiously made manifest.

9. The garrison of Sebee will be withdrawn to-morrow, and that of Dadur on the 12th and 13th, when I propose to resume my progress to the Indus.

I have, &c.
R. England, Major-General,
Commanding Scinde Field Force.

Return of casualties in skirmishes with the enemy since the march of the head-quarters from Quetta on the 1st, to its arrival at Dadur on the 9th instant.

Camp Dadur, October 10.

Killed, 2; wounded, 11; missing, 4.

RELEASE OF DOST MAHOMED.

NOTIFICATION.

Secret Department, Simla, Oct. 25, 1842.

The advance of the British armies in Cabul and Candahar has led to the restoration to freedom of the British prisoners in the hands of the Affghans, Dost Mahomed Khan, his wives and family, Mahomed Akkbar Khan, and many Affghan chiefs, remain in the absolute power of the British government, without having any means of procuring their liberation.

To this condition of disgrace and danger has Mahomed Akkbar Khan reduced his father, and his wife, and his family, and the chiefs his countrymen, by making war upon women, and preferring the continuance of their captivity and suffering, for objects connected only with his own safety, to the general exchange of prisoners, offered by the British government, and the consequent restoration to liberty of those whose honour and whose happiness should have been most dear to him.

But the British government is desirous of terminating, at the earliest period, all the evils which have arisen out of the Affghan war; and the Governor-General, enabled by the recovery of the British prisoners who were in the hands of the enemy to relieve the country in accordance with clemency and humanity, declares that when the British army returning from Affghanistan shall have passed the Indus, all the Affghans now in the power of the British government shall be permitted to return to their country.

The Affghan chiefs who are thus released will, before they pass the Sutlej, present themselves at the durbar of the Governor-General in his camp at Feroz-pore.

The wives of Dost Mahomed Khan and Mahomed Akkbar Khan, and all the ladies of the family and household, will be conducted with all respect to the frontiers of Affghanistan.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor-General of India.

T. H. Maddock,
Secretary to the Government of India, with the Governor-General.

Secretary to the Government.

SCINDE AND BELOOCHISTAN.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

Secret Department, Simla, Oct. 19.

The Governor-General is pleased to direct that the duties and allowances of all officers holding political appointments in Scinde and Beloochistan, and of all persons in their several establishments, shall cease on the 15th of November.

Major-General Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., commanding the forces in Scinde and Beloochistan, will submit, for the approval of the Governor-General, the names of such officers as he may be desirous of having attached to his staff, as extra aides-de-camp, for the purpose of performing political duties under his directions

Such extra aides-de-camp will, in addition to their allowances as such, have granted to them such moderate extra allowances as may be sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of their journies and fixed establishments.

Major-General Sir Charles Napier will suggest to the Governor-General what, in his judgment, the amount of such extra allowances should be, having reference, not to former salaries and allowances, but the just remuneration for services to be performed.

Major-General Sir C. Napier is authorised to make any provisional arrangements to the above effect, subject to the approval of the Governor-General.

The Governor-General is likewise pleased to direct that the functions and allowances of all officers holding political appointments on the right bank of the Upper Indus, and of all persons in their several establishments, shall cease on the 15th November.

The functions and allowances of Sir R. Shakspeare, military secretary to Major-General Pollock, will cease on the 31st December.

The several officers above mentioned will, with all expedition, send in their accounts and their last contingent bills, and will, with the exception of such as may be appointed extra aides-de-camp to Major-General Sir C. Napier, rejoin their several corps, being hereby, from the dates above mentioned, placed at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of their respective presidencies.

INDIA PAPERS.

(From the Morning Herald.)

We have great pleasure in laying before our readers the following interesting and succinct account of the march between Cabul and Jellalabad:—

Camp, Jellalabad, 20th October, 1842.

On the 12th instant the whole British force, then encamped in the neighbourhood of the city, marched to Boodkhak, accompanied by the Shahzada Futteh Jung, and most of the Hindoos late resident of Cabul. Here arrangements were made for dividing the troops into two columns, by taking the 2nd and 16th Regiments Native Infantry, with Captain Blood's battery of 9 pounders, from the force under Major-General Nott, and attaching them to that with Major-General Pollock, who moved forward the following morning. Major-General Pollock, who moved forward the following morning. Major-General Sale had taken a route by the (Goat Punderrah) pass, to the right of the Khoord Cabul, with his light brigade the day previous. On the heights on the Khoord Cabul Pass, and crown the heights from the further side, where they were more accessible. This route (Goat Punderrah) can only be adopted by troops in light marching order, with yaboos, being impracticable for camels or heavily-laden animals; and if the Affghans had made any disposition to oppose our passage through the Khoord Cabul, the detour taken by the 1st Brigade would have been of material advantage; as it was, however, not a shot was fired, nor enemy seen, and we all encamped at Khoord Cabul on the 13th, same arriving there rather later, from the delay in getting our immense train of baggage through the narrow pass.

On the 14th we passed over the Huft Kotul (the scene of our former glorious fight), and through the Tezeen pass, encamping in the valley. The 4th Brigade, under Brigadier Monteath, C.B., formed the rear-guard, and did not effect their march as scatheless as yesterday. Owing to the badness of the bullocks yoked to the captured guns, very great delay was occasioned, and finally the bullocks were taken out, and the soldiers of her Majesty's 31st Regiment applied their place; the labour was excessive, and they did not arrive at the narrow pass leading to the Tezeen until dark. The enemy, taking advantage of this, commenced a sharp fire into the column, and masses of baggage collected there, causing great confusion amongst the latter. Parties were immediately sent to the heights on the right to dislodge these marauders, the brigadiers, staff-officers, leading the party, but owing to the darkness little could be done beyond checking their descents into the pass; nothing but the flash of their jezails could be seen. Finding themselves checked on the right, they tried the left and rear of the column, and annoyed them much—killing some six, and wounding an officer and about eleven men. However, the guns were at length brought safely at a quarter past ten o'clock, and all the baggage, with the exception of that destroyed when the cattle left the march.

The advance guard had burnt the fort of Kooder-oux Khas, the Tezeen chief, during the day, and the two 18 pounders received from Major-General Nott were burnt, thus affording more cattle for the transport of the other guns; indeed, but for this the captured guns could not have been taken on the following day.

On the 15th, the 1st division, consisting of the 1st and 3rd brigades, under Major-General Pollock, marched to Kuttungoo, and the 4th marched, whilst the 2nd division, consisting of the 4th brigade, with that portion of Major-General Nott's force before mentioned, under Major General M'Caskill, marched at late hour to Leh Baba (seven miles), separating the two divisions by one day's march; and General Nott's column took up their ground at Tezeen on the same day, having suffered in the pass rather more than the 4th brigade, caused in a great measure, I fancy, by their being unacquainted with the country, and neglect in crowning the heights soon enough. The marches to Leh Baba, Kuttungoo, and Jugdulluk, on the 15th, 16th, and 17th, were accomplished with but little annoyance. The enemy followed up the rear-guard each day, and made several attempts upon the baggage of the 2nd division, but without success. The 1st division marched through the Jugdulluk Pass on the 17th without firing a shot. On the 18th, however, when the 2nd division attempted it, the most decided attack yet evinced upon the baggage was sustained by them. Rarely have the Affghans shown more courage or daring than was displayed by the Ghilzies on that day. Sword in hand, they more than once rushed towards our artillery parties, when coming from the heights by the rear-guard, but each time a shell or shot thrown from the guns placed in a position for the enemy constantly by Brigadier Monteith at the top of the pass, sent the Ghilzies to the right about, and saved many men. Notwithstanding their obstinate attacks, and their following close upon the rear-guard for five or six miles beyond the pass, I am happy to say that the Ghilzies had their labour in vain, not a particle of baggage falling into their hands, whilst their loss must have been considerable, dealing with that fell from our skirmishing parties, several round shot dashed directly through the Ghurgahs, behind which they were ensconsed, killing numbers, and our shell scattering many a group who little calcuated on such unwelcome visitors. Their attack upon Major General Nott the following day was much tamer from their thrashing on the 18th, but they managed to annoy his force greatly, showing them the wide difference between the Candahar and Peshawur rootes to Cabul. Every day, from this to Gundamuck, where the three divisions arrived on the 19th, 20th, and 21st successively, our rear was followed pretty closely by the Affghans—chiefly in expectation of plunder which, I am glad to say, they were disappointed in.

The divisions halted each one day at Gundamuck, and arrived at Jellalabad without any occurrence (beyond Nott's forces having made an example of some men in the Nemla valley) on the 25th, 26th, and 28th. We march hence on the 27th as far as Alli Baghan—that is, the whole of General Pollock's force, that under General Nott moving the following day. As yet nothing is known of the manner in which we are to cross the Indus, but trust it will be in brigades, for great inconvenience ensues from moving large bodies at a time. Very severe loss has been sustained by officers and men from the falling of baggage cattle since leaving Cabul. I myself lost four private camels, besides property—others even more; so that our promised batta will not positively recompense us for actual losses. The medal, however, will be highly prized, though indeed dearly earned. The privations endured by officers and men of the force that advanced from Jellalabad have been beyond description, but particularly by the soldiery, being tentless and bedless, from camels falling and their loads destroyed on the road; and often, too, rationless they have been sent, on arriving at the encamping ground, up to the heights, there to remain until the next day. All this they have borne with cheerfulness, and both Europeans and Sepoys have done their duty well.

Late accounts from Cabul state that Shah Poora, the younger brother of Futteh Jung, was safe in the Balla Hissar; and Akkbar Khan is gone to Balk.

REVIEW BY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

(From the Delhi Gazette, Nov. 9.)

The body of troops which is to be assembled at Loodeeanah, on the arrival of the commander-in-chief there, will be very considerable. It will consist of nearly the whole of the Artillery of the Army of Reserve, the 6th Irregular Cavalry, the portion of the 7th Light Cavalry constituting a part of his excellency's present escort, her Majesty's 3rd Buffs, and the 29th, the 59th, and 74th Regiments of Native Infantry.

(From the Agra Akbbar, Nov. 10.)

We learn from Simla that immense preparations are being made for the approaching spectacle at Ferozepore, on the occasion of the Governor-General's visit to that post. According to what is there given out, this will certainly be the most splendid show of the kind that has ever taken place in India. Everything in magnificence any display ever made by the Grand Mogul, and outshining anything he could command in the shape of military splendour; for we question if a finer body of men than will be collected there could be found in any army. There is to be a splendid pavilion erected, capable of accommodating from 600 to 700 guests. The army of the Indus will enter India through a triumphal arch to be erected for the occasion, and the whole period of his lordship's stay at Ferozepore will be one of festivity and rejoicing. A general invitation has been sent to native princes and chiefs to be present on the occasion, to add to and partake in the triumph of India on the return of its armies from the conquest and humiliation of its ancient foes.

The Governor-General would not leave Simla till the 23rd of this month, probably with the view of receiving the overland mail before commencing his round of festivity.

THE NAVIGATION OF THE INDUS.

PAPERS RELATIVE TO THE NAVIGATION OF THE INDUS AND SUTLEJ AND THE DUTIES LEVIED ON BOATS CONVEYING MERCHANDISE THROUGH THE TERRITORIES OF LAHORE AND BAHAWULPORE.

According to the following articles of the treaty now in force with the Ameers of Hyderabad, the navigation of the river Indus through the limits of their territories is free.

"Art. 11. No toll will be levied on trading boats passing up or down the river Indus from the sea to the northernmost point of that stream, within the territories of the Ameers of Hyderabad.

"Art. 12. But any merchandise landed from such boats on their passage up or down the river and sold shall be subject to the usual duties of the country, provided always that goods sold in a British camp or cantonment shall be exempt from the payment of the duty.

"Art. 13. Goods of all kinds may be brought by merchants and others to the mouth of the Indus (Goraharee) at the proper season, and kept there at the pleasure of the owners till the best period of the year for sending them up the river. But, should any merchant land and sell any part of his merchandise, either at Goraharee or anywhere else (except at the British cantonment), such merchant shall pay the usual duties upon them."

The tolls leviable on the Upper Indus and the Sutlej have been the subject of negociation with the Nawab of Bahawulpore and the Lahore Government, the result of which has been that fixed rates are now levied on boats navigating the river within their respective jurisdictions.

Grain, wood, and limestone will be free from duty; boats to be classed.

CHINA.

We glean the following items from the Friend of China Hong Kong Gazette of the 29th ult :—

"The Hong merchants' monopoly is at an end. Musters of tea from Nanking have been forwarded to Hong Kong by her Majesty's plenipotentiary; the price is moderate, and the report on their quality generally favourable. The Calliope has gone to Bombay to bring down the crew and passengers of the Ann. On September 15th, 6,000,000 dollars, the first instalment of the 21,000,000 dollars, had been paid. The Blonde takes 3,000,000 dollars, the Imperial Commissioner and Colonel Morrison about 500,000 dollars; the Herald, 1,000,000 dollars, and Clio, 1,000,000 dollars, to Calcutta. The Endymion proceeds to Bombay, the Calliope to Hong Kong.

"The Imperial Commissioner has addressed a despatch to her Majesty's Plenipotentiary to the newly-opened ports of trade. The captured junks have been restored, and trading between the English and Chinese has commenced at Amoy, Foo-chow-foo, Ning-po, and Shanghae. The self and mutual destruction of the Tartars at Chinkeang-foo was carried to a fearful extent—fathers killed their sons—mothers their daughters—children their parents—and friends their friends, and we almost fear husbands their wives. Colonel Morrison, Col. Stevens, of the 49th, and Dr. Flyter, died of the cholera. This number of the Hong Kong Gazette contains the proclamation in Chinese, issued by her Majesty's Plenipotentiary, on the 5th July, published by order of Mr. C. R. Johnston, deputy superintendent, charged with the government of Hong Kong.

We understand, from authority, that the following will be the distribution of the land forces to be left in China:—

At Hong Kong.—The whole of her Majesty's 98th Regiment, one wing of her Majesty's 55th Regiment, and one wing of the 41st Madras Native Infantry; a company of Royal Artillery, and detachment of Sappers and Miners. Major-General Lord Saltoun, Commander-in-Chief in China Head-quarters at Hong Kong.

At Koolongsoo.—One wing of her Majesty's 18th Royal Irish, one wing of the 41st Madras Native Infantry, a detachment of Royal Artillery, and a company of Sappers and Miners. Captain Aytharp and Lieutenant Call, of the 18th Royal Irish, commanding officers.

At Chusan.—The whole of the 2nd Madras Native Infantry, one wing of her Majesty's 55th Regiment, one wing of the 18th Royal Irish, a company of Madras Artillery, and a detachment of Sappers and Miners. Lieutenant Elphinstone, of the Madras army, commandant.

Dr. Gordon, of the Madras establishment, is at Chusan, and stationed at Hong-Kong. Captain Ramsay is appointed to superintend all the Commissariat in China, to be attached to the head-quarters at Hong-Kong. This efficient officer, however, has accompanied Sir Henry Pottinger for some time past, and leaves China shortly on sick certificate for six months. The commissariat duties are at present satisfactorily performed by Capt. Bamfield, of the Bengal Volunteers.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

(Translation.)

The following report may be considered of some importance, as exhibiting the views of some of the highest officers in the service of the enemy. The war, the conclusion of hostilities, and the future relations between the two countries:—

REPORT FROM THE IMPERIAL COMMISSIONER AND HIS COLLEAGUES ON THE REQUISITIONS OF HER MAJESTY'S PLENIPOTENTIARY.

The Imperial Commissioner and great Minister, Keying, the acting Adjutant-General, Hooqua, Heepoo, and the governor of the two Kwang provinces, Newkiea, take the articles of peace which have been agreed upon with the English nation, and send up a duly prepared report of all the circumstances.

1. The said barbarians begged that we should give of foreign money 21,000,000 dollars. On examination it is found that the said barbarians owed to natives to enter 30,000,000 of dollars; but Heang-e and his colleagues argued the point strongly again, and a third time, and at length the sum was fixed at 3,000,000 dollars. They said that 6,000,000 was the price of the opium in Kang-and; but that it was all sent forth from a neighbouring country; that upwards of 20,000 chests had been already sold, and it required no small sum to pay for them; the 6,000 000 dollars that had been paid (for already given to pay the city of Canton, in 6,000,000 dollars; how could payment be extorted a second time? As to the debts of the Hong merchants should be liquidated by themselves; how could the officers of government be called upon to pay them? As to the necessary expenses of the army why should Canna be called upon to pay them? And these points were discussed again and again. The said barbarians exclaimed that opium was sent forth from must say nothing more to us about the retirement or not of the army and fleet; but if hostilities do not cease, we apprehend that the expenditure of China, in future, will not stop at 12,000,000 dollars. Further, the men-of-war have already taken Kingkow, and have blockaded the passages, and if we are soon enabled to order them to retire, the advantages to China will be very great indeed, and so forth.

The said Shewei (Rong-e) and his colleagues again authoritatively questioned us to the difficulties, but the said barbarian only stared at him indignantly; the Shewei was not listened to.

I, your servant, have examined and found what are the unwarrantable demands of the said barbarians, which they so importunately urge, and they are deserving of the utmost hatred. But, considering that they have already attacked and laid in ruins Kingkow, and it is proved that not only the rivers, but Chinkeang, it will be difficult to recover speedily, but I am apprehensive we shall be blocked up, both on the north and south, which will be the heaviest calamity.

The ships that formerly blockaded the entrance were far different from these (in the Yang-tse-kiang), and great expense is unavoidable; as yet, our reputation is not lost; as to the external 21,000,000 dollars, they are to be reckoned at seven mace each of sycee silver, which will amount to upwards of 11,700,000 taels; the Hong debts are 3,000,000 dollars, weighing 2,100,000 taels; which must be recovered from the Hong merchants of Canton, when a clear examination has been made. There still remains 12,600,000 taels. This year the first payment of 6,000,000 dollars has been made, equal to 4,200,000 taels. Now, 1,000,000 dollars has already been carried to the account of the people and merchants of Keangsoo; which the officers must pay in the first instance; and in time, money may be looked for for the purchase of honours (buttons and peacocks' feathers). The remainder is to be cleared off in three years, not requiring 3,000,000 taels for each year. Moreover, the duties that the said nation will pay should be taken into account, which will ship the expenditure of the Imperial family, and disputances will be prevented. Comparing one year's expenses of the army with the sum paid to the English, it is as three to ten; and there is only the name of fighting, without the hope of victory; it is better to adopt plans in accordance with circumstances, and put an everlasting stop to war.

The 4,200,000 taels, the first payment made of this year, has been collected from the funds of the treasurer and salt-commissioners of the three provinces of Chekeang, Keangsoo, and Ganhwuy; which will be repaid by the duties on the merchants and people.

We wait to receive the Imperial will, that we may send post-haste orders (to the treasurers and salt-commissioners), to be respectfully obeyed.

2. The said barbarians begged that Hong-Kong might be conferred on them as a place of residence. They also requested to be allowed to trade at Kwangchow, Funchow, Heamun (Moy), Ningpo, and Shanghae. The Shewei Hanling and his colleagues, as the barbarians had already built houses on Hong-Kong, and yet could beg for favour, granted that they might dwell there. With reference to Kwangchow and the other four places, they must be considered too many; as to the regulations of the trade as well as the duties, they should early be enumbted and decided upon.

When clear and explicit questions were asked, it is authenticated that the said barbarians answered, "We consider Hong-Kong as our dwelling-place, and we must have Kwangchow and the others, in all five places, as ports of trade; but if it cannot be allowed, then neither Moy, Ningpo, Hinhae, Tinghae, Topoo, Paoyshan, nor Heakeang will be delivered up, neither will our forces retire. As we want to trade at all those places, it is absolutely necessary that resident consuls should be appointed to superintend affairs, to restrain the barbarians (English), and prevent disturbances. The duties shall be paid according to the regulations of China; and when the duties are settled there shall be no delay in the payment.

"Further, when we traded at Canton, the whole trade was in the hands of the mandarin Hong merchants, and we were exposed to their extortions, and the injuries we suffered were not small. Hereafter, we desire to choose our own merchants, that trade may be conducted equitably; and the entire duties are to be paid through the consuls to the Hoppo, and not to pass through the hands of the Hong merchants, in order that their extortions may be prevented;" and so forth.

The said Shewei again represented, that from the five places, Kwangchow, &c., some should be deducted; but the said barbarian constantly refused. I, your servant, have examined and found, that with reference to the said foreigners dwelling on Hong-Kong, and going to trade in the province of Fokein and Heakeang, the Imperial will has already been received, with permission as to what they have requested about trading at the five places named, although the comparison is great; but as they have taken and kept possession of Amoy and other places, which are not yet given up, and as they still hold Hong-Kong, Kolongsoo, and have not retired, it will be a difficult matter to get them back.

If we again prepare our armies to maintain those places, it is a difficult matter to engage with them on the waters. Though near to each other, we have been idle (there has not been any fighting) for many days; and as to those places which they have taken and keep possession of, will it not be allowed them to return to us our territory, and allow them to trade, since they are willing respectfully to pay the duties? Just now, they are sensible and repent of their errors, and are as heedless as if driven by the wind, and when again united in mutual friendship, benevolence, and truth, all things will go on well. And since they will guard their own market, and surround and protect the sea boundaries, there will not be any necessity for recourse for our interference, which will be to the advantage of our country.

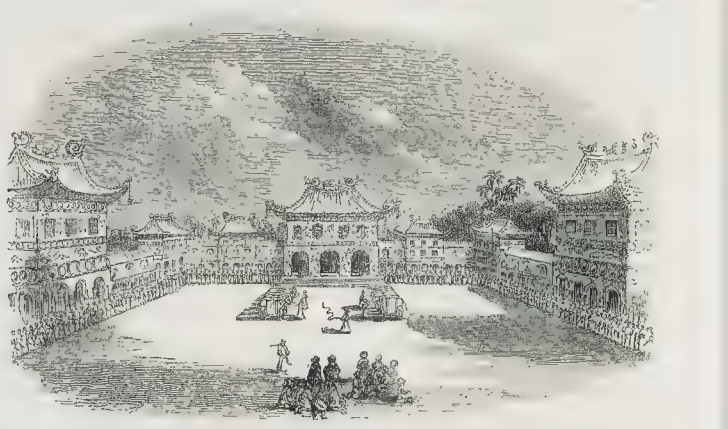
We request the Imperial will may be sent down to the governors and lieutenant-governors of each of the three provinces, to examine clearly into the duties and trading regulations of the Comptroller of Maritime Customs in the provinces of Canton, and consult about the management of affairs, and fix them on a sure basis.

3. That which the said barbarians have requested with reference to the officers of China,—to have ceremonial intercourse upon an equality; and the barbarians who have been made captives, and the Chinese traitors who have been seduced (into the service, &c., of the English), the release of all these they most earnestly solicit.

I, your servant, have examined, and found, that with reference to equal official intercourse, it may be unreservedly granted; and as the affairs with the foreigners are finished (the war ended), the prisoners may also be released, by which harmony and good understanding will be strengthened; for a state of peace will bring repose and gladness, and overthrow factious parties; these matters may be allowed to proceed, and I have left them to the Shewei, without discussing them.

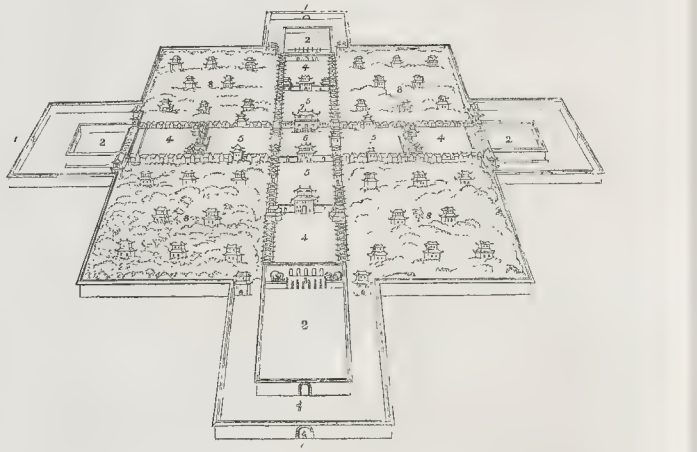
NANKIN AND ITS PORCELAIN TOWER.

Numerous as have been the pilgrimages made to the far-famed "Porcelain Tower," for the first time, in inspecting any of the monuments renommés of this country, no disappointment has been experienced, while on approaching what actually is with what the legends of the book-makers in China describe it to be. It is, indeed, a most elegant and singular structure, as remarkable for its correct proportions as for the rare material of which it is partially composed. The mass of building is not of porcelain, but is composed of common brick, with a facing and lining of beautiful white glazed porcelain bricks or slabs, fixed into the masonry by means of deep keys or shoulders, cast like a half T, on the brick. Its form is octagonal, and running up each of the angles is a moulding of large lites of very fine clay, glazed, and coloured red and green alternately; round each story runs a light balustrade formed of green porcelain, upon which four arched doorways open, set to the four cardinal points, the arches being elegantly turned with large glazed tiles, cast in all imaginable fancies of design and variegation of colour, representing wild beasts, demons, deities, monsters, &c. It appears to be a "sight amongst the Chinese themselves, for there are priests or bonzes attached to the building to keep it in order, who earn their consideration by distributing to the visitors lithographed elevations of the tower, with descriptions attached, and who seem to have the duty entrusted to them of illuminating it on gala occasions. This is effected by means of lanterns made of thin oyster shells, used in lieu of window-glass by the Chinese, which are placed at each of the eight angles on every story, and the effect of whose subdued light on the highly reflective surface of the tower must be most striking and beautiful. The walls of Nankin are more remarkable for their extraordinary height and great extent than for the strength which has been given to them by the builders; in some places they are not less than 70 feet in height, and at very few points along an enceinte of fully 20 miles in extent are they less than 50. There are however, several points at which they are open to escalade with 26-feet ladders; the Chinese engineers, though they have evidently bestowed extensive repairs upon the fortifications this year, having, as usual, forgotten to raise their ramparts where the undulations of the ground after the levels of their foundations. From the peculiar features of the country adjoining the town, and from the situation of the Tartar city or citadel, which is separated from the great straggling mass of the town by open fields and gardens, it appears evident that the place could at any time be readily carried by a comparatively small force, and retained against a very large one of undisciplined troops, as long as they had the means of procuring supplies, which, in consequence of the goodness of the road and its inconsiderable length, could always be obtained from the river. The Chinese must have wisdom enough to know that our stay here, and our examinations of their city from the heights and from the summit of the Porcelain Tower, have taught us this secret; and it may therefore be considered as an additional reason to the many that exist, why they should not too soon again tempt the "Devil's children" to measure strength with their braves. 3000 to 4000 seasoned troops, with a few guns, some powder bags, intrepid and scaling ladders, would have Nankin under their command in a week from landing, with four or five steamers, and a dozen junks or decked boats to be towed up by them against the stream; and from the important discovery of coal of decent quality in large quantities here, we may always reckon upon being able to keep steamers constantly employed in bringing in supplies from all points on the river, whither they can be drawn. But to render them serviceable to the state, they must never be under the sole and despotic sway of an admiral. If the experience of the present military Commander-in-Chief could be made available for the benefit and information of his companions of the service, the Government would, in all probability, have much difficulty in finding an officer of any worth or standing who could be induced to serve as a joint leader in a combined expedition, the circumstances of which promised to be at all similar to those under which the land forces have reached here.



IMPERIAL PALACE, PEKIN.

The centre building is the hall of the palace, wherein is the Emperor's throne. In the foreground stand the ambassadors of different nations, waiting the summons of the herald—the figure standing before them. Twelve milk-white horses always stand in this court, richly caparisoned. In the centre of the court is a Tartar with a leathern serpent; the imperial guards are ranged on all sides of the square, holding constant guard.



GROUND-PLAN OF THE EMPEROR'S PALACE, PEKIN.

No. 1 denotes the four principal entrances looking towards the four corners of the universe; 2 is the outer court, wherein the guards are stationed; 3 the court of the three great sentinel elephants; 4 designates the first palace court; 5 the second; 6 the interior court, of which we have given a view; 7 is the place of the imperial throne; 8 is the thirty-two imperial pleasure-gardens, with summer-houses, fish-ponds, and other places for diversion.

Without the gates of almost every city there is an idol temple and others on the sides of high-ways far from towns, where travellers are hospitably entertained; and near every temple is a tower erected to the memory of some saint or hero, filled with images and lamps that burn perpetually. To every temple belongs a society of priests, who offer rice and other provisions to the genii of the place, of whom people come frequently to enquire what success they may expect in their undertakings. There are cloisters also of religious devotees, who undergo unheard-of penances to obtain the name of saints among the people, and merit the happiness of another state. In their temples is an image of Immortality, representing a fat man, sitting cross-legged; another, called the image of pleasure, twenty feet high; and between them another image, thirty feet high, with a crown on his head. Besides which, they have abundance of images in their houses, which they worship, as well as Confucius and their ancestors. The sun, moon, and stars, also, are objects of their adoration.

Without the City of Nanking (formerly the Court and Imperial Chamber of the ancient Princes), not far distant from the walls, grows a very pleasant wood, full of pine trees, walled in, and containing twelve miles in circumference. In the middle rises a hill, on which are several well-built tombs, and several other works, among which an idol-temple is the chief masterpiece. It is situated upon a high hill, and built all of wood, except the walls, which are of stone. The entrance into this temple is by four large marble staircases, each having several steps, with gates opening towards the four quarters of the world, between which are four princely galleries, supported on all sides by curiously-carved pillars of wood, each being at least four yards thick, and thirty-six feet high. The ceilings are exquisitely painted and gilded. The doors are admirably wrought with imagery and painted, and the galleries and windows have a covering of wire-work, to prevent the birds from roosting on them.

THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND RECENTLY AFFIXED TO THE CHINESE TREATY.

The Great Seal of England is always renewed at the commencement of a fresh reign. The above beautiful design was executed on the accession of her Majesty, by Mr. Wyon, A.R.A., medallion engraver to the Queen.

The first seal used in England was by Edward the Confessor, A.D. 1048. The most ancient seal with arms on it is that of Richard the First.

The seal used in Elizabeth's reign was remarkable for the elaborate nature of the ornaments it contained—the chief figure being that of the maiden queen on horseback, bearing the sword of state and other symbols of royalty in her hands.

The Great Seal has been on several occasions lost or mislaid. When James the Second found himself deserted by his retainers, and had at length determined on taking refuge in France, to avoid an open conflict with the Prince of Orange, before leaving he threw the Great Seal into the Thames, off Whitehall, hoping thus to invalidate the acts of William.

The Great Seal was stolen from the house of Lord Chancellor Thurlow, in Great Ormond-street, into which some thieves broke and carried it, with other property, away, March 24, 1784, one day before the dissolution of Parliament. It was never recovered.

It was also mislaid during the early part of the Chancellorship of Lord Eldon. A copper seal was used for several years, until the regency of the Prince of Wales, when a new one was made of the accustomed metal, silver.

A new seal was brought into use on the union with Ireland, Jan. 1, 1801, which was again renewed, and the old one defaced, in January 1832.

There is also a separate "Great Seal" for Scotland. All private grants and public appointments in Ireland are ratified with the Great Seal of that country, with the exception of the offices of Lord Lieutenant and Master of the Rolls.

LID OF THE BOX CONTAINING THE GREAT SEAL.

In Scotland, none but what are termed "private grants," including all letters patent for inventions, are sealed with the official instrument of that country, a clause in the articles of union having been framed expressly for the regulation of the Great Seal. It does not appear that any such provision was made in Ireland at the time of its legislative union with England.

The "Great Seal" always accompanies the Lord Chancellor, to whose keeping it is delivered on his accepting office. During Lord Brougham's Chancellorship the Great Seal was conveyed to Scotland on the occasion of the noble Lord visiting that country. All documents requiring to be sealed were then forwarded to the Lord Chancellor, and formed (as indeed they do now on some occasions) a profitable source of income to the Lord Chancellor's messenger, who charges a separate "journey" for each patent, sometimes conveying ten or a dozen.

The material used for taking impressions of the Great Seal is a light-coloured wax, which, when dry, is exceedingly brittle; while at the same time it melts on a very moderate exposure to heat. This is an evil which has been much complained of, and it is expected that some means will be speedily adopted to remedy the defect, the present Lord Chancellor having directed enquiry into the subject. The seal, when made, is generally enclosed in a small tin box, having an opening in one side, through which a piece of silk cord passes, which is attached to the letters patent, or treaty, as the case may be, at the one end, and passes through the wax at the other. In some instances the documents are engrossed in a most elaborate style on vellum, and silver boxes used to contain the wax, as in the case we have selected for illustration.

THE GREAT SEAL.

The value of the metal used in making the Great Seal exceeds £30.

The Privy Seal is used by the Sovereign to all charters, grants, and pardons, signed by Majesty, before they come to the Great Seal. This seal was also originated by Edward the Confessor. It is much smaller than the Great Seal, and consists only of one design.

The Lord Chancellor is appointed by the delivery of the Great Seal into his custody, though some few instances have occurred in which the appointment has been made by patent. The resumption of the Great Seal by the Sovereign determines his office.

The office of Lord Chancellor is of great antiquity. Selden states "that the title of an officer, synonymous with that of Chancellor, occurs first in historical records of the period of Edward the Elder, A.D. 920." In the capacity of secretary he was the adviser of his master, prepared and made out his mandates, grants, and charters, and finally (when seals came into use) affixed his seal. He is styled keeper of the Sovereign's conscience, probably because in early days the appointment was usually held by an ecclesiastic. The last churchman who exercised the office was John Williams, Archbishop of York, who was Lord Keeper from July 10, 1621, to November 1, 1625.

The Great Seal has been, on some occasions, put into commission during the temporary vacancy of the office, or the sickness of the Chancellor; the seal being then entrusted to the chief commissioner.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"General Pension Society."—The Mr. Richardson who attends to the business of this society, can neither reflect credit on it or upon himself, by pestering the newspapers with ready-written puffs of his own activity and exertions. A little modesty in a public officer might better serve the turn of charity, and be more in accordance with its spirit, than the bustling intrusion which marks the mere notoriety hunter.
No newsman has a right to refuse the print to the paper of last week. All papers issued from this office had an equal number of prints given. We are much surprised to hear from many subscribers, that in some instances 3s. was demanded. We think tradesmen do not consider their own interest to act in this way; we are certain they have injured us.
"A Subscriber," Lincoln.—Thanks.
"P. H. L."—See the last paragraph of the article on the first page. The newsman can only have defrauded some other subscriber, or returned a false number for tickets to our office.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1843.

Although favourable from the first to the imposition of a property-tax, which we have always regarded as a necessary expedient for relieving the burdens of the state, yet we have never shut our eyes to the manifold difficulties which, we were convinced, must inevitably be created by the infliction of an impost so unequal in its operation, and so manifestly unjust in its principle, as that with which the country was saddled by he act of last session. It is but fair to say that even the most strenuous advocates of the measure never attempted either in or out of Parliament to justify its enactment on any other ground than that of expediency; but the expedient having failed to arrest the downward course of the revenue, let alone to restore the national finances to that condition which the exigencies of the country required, the objectionable details of the tax become more strongly marked and defined, and the utter failure of the experiment proves most satisfactorily that a more unfortunate speculation could hardly well have been devised. The revenue, we are sorry to observe by the returns, has experienced a most unexpected reverse of prosperity, and this evil is in no way mitigated by the fact, that it arises from the decreased consumption of those exciseable commodities which are generally regarded as the moderate luxuries, if not absolute necessaries of the poor. One of our contemporaries has attributed this circumstance to the operation of the new poor-law, and we have no doubt that that enactment exercises considerable influence over the fluctuations of such articles as we have alluded to, but much as we detest both the practice and the principle of that measure, we are not disposed to attribute to it solely the weighty onus of an affliction in which the income-tax has clearly a right to participate. It were idle, however, to waste time or occupy space by endeavouring to show which measure exercises the ascendant power. It is sufficient for our purpose to prove that neither the condition of the poor nor the coffers of the State have been improved by the operation of a tax which has only been productive of great local and general annoyance, and which we trust the Legislature, in its collective wisdom, will lose no time in endeavouring to ameliorate. It is absolutely harassing to observe the workings of the measure throughout the country, and the incessant resort to appeals by those whose real income should render them exempt from its operation, but whose most private and confidential affairs are exposed to the prying and impertinent curiosity of such zealous and often ill-natured officials as its machinery has called into existence. We trust it is unnecessary for us to state that we have no wish to add to the popular discontent which prevails upon this subject; but from all parts of the country, as well as of the metropolis, we are weekly inundated with complaints of the arbitrary and tyrannical manner in which the provisions of the act are carried into effect, and it is therefore really necessary that something should be done, and that speedily too, by which this evil may be remedied. Surveyors and assessors appear to have no other object in view than that of unnecessarily annoying the public generally, without reference to the amount of income; for although the act specifies clearly enough that persons whose income is under £150 should be exempt, yet they seem resolved that in no case above absolute pauperism shall their inquisitorial powers be put in abeyance. In London small clerks and office porters have been dragged from their employment to dance attendance on the grand inquisitors; and in the country even railway navigators have not been secure from the intrusion of these disinterested patriots. As a specimen of the way in which the business of the commission has been conducted we beg to subjoin the following paragraph from the last number of a provincial paper called the Aylesbury News:—

Great complaints have been heard in our streets this week. The income-tax commissioners have been assessing the amount of taxation to be levied on her Majesty's lieges in this neighbourhood, and have given a great deal of unnecessary trouble. Parties from all the villages round about here (some of them labourers, earning but 10s. or 12s. a week) were compelled to attend at the court-house on Monday, and were kept waiting two or three days, thus losing their time, and being put to expense and inconvenience. In many cases the costs of the appeal amounted to more than three years' payment of the tax sought to be imposed.

If reliance may be placed on these details, the Income Tax has been rendered more obnoxious and intolerable than even its warmest opponents contemplated.

The great feature of foreign news of the week has consisted in the speech delivered by the King of the French at the opening of the Chambers of Peers and Deputies. This event has been illustrated by us in another department of our journal; but as there the entrenchment of art upon the ground of literature did not permit us to accompany our engravings with the full detail of the occurrence which one of them describes, we avail ourselves of the means of giving it an appropriate position in this column, where it will naturally attract the attention and fix the interest of our readers. It will be found that our Paris correspondent has given a careful narration of the whole ceremonial, besides including in his article a literal translation of the French King's speech. The whole account is eminently graphic and characteristic.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, January 10, 1843.

OPENING OF THE ADJOURNED SESSION OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.

The Chambers renewed their session yesterday, for the brief dynastic one of the new Legislature was confined to the passing of the Regency Bill. It was for a long time doubted whether there would be a royal sitting, but M. Guizot's opinion prevailed in the Council of Ministers, and the customary ceremony was celebrated yesterday, under a splendid sun and blue sky, the usual good fortune having attended Louis Philippe's public days. From the Tuileries to the Palais Bourbon more than ordinary precautions had been adopted. The procession marched between two lines of National Guards and troops of the line, whilst squadrons of cavalry kept off the populace one hundred yards at least from the military lines. Thus nothing but a glimpse of the royal carriages rapidly passing could be obtained by the crowd, and the King's vehicle, by an excess of precaution, had General Jacqueminot at one door and General Gourgaud at the other. The Pont de la Concorde and the Pont Royal were covered with troops. All the posts in the capital were doubled, and the garrisons of the surrounding towns and villages came up as if for a state of siege. The royal corlège precisely at ten o'clock left the Tuileries, the cannon of the Invalides giving the signal. The procession moved thus:—Detachment of the Municipal Guard. Squadron of the National Guards. Generals Carbonel and Aupich, with the Staff of the National Guards and of the Garrison of Paris. The King's carriage, with Equerries, Orderly Officers, and Aides-de-Camp surrounding it. General Bource Sebastiani, with his Staff of the First Military Division (Seine). A squadron of the National Guards. Two carriages, containing the French Marshals, the Duke de Reggio, Count Molitor, Count Gérard, Count Grouchy, Count Valée, and Count Sebastiani, and Admiral Roussin. Six other carriages followed with the royal suite. A squadron of dragoons closed the march. Salvoes of artillery announced the King's arrival at the Chamber, where he was received by the grand deputations of Peers and Deputies. Let me first describe, however, the physiognomy of the interior. As early as eleven o'clock the tribunes or boxes reserved for the public, a united by tickets, began to be filled. The Chamber assumed a different aspect from the last meeting. Then all was mourning. Now elegant toilettes were remarked on the ladies, of varied hues. The crimson velvet canopy, with its fleurons of tri-coloured flags over the royal chair, or throne, was without the weepers of black crape. Two tabourets, or stools, on each side of the King's seat, were placed for the Duke of Nemours, the future Regent, and the Duke de Montpensier, the youngest son of the King. The Duke d'Aumale and the Prince de Joinville are abroad. The assemblage amused the long hours of waiting by criticising the parliamentary stars as they entered. The famous Timon (M. de Cormenin) was much stared at, as the writer who had damaged the royalty of Orleans the most seriously. Odilon Barrot, the leader of the Left, with his bald head and restless action, was decidedly a "lion." The venerable Laffitte, who made the July revolution, and has begged pardon of God at the Tribune for so doing, was at his usual place. General Pajol, whose march to Rambouillet upset the throne of Charles X., and who has been so lately disgraced by Louis Philippe, was the object of much attention. The celebrated orator Berryer, with his fine head and melancholy face, attracted all eyes. He has lately lost his wife, to whom he was much attached, and it has been rumoured that he was going to turn monk and leave the world, but his presence dispelled the rumour. He was warmly greeted by everybody as the faithful champion of a fallen cause. Little Thiers, with his great spectacles and sardonic expression, entered just before Count Molé. The latter looked every inch a peer, and the former did not belie his appearance of a truly Parisian gamin. The entrance of the Corps Diplomatique in the box reserved for them created a buzz. The members thereof were in full uniform, with their stars, orders, &c. The Pope and the Porte excited hilarity by their animated conversation. Count Appony's Hungarian costume and Prince de Ligny's brilliant uniform were declared by the ladies to be unique. The fair Françaises indulged in some jokes at the red coat of Lord Cowley. By the way, I had a sight-seeing hunter from England sent to me. He was indefatigable in his inquiries, and was therefore a bore. His great curiosity was to see Marshal Soult. He mistook the usher of the chamber, a member of the council of state, and divers peers for the gallant Marshal. At last the ministers took their seats on the bench before the throne, and a wag signified to him the corpulent figure of Admiral Duperré, the Minister of Marine, as Marshal Soult. Our Englishman gazed at him for some time, and then exclaimed "Why he is a bigger man than Lablache!" The real Marshal, I am glad to say, looked well. Guizot threw his disdainful glance at the opposition, inviting it to the attack. The entrance of the Royal Family into their box was followed by a marked deferential silence. The Queen was absent from indisposition. The King's sister, the stateswoman-like Princess Adelaide, the pretty and amiable Princess Clementine, and the handsome Duchess of Nemours occupied the box. The Duchess of Orleans and the Count of Paris and the Duke de Chartres, her sons, were absent. Queen Christina was in a tribune, looking less fat, and more handsome. Just before the King entered the Ministers took their seats. I give their names as a guide to the future debates.

Marshal Soult, President of the Council, and Minister of War.
M. Guizot, Foreign Affairs.
M. Duchatel, Interior.
M. Lacave-Laplagne, Finance.
M. Cunin Gridaine, Commerce and Agriculture.
M. Teste, Public Works.

At twenty minutes past one the usher, with a loud voice, cried out "Le Roi," and Louis Philippe entered the passage to the left of the throne. At the dozen steps leading up to it he paused, and took out a large pocket-handkerchief. He ascended amidst a profound silence, and when he bowed to the assemblage there was some cheering. "Sit down, gentlemen," said his Majesty, and down the Chamber sat. Having seated himself, with his sons on each side, he took out the speech, which I subjoin. His voice faltered at the first paragraph, but he coughed and resumed the reading. At the paragraph referring to the Eastern affairs he turned the wrong seat of the speech, and had to recommence the passage. He spoke out in a louder tone on Spanish affairs, which passage was applauded. His Majesty, in the last passage, was much overcome, and the cries of "Vive le Roi" were renewed with greater vigour; but I should, with all impartiality, and not being one of his subjects, designate his reception as cold compared with former occasions. The following was the speech:—

"Messieurs les Pairs, Messieurs les Députés,

"The affection and sympathy of France have sustained my courage. With a heart still lacerated, but full of confidence in your devotedness, in calling upon you in person to resume the course of your labours, I wished to complete now what my grief compelled me to leave incomplete at the opening of your session. You have already done much for the security and future welfare of France, I thank you for it in her name. Whatever may be our trials, I and my family will devote to her service whatever strength and life God may grant to us. Under the favour of order and peace, the national prosperity, attested by the rapid augmentation of the public revenue, developes itself beyond the most sanguine hopes. The firm empire of the laws is the surest guarantee of the general welfare, as it is of the power of the state; and the universally established conviction that the laws will be religiously executed renders less frequent the employment of their severity. I congratulate myself on our having attained this happy result. I feel confident that our prosperity will pursue its course without interruption or obstacle. My relations with foreign powers continue to be pacific and friendly. The concord of the powers has consolidated the repose of the East, and brought about in Syria, for the Christian populations, the re-establishment of a government in conformity with their faith and their wishes. I deplore the troubles which have recently agitated Spain. In my relations with the Spanish monarchy, I have only had in view to protect our legitimate interests, to preserve for Queen Isabella I. a faithful friendship, and to testify for the rights of humanity the respectful succour which honours the name of France. By taking possession of the Islands of the Marquesas, I have insured to our navigators, in those distant seas, an aid and a refuge, the necessity of which had been long felt. Thanks to the persevering efforts of our brave army, our dominion in Algeria becomes everywhere stable and respected. The vigilance and regularity of the Government will complete the work so gloriously carried on by the courage of our soldiers. I have opened with several states negotiations, which will have for effect to give to our agriculture, our commerce, and our manufactures, a more active expansion, and to procure new facilities for our national interests. Financial laws, and divers bills destined to operate important ameliorations in our legislation and government, will be immediately presented to you. Gentlemen, the world is at peace; France is free, active, and happy. I have had, and I shall have, for my only object, to my last hour, to secure these benefits to my country. It is with your constant and loyal co-operation that I have succeeded. You will aid me in maintaining and consummating our common labour. This will be for all the most glorious recompense, and for me the only consolation that I can in future hope for."

After swearing in some new members, the Keeper of the Seals declared the session opened, and the King retired and returned to the Tuileries, amidst salvoes of artillery. One day's ceremony not having been disgraced by the infamous attempt of a would-be regicide or by the insults of a brutal mob—thanks to the arrangements of the authorities, however, more than the moral disposition of the republican ruffians who are to be found amongst this versatile and excitable population. I will add a few details which may prove useful as to the progress of affairs. M. Sauzet remains President, and MM. Salvandy, Bignon, and Debelleyme, Vice-Presidents. General Jacqueminot, the fourth Vice-President, having resigned on account of his nomination as Commander-in-Chief of the National Guards, a fresh election will take place to-morrow. And here a sign of weakness has been already displayed by the Ministry. It had the intention of starting M. Dumon (Lot et Garonne) as the candidate. He is the intimate friend of M. Guizot, and a Doctrinaire; but, the feeling of the Conservatives or the Right having been ascertained, M. Dumon has been withdrawn, and M. Lepetteuer d'Aulnay, a Moliste, is the candidate; but it is believed that M. Thiers's friends, M. Vivien, ex-Minister of Justice, will be elected by the majority. This withdrawal of M. Dumon looks as if the Ministry was weak. The commission on the address will be named to-morrow, and this day the bureaux will be named. The Government will also introduce this afternoon the budget of 1844, the bill for the extraordinary credits, the patent bill, and the sugar project or law. It will be at least a fortnight before the debates on the address begin.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

CLAREMONT, Sunday.—The rain, which poured down in torrents during the whole of Saturday night, having subsided shortly after eight, her Majesty and Prince Albert promenaded for a short time this morning in the immediate vicinity of the mansion. The Princess Royal was also taken out for an airing. Divine service was performed at twelve, before her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the members of the household, by Archdeacon Wilberforce. A sermon was afterwards delivered by the Rev. divine.

MONDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their usual walk in the forenoon, in the grounds at Claremont, between nine and ten o'clock. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out shooting, attended by Lord Rivers, Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. George Edward Anson. The royal party returned to Claremont shortly before two o'clock. The royal dinner party at Claremont comprised only the royal suite. The Princess Royal came to Claremont in the carriage with her Majesty and Prince Albert without any nurse or attendant whatever.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their accustomed early walk in the park. Prince Albert, attended by Mr. Anson, afterwards rode out on horseback, but returned to Claremont to lunch. The Earl and Countess of Rosslyn had the honour of joining the royal circle at Claremont at dinner on Monday evening. It is expected that the Court will not return to the castle until Monday, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert remaining over Sunday at Claremont. The Princess Royal has been enjoying excellent health during her absence from Windsor.

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—We are informed, on authority which may be relied on, that her Majesty and the Court will return to Buckingham Palace for the season in about a fortnight from the present time.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked as usual in the park in the forenoon, and his Royal Highness afterwards shot in the grounds.

The following circular has been sent to all the supporters of Sir Robert Peel's government:—"Whitehall, Jan. 4, 1842. Sir,—I take the liberty of informing you, that the meeting of Parliament having been fixed for Thursday, the 2nd of February, public business of importance will be brought forward without delay. I beg to express an earnest hope that it may be consistent with your convenience to be in attendance at the opening of the session.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

"ROBERT PEEL."

The Marquis of Normanby has left town for Italy, having been recommended to pass the next few months in the south of Europe for the re-establishment of his health.

It is rumoured that a marriage is on the tapis between a lovely and accomplished member of Mr. Leslie, the present candidate for the county Monaghan, and the Right Hon. and Rev. Lord John Beresford, nephew to his Grace the Lord Primate.

Lord Brougham is expected to leave Cannes on Saturday next, for Paris, on his way home. Lady Brougham is still in town, in improved health.

Viscount Melbourne has, during the past week, received a large arty at Brocket-hall, the noble viscount having entirely recovered from the effects of his late illness.

The Dowager Lady Holland gave an elegant dinner on Sunday in Southstreet, to the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, Lord and Lady John Russell, Lord George William Russell, the Earl of Auckland, Hon F. Byng, Mr. Samuel Rogers, and Mr. H. Luttrell.

THE EARL OF COVENTRY.—His lordship, after rallying some time since, has again sunk into an almost hopeless state. An epileptic fit has drawn his mouth on one side, which renders articulation difficult.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. Walter John Clarke, M.A., of the University of Oxford, late minister of Rhode Chapel, Cheshire, has been instituted by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln to the vicarage of Swinderby, in that county, on the presentation of General Clarke, the patron thereof.

The Examiners, appointed by the Board of Control, of candidates for admission at the East India College, in the ensuing term, are the Rev. Thomas Hale, of Jesus College, Cambridge; the Rev. Robert Alfred Eden, late Fellow of Corpus; and the Rev. W. Stone, late Fellow of Brasenose, Oxford.

The Bishop of Lincoln holds his next ordination on the 12th of March, at Lincoln.

CAMBRIDGE.—REGIUS PROFESSORSHIP OF DIVINITY.—The resignation by the Very Rev. Dr. Turton, Dean of Westminster, of the office of Regius Professor of Divinity, has been received, and was read to the Senate. The examination of candidates for the vacant professorship will take place on Tuesday next, the 17th instant, at the schools. We understand the following divines have offered themselves as candidates:—The Rev. John Graham, Master of Christ's College, chaplain to Prince Albert; the Rev. Samuel Lee, Trinity College, Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Prebendary of Bristol; the Rev. William Hodge Mill, Trinity College, Christian Advocate, chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and formerly Principal of Bishop's College, Calcutta; the Rev. Alfred Ollivant, Trinity College, Vice-Principal of St. David's, Lampeter; the Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, Trinity College, Master of Harrow School.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

On Tuesday evening Sir. R. Peel arrived in town at half-past six o'clock, by the London and Birmingham Railway, from his seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. On Wednesday morning the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a long interview with the right hon. bart. in Whitehall-gardens. Several others of the Cabinet Ministers also visited the Premier during the day.

Sir James Graham left town, on Wednesday morning, for Brighton, the right hon. bart. having relinquished his intention of spending a few days at his seat, Netherby, Cumberland.

The Prince Inspector-General transacted business with Mr. Manners Sutton, at the Home Office.

The French Ambassador transacted business on Tuesday, at the Foreign Office. Mr. Dean, Chairman of the Customs, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his official residence in Downing-street.

INCOME TAX.—Upwards of fifteen hundred appeals have been lodged against the assessment of the income tax in the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell. The office of the Commissioners in this district has been the scene of much angry feeling.

The Globe states that a commercial treaty between England and France has just been presented, signed, to the latter Cabinet. It will reduce very considerably the import duties on wines, brandies, and silks, and will afford England fair grounds for demanding reductions on articles of English produce and manufacture.

The Ecclesiastical Commission had a meeting on Tuesday afternoon, at their office in Whitehall-place. The commissioners present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Llandaff, Lord Warncliffe, Lord President of the Council, Sir James Graham, Secretary of State, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

ROBBERIES.—From the house of Miss Young, 14, Felix-terrace, Liverpool-road, a £10 Bank of England note; four sovereigns; 10s. in silver; a gold watch; a silver chronometer, maker's name Barraud, No. 28; a marine chronometer, silver, no name, marked C 7, four table spoons; and three tea spoons. From the person of Mr. William Reason, whilst in the Duke of Gloucester public-house, Gloucester-terrace, Mile End Old Town, three £10 Bank of England notes; two £5 do.; eight sovereigns; and four half-sovereigns; by two men, one 30 or 40 years, 5 feet 9 inches high, with red whiskers and pale complexion; the other 27 years of age, 5 feet 6 inches high, dark complexion, and rather slight made; both dressed in pilot coats.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday morning, shortly before one o'clock, the inhabitants in the neighbourhood of Snow-hill were aroused from their slumbers by loud cries of "Fire," accompanied with the springing of rattles, &c. The first person whose attention was attracted was City police-constable Clyde, 257, by a large body of fire bursting forth from the extensive premises belonging to Mr. Emerton, bricklayer and builder, situated in Fox-court. This property occupied a considerable space of ground, comprising workshops of various descriptions, stabling, and cart-houses, all of which abutted upon the houses in King-street. Being principally constructed of wood, the flames ascended with surprising rapidity, within a very short period enveloping the whole of the premises mentioned above. Although the brigade engines from the different stations were quickly on the spot, a length of time elapsed before they could be got into play, owing to the want of water. The increased alarm of the fears of the neighbours to a great extent. As soon as the supply of water was obtained, it was directed upon the flames from every quarter, but all attempts to save the buildings then on fire were futile; the firemen, therefore, under the direction of Mr. Braidwood, used their utmost energies in saving the adjoining premises, which were several times on fire, but by dint of great exertion the fire was so far got out by two o'clock as to allay all fears of its further extension, but the above premises, we regret to state, were totally consumed. The destruction of property in Fox-yard was very considerable, as the furniture, &c., belonging to the various persons inhabiting the different tenements, were thrown into the street and dashed to pieces. The occupiers, being chiefly poor families and uninsured, will very severely feel the loss. A few minutes before the outbreak, the engines had just returned from a fire at the Dun Cow public-house, in the Old Kent-road, occasioned, it is supposed, through the carelessness of a servant. Several thousand pounds' worth of property was at stake, but through the energy displayed by the inmates and police, the fire was arrested before any great damage was done. On Tuesday morning, about a quarter past two o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. Rhodes, situate in Fountain-court, Strand, and termed the Fountain Tavern and Coal Hole. The discovery was made by Mr. Rhodes, who on going into the passage was surprised at finding the place filled with a dense smoke, and upon entering the store-room, which is situated on the ground floor, he found that place on fire. An alarm was raised, and in the course of a few minutes engines were on the spot. A plentiful supply of water having been obtained, the flames were soon extinguished, but not before they had burnt through into the floor above. Not the least idea could be formed as to how the fire originated.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BARNARD, M.P.—A report has become very general that Mr. Barnard, M.P. for Greenwich, is about to resign his seat in Parliament, and several candidates have been named as about to solicit the suffrage of the voters; but it would be premature to mention their names, until the certainty of Mr. Barnard's resignation is ascertained.

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—A number of workmen are employed, under the Woods and Forests, in preparing both houses for the approaching meeting of Parliament on the 2nd of next month. The men were yesterday engaged in painting, whitewashing, and otherwise renovating the body of the houses, and also the libraries, committee-rooms, lobbies, &c. No material alterations are to be made in the interior of the houses.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday Mr. Higgs held an inquest at the Queen's Head, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, on the body of Margaret Bush, aged 24, waitress in that establishment. Sarah Brand, the housemaid, said, that about eight o'clock on Tuesday morning, being in deceased's bedroom, she asked her whether she was not going to get up; the latter said she was tired, but should rise presently. Seeing that she did not by ten o'clock, another servant went to call her, and found her partly dressed, and half in and half out of bed, and dead. The immediate application of a medical man proved useless. Verdict, "Natural death."—[The number of sudden deaths which have occurred in the Metropolis during the past week is quite unprecedented.]

MURDER AND SUICIDE IN HOXTON NEW TOWN.—At 10 o'clock on Saturday night last a murder and suicide, committed under circumstances of a most distressing nature, caused much excitement amongst the inhabitants of Huntingdon-street, Hoxton New Town and its neighbourhood. It appears that a man named Giles, with his wife and four children, inhabited a house in that street, and were supposed to live on good terms, but latterly he had become very intem, and, being unable to work at his trade, he had been reduced to great poverty. On the evening in question, having got his wife and two of the elder children out of the way, he cut the throats of the remaining two, and afterwards committed suicide. A razor, the instrument with which the injuries upon all had been inflicted was found not far from the body of the murderer. Surgical assistance was immediately sent for, and in a few minutes Messrs. Weston and Beazley arrived, but, as far as Giles and the boy Joseph were concerned, their efforts were useless. The girl Sarah Anne was found to be alive, but extremely weak from loss of blood; hopes are, however, entertained of her recovery. On Monday an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, when, after a number of witnesses were examined, the jury deliberated for short period, and the following was delivered:—"That the deceased Joseph Giles came by his death from a wound inflicted by his father, James Giles, who afterwards destroyed himself while labouring under a fit of temporary insanity."

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The fracas between Sir C. Shakerley and Mr. Smettenham (members of the Cheshire Hunt) which was mentioned in our last, has ended by both parties being held to bail to keep the peace. The latter has since made an apology, which renders a contemplated adjournment of the affair to the Continent unnecessary.——The Annual Masonic ball, in aid of the funds for relieving aged and decayed freemasons, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, on Tuesday evening last, when an elegant party assembled to do honour to the occasion.——A dreadful thunder-storm took place in the neighbourhood of Macclesfield on Tuesday morning last, when several houses were struck with electric fluid and partially injured, but fortunately no lives were lost.——On Tuesday evening the annual ball, in aid of the funds of the Licenced Victuallers' Asylum, was held at the London Tavern, when there was a numerous and respectable attendance of the friends and patrons of that truly charitable institution.——On Tuesday last a carpenter, named Reeves, was employed in cutting a trap-door on the premises of a corn-factor, in the Borough-road, when losing his equilibrum, he fell through and was killed.——An aged lady, named Atkins, residing at Hoxton, committed suicide on Sunday morning last by swallowing a large dose of laudanum.——At the Brighton petty sessions on Tuesday, two powerful-looking fellows were committed to take their trial on a charge of highway robbery, committed in the open day.——On the night of the 13th of November, several shots were fired into the dwelling-house of Edward Haycock, a police officer, situated on Albury Heath; and last Saturday night another attempt was made to murder him, by some villain, who fired a shot through his bedroom window, in the village of Shere. The magistrates of Guildford have offered a reward of £100 for the discovery and apprehension of the perpetrators of these murderous outrages.——During the gale of wind on Tuesday morning, the upper sheathing of the facade at Hyde Park Corner was carried into the ground attached to the keeper's lodge.——The quarterly meeting of the subscribers to the Royal Free Hospital for the gratuitous sick was held on Tuesday evening, when it appeared that the number of patients relieved during the quarter amounted to 4524.——On the 10th inst., Sir James Law Lushington, deputy chairman, and Mr. Farren, resident director of the Asylum for Fatherless Children, had an interview with the Russian plenipotentiary from the court of Prussia, on the subject of establishing branches of that institution in Berlin and other parts of the Prussian dominions.——Mr. Thomas Blackburn, of Bentham, in Lancashire, dined, the last day of the old year and the first day of the new one, on new potatoes grown in the open air. They were the fourth crop raised by him from the same ground during the present year, and he has already planted the same patch of land with a fifth.——The last accounts from Rome speak of the probability that a vicar apostolic will immediately be appointed by the Pope for China.——It has been recently stated, that a new Central Criminal Court would probably be erected on the spacious site where the untenanted prison of the Fleet now stands. The matter has for some time been one of deep consideration by the civil authorities, and it is not unlikely that the building contemplated will be realised.——At Clerkenwell police-office, on Tuesday, twenty-eight of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Sepulchre were summoned for refusing to pay their tithes.——A general meeting of the shareholders of the London Joint Stock Bank was held at the office, in Princes-street, on Wednesday last, when the report and statement of the accounts were unanimously agreed to.——Mr. Vaughan, the once celebrated tenor singer, died at Birmingham, on Monday last, in his sixtieth year.——On Wednesday last, Philip Ward, an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital, who had been many years in the Foot Guards, and served throughout the Peninsular war, proceeded from his residence, in the New-way, Westminster, towards Oxford-market, to receive his pension. He, however, had not gone further than Fall-mall when he was seized with a fit. The old man was placed in a cab and driven home, but on his arrival there he was found to be a corpse.——The government has returned a formal answer to the memorial of the Non-intrusion Convocation lately held in Edinburgh. It is understood to be unfavourable to the claims of the party.——A correspondent sends us the details of a catastrophe which occurred on the London and Brighton railway on Tuesday last, by which several persons were seriously injured, and amongst the rest a poor soldier had his arm broken. We are assured that this occurrence was entirely attributable to the negligence of the company's servant, in allowing the engine to pursue a wrong line, a mistake—if a mistake—which is highly unpardonable, and cannot be too strongly reprehended.——The extensive silk-mills belonging to Messrs. Hurdisty and Co., at Durshill, near Shepton Mallet, were destroyed by fire on Tuesday evening last.——The weather still remains very unsettled. A sharp frost prevailed during Tuesday night, and the ponds in the vicinity of town were next morning covered with ice of a considerable thickness. The thermometer at noon stood at freezing point in an exposed situation; wind north-east. Towards evening the mercury rose slightly, and the wind moderated. A heavy fall of snow took place between seven and eight o'clock, which continued at intervals throughout the night and during Thursday.——A tract of good land, about 90 miles long, extending from the River Gieneig to the seacoast in South Australia, has been lately discovered, in which several extinct craters have been found filled with water.——The floating breakwater constructed by Captain Groves has withstood the fury of the recent storm uninjured, and at length promises complete success.——A gentleman named O'Brien, residing at Phœnix Lodge, Cheltenham, was suddenly seized with a fit whilst playing at billiards, and expired on the spot.——Another awful instance of sudden death occurred to the Earl of Carlisle's porter, at that nobleman's residence in Grosvenor-place, Pimlico, on Sunday last, who, having dined heartily, took his usual seat in the hall chair, and immediately expired.——The remains of the late Major-General Drummond were interred in the churchyard at Plumstead on Monday. The funeral was strictly private.——Mr. Purvis, Whitehill Cottage, Chester-le-Street, gathered in his garden at that place, on Monday, the 2d inst., a nosegay composed of carnations, picotees, and pinks, crimson, pink, yellow, and white Chinese roses, Christmas roses, double and single stocks, and wallflowers, a great variety of polyanthuses and auriculas, forget-me-nots, pansies, sweet-williams, lupins, hypericums, floxes, fuchsias, with a variety of other flowers in great perfection.——The Triton convict-ship, which left the River Thames, with 250 convicts on board, on the 4th of August last, for Hobart Town, Van Diemen's Land, arrived at the Cape of Good Hope on the 26th of October. She lost one soldier, one sailor, who fell overboard during a gale, and one convict, during the passage from England to the Cape. The convicts, generally, were very healthy, although their passage had been sometimes boisterous, and expected to arrive at Hobart Town about the middle of December.——On Tuesday morning a spirited cart-horse was frightened by the band of the Grenadier Guards playing in the New-road, when, dashing off at a furious rate, the cart was smashed to atoms, and the horse forced into the area-gate of 84, Gloucester-place, down the steps of which he was precipitated without injury, but the owner has been unable since to extricate him.——A sailor belonging to a schooner fell overboard opposite Woolwich on Tuesday last, and, being reduced to the last extremity was fortunately rescued by the crew of the Syren steamboat, the captain's presents of mind having suggested the most prompt assistance.——At the half-yearly meeting of the friends and supporters of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, held on Monday last, at the London Tavern, it was stated in the report that during the last fifty years of the society's operations 1800 deaf and dumb children had been taught to read, write, and cipher, to correspond with others by means of signs, and to understand the truths of the Christian religion.——Last week an accident occurred on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, owing to the negligence of the breaksman, by which several of the company's servants were seriously but not dangerously injured.——A wall upwards of twenty feet high, situate in High-street, Wapping, fell on Saturday evening, but luckily without any sacrifice of human life, which was the more providential as it occurred in a much-frequented thoroughfare.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

CLAREMONT, Thursday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in Claremont Park in the morning. The Prince afterwards went out shooting.—The Princess Royal rode in the park on a pony.—In the afternoon her Majesty and her august consort walked to the garden, and promenaded some time.—The royal dinner party included the Duchess of Norfolk, Lord Rivers, the Hon. C. A. Murray, Mr. Anson, and Major-General Wemyss.—The expected stag-hunt in the vicinity of Claremont was countermanded, in consequence of the unfavourable state of the weather.

The Duchess of Kent has been unremitting in her attention to the Prince of Wales during the absence of the royal parents.

Sir Robert Peel does not intend returning to Drayton Manor previous to the meeting of Parliament. Lady Peel and family are expected in Whitehall-gardens to-morrow. Several of the Cabinet Ministers visited the right hon. baronet this morning.

We are deeply concerned to observe by the accounts from the provinces that incendiary fires are becoming alarmingly frequent in almost all parts of the country.

We regret to record the demise of Lieut. Colonel Bejamin Bunce, and also of Admiral Thomas Alexander, who expired on Tuesday last at his residence in Hampshire.

A frightful accident occurred on the North Midland Railway, on Wednesday, by which a commercial gentleman from Glasgow, whose name has not yet reached us, was killed on the spot. It occurred in consequence of a luggage train running into the passenger train, by which the carriages were all smashed to pieces, and the engine of the former greatly injured. The catastrophe is attributed to the culpable stupidity of the engineer. The head of the unfortunate deceased was cut completely off.

A shipwreck is reported to have occurred on the Irish Coast near Balintore, by which seven lives have been lost.

An Irish provincial paper has the following startling announcement:—"A list of the subscribers to the reward for the murder of James Scully, Esq., appears in our columns of this day!"

COURT OF CHANCERY, FRIDAY.—BLUNDELL v. GLADSTONE—JUDGMENT.—This was a suit instituted to ascertain the validity of the will of Sir Wm. J. Rowan Catholic gentleman, who died possessed of large property. It was contended by the party opposing the will, that it was not sufficiently explicit to carry out the bequests and intentions of the testator, and therefore that the heir-at-law (Lord Canoy) was entitled to the property. When the case was heard before the Vice-Chancellor of England, his honour decided in favour of the validity of the will. Against that decision an appeal was brought. The case has frequently been before the public.—This morning the Lord Chancellor gave judgment on the appeal. His lordship, after going through the facts attending the case, said, he was of opinion the Vice-Chancellor had come to a right decision, and therefore the appeal must be discharged, and that with costs.—Judgment of the court below affirmed. This decis on establishes the validity of the will.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, FRIDAY.—SMITH v. BOOTH.—This was a motion made by the Solicitor-General on behalf of the defendant, to reduce the verdict, obtained by the plaintiff at the sittings after sat term, from £2500 to £500, in the celebrated gambling case, tried before Lord Abinger, and which was noticed in this pa er at considerable length at the time.—The court granted a rule nisi.

PARIS, Wednesday.—The Deputies met on Wednesday afternoon to nominate the commission to draw up the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The following are the names:—M. Felix Real, M. Odilon Barrot, M. Dumon, M. Schauenburg, M. Begrion, M. Dupin, M. Debelleyme, M. Hebert, and M. Paillet. The only opposition candidate in the above list is M. Odilon Barrot, the leader of the Liberal Left. M. Dupin, who is the supporter of the last address, will probably be chosen this time. He is a Doctrinaire, and intimate friend of M. Guizot. As may be anticipated, the debates in the standing committees were very animated, the right of search question being the cheval de bataille of the opposition. M. Thiers, Berryer, Dufaure, and Salvandy were present in the fourth bureau, but as the Ministry was in a decided majority, they made no remarks. M. de Carne, who is of the Molé party, was for the complete abrogation of the 1831 and 1833 treaties; but M. Schauenberg replied that it was much better to leave the initiative to the Executive. M. Odilon Barrot had 20 votes over 18 given to M. D'Arblay; M. Dumon (Lot and Garonne) had 21 over 16 for M. de Remusat, ex-Thiers Ministry; M. Bignon had 20 over 17 for M. Billault (Thiers's friend). The opinion of the majority in all the bureaux appeared to be, that some modifications of the right of search might take place without any extreme measures.

OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.

DELIVERY OF THE KING'S SPEECH.—See page 22

(From our Paris Correspondent.)

Our artist is old-fashioned enough to give the precedence to the peers. Our Gallic neighbours would be indignant if it were not bestowed on the Deputies. De gustibus, &c.—the saying is musty, but doctors always will differ as to French and English customs. Well, then, there is the Luxembourg in all its glory before you; its rulers have changed pretty often, but the copy of the Florence Pitti Palace remains unimpaired by time. Mary de Medicis, the widow of Henri Quatre, built it in 1612, and the architect was Desbrosses. The original site was the hotel of the Duc d'Epinay Luxembourg. Mademoiselle de Montpensier and the Duchess de Guise have been domiciled therein. In 1694 Louis XIV. bought it of the latter, and subsequently the Duchess of Brunswick and Mademoiselle d'Orleans resided at the palace. It returned to the crown under Louis XVI., who gave it to Monsieur. In the revolutionary period the Luxembourg was converted into a prison. Under the Consulate it was a Senate, and now it is the Chamber of Peers. Since the "glorious three days" it has been the high tribunal before which have appeared the regicides, the republicans, the royalists, and the imperialists. I have seen standing at the bar of the Court of Peers the ministers of Charles X., the republicans of Paris and Lyons, Fieschi and his accomplices of infernal-machine memory, Barbès, Darmes, Alibaud, Meunier,

THE LUXEMBOURG, OR CHAMBER OF PEERS.

Quenisset, Prince Louis Napoleon, &c.—a strange medley of men. Who may yet figure before this court, who can dare predict? The building itself is nearly a square. The front towards the Rue Tournon and the garden is 360 feet long, and the remaining fronts about 300. There are four square pavilions in one extensive court surrounded by porticoes. Our sketches represent a view of the façade of the palace on the side of the garden, with an angle of the basin. The second depicts a portion of the façade in the Rue de Vangirard, seen from the Rue de Tournon. The garden of the Luxembourg is the only public promenade for the Faubourg St. Germain. There are several fine statues and vases, and there is a noble alley having for perspective the Observatory. At the extremity of this alley, on the vacant spot between the railing of the Luxembourg-garden and that of the Observatory, Napoleon's "bravest of the brave," Marshal Ney, was shot in 1815. The wall with some blood stains is still pointed out. Next to the garden of the Tuileries, those of the Luxembourg take precedence. In some respects the elevated positions of the latter render them superior to any Parisian promenade. There is a large sheet of water, and the walks are ornamented with orange trees. The alterations and improvements in these gardens of late years have been very extensive. The light and elegant dome of Doric and Ionic orders is very striking. The Luxembourg gallery of paintings contains a collection of the works of modern French masters. Many of the masterpieces have been removed to the Louvre. The saloon assigned to the Peers is semicircular in form. The seats are arranged in the form of an amphitheatre. The Chancellor of France and President, Baron Pasquier, occupies a seat in a recess facing the Peers. The state prisoners on their trial are ranged in this recess in the form of a bar, and the President's seat is removed to their left; whilst the crown lawyers sit opposite the Chancellor, and the counsel of the accused just under them. Exactly fronting the President's chair are the tribunes for the reporters. The galleries assigned to the public, admitted only by tickets, are to the right and left of that of the press. The gold-laced embroidery of the blue dress-coats of the Peers, give them rather a footman-like appearance; but amongst the veterans of the empire there are some fine-looking men. Baron Pasquier is dignified as the Chancellor, and the Grand Referendary, the Duc Decazes, has a fine head. It is impossible to mistake the noble bearing of Count Molé amongst the Peers. He is what is rare to find amongst Frenchmen, even of rank, really a gentleman. He shows blood in everything. As the Peers are only created by the King for life, there have been some singular introductions as the old Peers have dropped off; and, to keep up the number, it has been found requisite to pension a few. The Chamber of Peers has no signs of a political existence. Its only attribute now is that of a court of justice, and since 1830 the procès monstre has been almost an annual affair.

THE PALAIS BOURBON, OR CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

This chamber holds its sittings in the ancient Bourbon Palace, situated Rue de l'Université, opposite that of Bourgogne, and on the Quai d'Orsay, opposite the bridge of Louis XV., or, as it is more often called, Pont de la Concorde. This edifice was begun in 1722, but it is to Napoleon that the façade on the side of the Seine, with its superb peristyle, is due. It consists of twelve colossal columns of the Corinthian order, surmounted by a triangular and finely-proportioned pediment. A magnificent flight of steps leads to the peristyle. At the foot of those steps are colossal statues of Minerva, France, Sully, Colbert, L'Hopital, and D'Agueseau. The gardens attached to the Palais Bourbon, with a terrace 300 feet long, command a fine view of the Champs Elysées, Tuileries, Place Louis XV., the villages of Chaillot, Passy, Auteuil, &c. The entrance to the Chamber of Deputies is literally speaking by the Rue de Bourbon, and it is quite picturesque to see the royal procession pass under the portico with its Corinthian colonnade on each side, leading to a court 280 feet long and 162 broad. The Chamber for the Deputies is in the form of a half circle. The ministerial bench is in the front row, and behind are ranged the seats of the Deputies, rising one above the other. The tribune or the rostrum, with a flight of steps on each side, faces the Deputies. Just above this tribune is the president's chair. When there is a royal sitting this tribune is entirely removed, and a platform with a chair on the summit is placed in its stead. It may perhaps be useful to designate the state of parties in the Chambers, as expressed by the seats they occupy. The Extreme Right, or l'Extrême Droit, are benches occupied by the partisans of the banished and elder branch of the Bourbons, deposed, in 1830, by the younger branch, or the Orleans family. The Extrême Droit Deputies are called sometimes Carlists, sometimes Royalists, but more often Legitimatists, from their upholding the divine right of succession, in opposition to the popular principle. The Côté Droit, or Right Side, seats are occupied by Conservatives or Monarchists: these Deputies would (in the majority) just as lieve have Henri Cinq as Louis Philippe; for, strange as it may appear, the adherents from affection to the Orleans family count but perhaps one hundred really devoted men in the Chamber. The Conservatives are, in short, either Royalists or Orleanists, as circumstances turn up. The Centre Droit are Ministerialists. The Centre Gauche, or Left Centre, Deputies are now split into two fractions; one is headed by Thiers, and the other is the Dufaure-Passy portion, which separated from Thiers when the coalition was broken up in 1839. The Gauche, or Left, side benches are occupied by the Odilon Barrot and Lherbette parties. This is called sometimes the Dynastic Opposition; meaning that it will go to the extreme of Liberalism, but with a monarch to reign, but not to rule. The Extrême Gauche, or Extreme Left, are Bonapartists, Radicals, and Republicans.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXVI.

SIR HENRY POTTINGER.

Sir Henry Pottinger is the present British Plenipotentiary in China, where he has been entrusted with the difficult task of negotiating with the authorities of the "flowery land," a task which it is universally allowed he has most successfully executed. In truth he is an admirable specimen of the class of diplomatists the best fitted of all others to meet the craft, dissimulation, and treachery which, though often too prevalent in European diplomatic agents, prevail to an incredible extent among the political chiefs of the East, and most of all among those of the Chinese. It is no derogation to the Talleyrands and Metternichs of Europe to say that in finesse, plausibility, and all the specious devices that can be used to cover a total want of sincerity, they are exceeded by the mandarins and commissioners of the Celestial Empire. Intercourse with them on any recognised principles has long been the despair of diplomacy. Two costly embassies, undertaken for the express purpose of establishing more intimate relations with them, proved utter failures. When the charter of the East India Company expired, and the trade with China was made an open one, the disputes, which had been frequent enough in the time of the Company, became multiplied, and the difficulties of carrying on an intercourse with those who alone had the power of settling them became more and more confirmed. Then followed the rapid spread of the opium trade, the prohibitions of the traffic, the consequent contraband introduction of the drug, and the seizure of the property of the English merchants in the factory of Canton, the last proceeding making all former causes of quarrel petty and insignificant in the comparison. The history of the transactions which ensued is a long and wearying detail of negotiations that led to no result, and explanations that produced no mutual understanding. This first stage was closed by the melancholy death of the high-spirited Lord Napier, who sank under the efforts he made to settle the disputes on both sides, without resorting to the last extremity—an appeal to arms—the issue of which to the Chinese all but themselves plainly foresaw; he failed, however, and died worn out with fatigue of body and anxiety of mind. The next plenipotentiary was Captain Elliott, under whom the affairs that had been bad enough before, became, if anything, rather worse, inasmuch as they were conducted during a period which was neither one of peace nor war, but an anomalous combination of both. It should be borne in mind, however, that Captain Elliott was exposed to an awful degree of responsibility, and was for a long space of time left to act without any instructions from the home Government, a piece of neglect which has never been satisfactorily explained. Under such circumstances it was almost impossible for any man to act with effect; still he concluded a treaty with the Chinese Government, by the terms of which Canton was ransomed, and the island of Hong-Kong ceded to the English. The terms did not give satisfaction at home, and Captain Elliott was superseded as plenipotentiary by the subject of our sketch, who was nominated to the charge by the Melbourne Ministry in the very last days of its power. Before Sir Henry Pottinger reached his destination, which was in the month of May, 1842, the Government by which he had been appointed had ceased to exist, but his fitness for the task entrusted to him was proved by his being continued in it by their successors. Captain Elliott returned to England: he left behind him the esteem and respect of a large number of personal friends, but a general impression that, as a negotiator, he wanted both dignity and decision. He was assailed by a portion of the Conservative press, but their attacks ceased after the eulogium of his personal character and abilities pronounced by Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons.

Immediately on the arrival of Sir H. Pottinger a complete change came over the spirit in which the operations had been conducted. He was accompanied by Sir W. Parker, as commander of the naval force; and the first result of their vigorous exertions was the capture of Amoy. This was followed up by movements, of which the details are too familiar to the public to be recapitulated here; they terminated with the entry of an English naval force into the Yellow River, and with the English guns bearing, it may be said, on the walls of the capital of China. Sir H. Pottinger dictated the terms of a treaty in every way advantageous to the interests of this country. The only doubt is, whether it will be observed after the force to which it was conceded is withdrawn.

Sir H. Pottinger is a colonel in the service of the East India Company, and before he was selected for the management of affairs in China he had had considerable experience in the diplomacy required to deal with the demi-civilization of the East, as political resident of the Company in the district of Cutch. As a gentleman both by birth and education, we have no doubt that his manners are distinguished by the suaviter in modo; but he is a soldier also, and his countenance indicates by its expression that he can soon apply the fortiter in re, if the first mode fails. Protocols, and political notes, and all the formalities required by the etiquette of the "red tape" school, would be quite thrown away in the regions watered by the Indus or the Ganges, or within the belt of the Great Wall. There the only chance of bringing things to a conclusion is to have all demands backed up by balls and bayonets. All other systems have always failed; and Sir C. Napier in Syria and Sir H. Pottinger in China owe their success to the same cause, the being able to say, "Do this or else ————." The reader can supply the alternative. It is understood that the gallant negotiator, having accomplished all that could be expected, is desirous of returning home, but that it is probable he will be requested to remain to see what turn affairs are likely to take—a precaution far from unnecessary. Sir Henry is the second son of Eldred Curwen Pottinger, Esq., and is the first baronet of the name, the baronetcy having been bestowed on him in 1839.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXIII

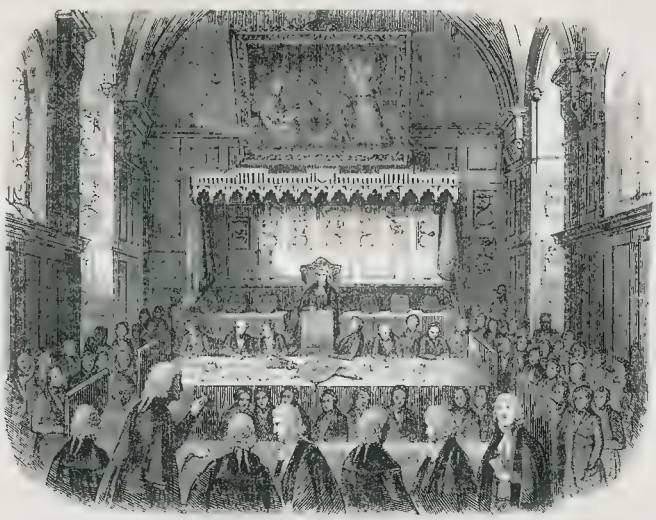
RICHMOND CHURCH.

Pursuing our way up the river from Fulham Church, the subject of our last illustration of the ecclesiastical buildings of London and its environs, we arrive at Richmond. The scenery around this gem of the Thames,—its undulating glades, woody knolls, bold eminences, and delightful prospects—with the queenly river gliding all stately, the brightest feature in the landscape—long since gained for Richmond the praises of poets, the study of painters, and the patronage of pleasure-seeking cits. And right well and truly does the spot deserve every encomium passed upon it, for nature has been bountiful in congregating here all those various beauties of surface, foliage, and water, which singly render a spot interesting, but together make it beautiful. The charms of many a rural spot through broad England—delightful perhaps as this -have been left unhonoured and unsung, condemned, as the poet sings, "to blush unseen." Not so with Richmond. Her glades have been the hunting grounds of princes, her heights the seats of palaces, her quiet hedgerows the musing-places of poets and of painters. Here Thomson wrote his "Seasons," gleaning in this neighbourhood those rural images which he has transferred indelibly as a lasting picture of nature, and a masterpiece for the literature of his country. Nor was he ungrateful, as his oft-quoted lines, glowingly recounting the charms of Richmond, most fully testify. Here also lived Sir Joshua Reynolds—the first of Royal Accmedic Presidents and of English portrait painters—the friend of the massive Johnson, and of the versatile and graceful Goldsmith the talented Sir Joshua, who combined with great love and comprehensive knowledge of nature all the niceties of execution which the highest walk of art requires, and to the mind of a master added the manners of a gentleman. And—going back in order of time—here another author, who has left his stamp upon our literature, spent a portion of his life, for with Richmond is connected the names of Swift, Stella, and Sir William Temple. During his stay upon the Continent, Sir William had, by his talents and character, attracted the notice of the Prince of Orange, and when in after years that prince had become King William, he renewed his intimacy with the English King—now his subject—and often did they walk pleasantly together in the gardens of the old priory at Richmond. During Sir William's illness, Swift is said to have had the honour of the King's companionship, and been taught by him "how to cut asparagus in the Dutch fashion," and receiving from the monarch the offer of being made a captain of horse! The Dean of St. Patrick's a courtier, and the proposed captain of a troop! It sounds strangely. Not alone artists, however, and authors, but actors, too, have linked their memories with this spot. Here lived, and lies buried, Mary Ann Yates, in her day a celebrated tragic actress. She died in 1787. Near her remains lie those of James Ferry, described as "of the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden," also known in his time as a talented actor; and last, here slumber the ashes of Edmund Kean, to mark the spot of whose sepulture a small tablet has been raised, but whose genius, as a representative of Shakspere's characters, has rendered his memory superior to all monumental aids.

The church itself is an unpretending structure, having at its western extremity a low embattled tower, built of stone and flints. It has a nave and chancel and two aisles, and contains the monuments of various persons of consideration—some of them contemporary with, and the servants of, Queens Mary and Elizabeth, and King Charles the Second. An old admiral (Holbourn) also has a tomb here; and a Mr. Lewis, a barrister, claims a posthumous renown by the singularity of his epitaph; while the record of Thomson's death, in 1748, also finds a place. The building is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen.

In royal memories Richmond is particularly rich. It gained its name from the Earl of Richmond, whose accession to the English throne as Henry the Seventh gained him less renown than became his from the simple fact of a dramatist, one William Shakspere, having chosen him as an actor in a drama, as the opponent of the "crooked-backed tyrant," Richard. Before Henry the Seventh's day Richmond had been a royal residence—indeed a palace stood here as early as Edward the First's time, and was known as the palace of Sheen. In this building Edward the Third closed his long and victorious reign; and Henry the Seventh, who had given it his name, and still later, Elizabeth "the maiden Queen," here laid down the crown of England at the feet of their superior, Death. Here bluff Harry the Eighth first essayed those feats of tilt and tourney which he afterwards repeated in the Field of the Cloth and Gold: here Wolsey lived in regal state, after he had given Hampton to that royal master who afterwards deserted him; and here was nursed that last hope of the Stuarts—the Pretender. With all these memories added to the glory of its scenery, who shall deny to Richmond the tribute of a passing visit, or doubt the right of its quaint old church to a place among the more architectural, but perhaps not more interesting, churches of the metropolis?

TABLET TO THE MEMORY OF KEAN



THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

COMMENCEMENT OF HILARY TERM.

We take the opportunity of the commencement of Hilary Term to present our readers with several illustrations of those great sanctuaries of justice, the Courts of Law, which are on the occasion of opening the term the scene of several ceremonies of a more than usually interesting character. The chief feature of the day is the procession of those venerable dispensers of justice and oracles of wisdom, the Judges of the land, through Westminster Hall to the various Courts. This is an occasion of great interest, which awakens feelings of the most exciting character in the breast of every reflecting observer. It is indeed a spectacle of the most imposing kind, and one which may well raise in English bosoms a sentiment of pride in the popular character of their glorious institutions. Purposes of the most important character are sub-served by it: the majesty of the law is thus brought home to the popular mind, and the Judges, the embodied images of its sanctity, are brought into close contact with members of every rank and class of their fellow-countrymen. We will shortly place before our readers the leading features of this ceremonial, and then we will ask them to accompany us into the interior of the Courts of Law.

About half-past one the Judges' carriages arrive from the private residence of the Lord Chancellor, where the Judges have breakfasted, at the great door of Westminster Hall, which, as well as the wider area of Palace-yard, is thronged with a multitude of men, drawn together from all quarters of the great metropolis, and its adjacent territory, to gaze upon the scene there presented to their eyes. Here you may see men of independent fortunes—landed gentlemen and magistrates of the county of Middlesex or Surrey, or wealthy merchants from the City. There you will perceive a knot of gaping rustics—farmers or labourers; in another corner a group of unwashed artisans, in their ordinary working attire; but the bulk of the spectators are evidently, from their respectable appearance, composed of individuals belonging to that immense, important, and influential body, the middle classes of the capital. There is, as may be supposed, a large intermixture of persons connected with the profession of the law, in some of its many departments; barristers, attorneys, and their clerks, with numerous persons employed in offices about the Courts. Occasionally you may perceive the shovel-hat and wig of some clergyman of the old school, the scarlet uniform of our gallant soldiers, or the tarpaulin hat and blue jacket of some jolly tar. All are eager for the show, and about the expected time of its commencement the buzz of conversation becomes louder, and proclaims the impatience of the crowd. The Judges having arrived, then alight from their carriages, an avenue through which they may advance is formed by the crowd, who divide themselves into two dense bodies, and the bustle and noise is immediately succeeded by a profound and respectful stillness. They advance with grave and dignified pace up the passage opened for them, ascend the stairs which lead to their respective Courts, and enter their halls. While this is proceeding it is interesting to note the varying demeanour of the surrounding spectators. The most general impression appears to be that of awe and respect, which is testified unmistakably by the countenances of the throng. Sometimes one of the lower class, perhaps a poor tatterdemalion with his clothes hanging raggedly about him, anxious to attract the notice of some of the Judges, and to be honoured by a bow from one of those great magistrates, will thrust himself forward from the line, and bending low and almost to the ground, salute and be saluted by the Judge as he passes. Occasionally you detect among the groups of faces the sinister leer of some secret contemner of the laws of his country, or the savage scowl impressed on the repulsive features of the criminal.

Let us now pause for a moment to contemplate the interior of the Courts, now thronged with members of the bar, arrayed in all their panoply of wig and gown. And first of the Court of Chancery. When one thinks of the succession of great and venerable Judges who have filled the high office of Chancellor, and uttered their decisions from the elevated bench before us, one is constrained to admit that this island contains within its borders no more solemn or important locality. From the days of Sir Thomas More to those of Lyndhurst it has been the scene where great events have taken place, where lawsuits which have lasted for centuries have been terminated, and litigations have been solved which concerned property of the value of millions. Here sate More, whom the tyrannical Henry deprived of his head, for conscientiously adhering to, and fearlessly expressing, his religious creed, in violation of every principle of justice and liberty. Here sate the proud and pampered Wolsey, bloated with the spoils of a nation, and surrounded by a numberless train of obedient servitors, looking up to his slightest nod with awe. Here sate the mighty law-giver of nature, the wonderful Bacon—who, as well as his predecessor Wolsey, was destined to afford a striking example of the instability of human greatness and prosperity, in the just punishment of his misdeeds by that law whose most sacred interests he had himself betrayed, and to have the ingredients of his poisoned chalice commended to his own lips. Here sate the honest and strong-minded Whitelocke, the just minister of a daring usurper, who preserved his purity of heart and soul unsullied through all the vicissitudes of his changeful times. Here, too, sate the corrupt Macclesfield, who condescended to take bribes from those to whom he sworn duly and truly to administer justice in the law. Here sate the venerable Eldon; and, to come to our own times, those rival luminaries of equity and law, Lords Brougham, Cottenham, and Lyndhurst.

"The greatest, wisest, meanest of mankind?"—

The Court of Queen's Bench has been the scene of events perhaps not less remarkable, and its judicial seat has been tenanted by men equally eminent in their own department. It was at Guild Hall, in the City, that the celebrated trials connected with the Popish plot, and with the accusations for witchcraft, which cost so many innocent persons their lives, occurred. But within our own days, the area of the court at Westminster has been thronged on more than one occasion of surpassing interest. Here occurred the trial of Lord De Ros, with all its famous exposures of gambling and profligacy among a certain class of the aristocracy. Here too the Canadian prisoners, accused of participating in the insurrection of 1838, were brought up for judgment. We well remember being present when they were brought into the court fettered and unmanacled, under the escort of Mr. Cope, the governor of Newgate, and a detachment of powerful-looking criminal officers; and the clink of the hammers, as the handcuffs were taken from their wrists, seemed to be sounding in our ears at this moment. It was in this court that the great Sir Matthew Hale, that most upright, sagacious, and independent of all Judges, presided. It was in this Court that the hardly less great Lord Mansfield for twenty years gave forth those decisions which were and are regarded as oracles by succeeding generations of lawyers. We are loth to call to mind the career of some of those great men, and the humble beginnings of their great fortunes—from what low sources they took their rise, against what difficulties they struggled in their ascent to eminence, by what formidable political obstacles they were opposed, and to what a pitch of greatness and power they at length attained, we cannot omit impressing upon our readers the weight of their example, and pointing out to all who may peruse our present observations a splendid field of ambition which is open to all, if they will but pursue their ends with the same spirit of honest ingenuity, industry, and perseverance which proved successful in the cases of these great ornaments of the legal profession.

The Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas have also ranked among their Judges many eminent names, although less brilliant than those we have enumerated. It was in the latter that Tenterden so long presided with such uniform ability and impartiality, and here he laid the foundation of that code of commercial jurisprudence which now obtains. Here too took place the celebrated action of Norton v. Melbourne, in the year 1836.

But want of space now compels us to bring our remarks to a close.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Sunday and Monday were chiefly occupied with the advices from India respecting the evacuation of Afghanistan, and the destruction of the bazaar, which supply the French journalists with causes to vituperate the British troops. The Conservative Débats and Presse, as well as the Republican National, obstinately refuse to see anything in their remarks on what they designate "barbarities without cause or excuse." We will remark that the Parisian prints rely on the extravagant accounts of the Indian press, and not on the official despatches, for their data.

Some disturbances had taken place at Nantes, in consequence of the high price of provisions. The markets had been entirely deserted, the people in the neighbouring districts refusing to bring their produce, for fear of being plundered. The National of that town, on the 6th instant, states that the disturbance had partially subsided, but the markets still remained unsupplied. "Several of the National Guards," it says, "who were proceeding to the Town hall, were at that date disarmed and insulted. To-day the markets are, as the preceding days, totally destitute of provisions. The troops of the line occupy the streets, but no tumultuous assemblage has taken place as on the preceding days. Detachments of cavalry have been despatched to procure a supply of provisions for the town, but none have yet arrived. Further reinforcements of troops are expected, but we trust they will not be necessary, as everything appears more tranquil than yesterday."

The Paris Opposition journals of Tuesday are not sparing in their condemnation of the King's speech on Monday. They all, more or less, express disappointment and anger at the absence of any allusion to the treaties of 1831 and 1833. The paragraph relative to Spain is regarded by the Opposition journals as highly equivocal. They observe that it amounts to nothing more than a declaration in favour of Queen Isabella, leaving to the French Government the interpretation of the way in which its friendship is to be manifested towards her.

The Débats contains an analysis of the accounts from Spain, mixed up with observations anything but friendly to the Regent and his ministers. Considering the connexion of this journal with the Court party, the article leaves no doubt of the feelings which inspired the allusion to Spain in the King's speech, although pourparlers, to prevent the French Government from going further than the exhibition of its dissatisfaction. The Presse inserts a letter from Madrid, charging the British minister in that capital with having taken part in discussions with the Regent and his Council relative to some pretended remonstrances by the Duke de Glucksberg. According to the Presse, Mr. Aston is constantly endeavouring to exc.te hostility between the French and Spanish Cabinets.

SPAIN.—MADRID, Dec. 31.—The squadron of the United States of America, which had so long remained stationary at Port Mahon, has removed, for what they call winter quarters, to Genoa, although there is hardly any winter in the Mediterranean, and although the port of Genoa is far more distant from their scene of action—Tangiers and Morocco, to watch which the fine new French steamers must be more conveniently situated. A full understanding with the authorities and inhabitants, rising out of the assassination of a man, occasioned the removal. The American Ambassador here has nothing whatever to do with this squadron, which receives its orders from the Navy Department at Washington directly; and as the political relations between Spain and the United States are in a state of dead calm compared to the excitement between this and certain European countries, Mr. Washington Irving will have plenty of leisure to finish his new historical novel, "The Moors in Spain," which he has now in hand.

JAN. 2.—The Regent entered the city on horseback, surrounded by a large and brilliant staff, among whom were Generals Rouli, Grasis, Ferres, and Iriarte. The Regent repaired immediately to the palace, and the troops filed off under the balcony. The procession passed off without any activity, and at three o'clock the Regent returned to Buena Vista, apparently much fatigued. The illumination in the evening was very partial. The general opinion is that a decree will immediately be issued for the assembling of the Cortes on the 6th.

A council of ministers was held in the evening on the day of the Regent's arrival. No decree has come to pressing the business of the session, but a belief prevailed that the Cortes would be dissolved. The Regent was much fatigued, and confined himself to his chamber, leaving the duchess to receive the authorities and foreign ministers, who called to pay their respects.

JAN. 4.—The Regent dissolved the Cortes by decree this day. The new Cortes are convoked for the 3rd of April.

The Regent has ever since found some relief, and his sufferings have nearly ceased. Repose was very necessary for him. Count Almodovar is still suffering.

The decree dissolving the Cortes, published in this day's Gazette, has produced a lively sensation, because attention is naturally directed to the consequences that this important act may produce. As to the measure itself, circumstance had rendered it unopposable; the coalition had taken up such a position that any accommodation between it and the Executive Power was henceforth impossible. The Catalonian Deputies were in a state of excitement, which might from one minute to another become factious. The Government was aware that a furious accusation had been drawn up already against the Ministry by the Deputy Aimether, and that this accusation, expressed in the most energetic terms, was to have been laid upon the table in the first meeting of the Chambers. All this was an unfavourable symptom for the immediate resumption of legislative business.

The Ministry, which takes upon itself the responsibility of this measure, does not appear disposed to retire actually; at least, nothing announces it. However, it is generally believed that a modification of the Cabinet will take place soonest. Isturiz, M. Gonzales and Infante are spoken of as likely to be called upon to direct the general elections.

AMERICA.—The New York packet-ship, New York, Captain Cropper, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, bringing dates from that city to the 19th ult., inclusive of eight passengers.

We are sorry to state, that the Canadian papers announce that Sir C. Bagot was much worse, and that hopes were entertained of his recovery. Sir R. Jackson will convene the new parliament, and act as Governor pro tem.

A great sensation had been caused at New York by the arrival of the United States brig, Somers, from a cruise on the coast of Africa, during which her crew, encouraged by a midshipman named Spencer, had mutinied, and formed a plan to run away with the vessel to the capital and hoist the pennant overboard. This was discovered through one of the crew, and the midshipman and two ringleaders were sentenced by a drum-head court-martial to be hanged at the yard-arm, and the sentence upon the last was carried into execution immediately. The affair took place off St. Thomas's.

Congress has transacted no further business of importance. The weather, both in the States and Canada, was very severe, and the ice had not yet suspended. In business matters there was nothing new; the rate of exchange was the same as at last advices. The Britannia's news had not reached New York on the 19th; she having left here on the 4th for Boston, it was hourly expected.

HONDURAS.—We have received a file of the Belize Gazette to the 19th of November. The intelligence from Peten, arrived yesterday, and published from the Jamaica Journal of the 18th of October is published in the Gazette, stating that the governor of Cuba had prohibited the landing of any person from the coast of Yucatan. The frigate Sirene was soon to leave Belize for the Gulf of Mexico, when she would look in at Campeachy, Tampico, and some other ports, and then go on a surveying expedition along the coast of Texas. There is no other news. All appeared quiet in Central America.

TEXAS AND MEXICO.—It appears likely that in the attempt of Mexico to take possession of Texas all will not be plain sailing.

When we last heard from Campeachy, the Yucatecos, the New Englanders of Mexico, had completely beaten the Mexican forces in one pitched battle, and that the latter were suffering considerably from desertion and want of provisions. By the delays on the part of the Mexicans, the Yucatan Government had time to fortify Campeachy in the most perfect manner, and to receive reinforcements from the interior sufficient to repel any attack that may be made upon that city.

Our last accounts from Texas were not of much moment. General Woll, the Mexican general, had been driven beyond the Rio Grande, and there were Texans enough in the field to keep him at bay. As the entire Mexican navy were engaged in bombarding Campeachy, no attack had been made upon Galveston. The Texan navy had met with the loss of the schooner San Antonio, and the remaining vessels belonging to that service were shut up in New Orleans for want of funds.

The steam-frigate Montezuma, built in England for Santa Anna, is probably at VERA CRUZ ere this. She was at St. Thomas's on the 22d ult.

LOSS OF STEAMERS.—Since July 1, 1841, no less than 85 steamers have been burnt and snagged on the western rivers. Total loss at least 1,400,000 dollars, in little more than a year.

BUENOS AYRES.—By an arrival of a merchant-ship, the barque John Cross, we have dates from Buenos Ayres to Nov. 5. It was there believed that the imperial retreat of Monte Video, and the Monte Video Government on an apparent alliance with the rebels in Rio Grande; and further, that he had demanded leave to return to Rio de Janeiro in consequence. Her Britannic Majesty's senior officer, Commodore, the U. S. sloop of war Decatur, and the french schooner Eclair were in port. Markets dull. Exchange 2.39 upon England. There were 52 vessels in port. The ship Gilmore, from Calcutta, was off the Plate, and landed passengers last night. She had the following:—Lieut. Smith, H. M.'s 16th Lancers; Lieut. Little, H. M.'s 99th Regt.; Lieut. Archer, H. M.'s 99th Regt.; Mr. Morrison and Dr. Abbot; encountered off the Plate, and landed passengers at Lisbon, and off the Azores; from the effects of the former she was relieved at the Cape. She left Calcutta July 4, and Table Bay Nov. 7

PROCLAMATION

FROM THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL TO ALL THE PRINCES AND CHIEFS, AND PEOPLE OF INDIA.

My Brothers and my Friends—Your victorious army bears the gates of the temple of Somnauth in triumph from Afghanistan, and the despoiled tomb of Sultan Mahmood looks upon the ruins of Ghuznee. The insult of eight hundred years is at last avenged. The gates of the temple of Somnauth, so long the memorial of your humiliation, are become the proudest record of your national glory; the proof of your superiority in arms over the nations beyond the Indus. To you, Princes and Chiefs of Sirhind, of Rajwarra, of Malwa and Guserat, I shall commit this glorious trophy of successful war. You will yourselves, with all honour, transmit the gates of sandal-wood through your respective territories to the restored temple of Somnauth. The chiefs of Sirhind shall be informed at what time our victorious army will first deliver the gates of the temple into their guardianship, at the foot of the bridge of the Sutlej. My remembrance of my Friends—I have ever relied that union depends the security of every ally, as well as of every subject of the British Government, from the miseries, whereby, in former times, India was afflicted; through that alone has our army now waved its triumphant standards over the ruins of Ghuznee, and planted them upon the Bala Hissar of Cabul. May that good Providence, which has hitherto so manifestly protected me, still extend to me its favour, that I may so use the power now entrusted to my hands, as to advance your prosperity and secure your happiness, by placing the union of our two countries upon foundations which may render it eternal. (Signed) ELLENBOROUGH.

LITERATURE.

THE HISTORY OF THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF ANCIENT GREECE. By J. A. ST. JOHN. 3 vols. 8vo. Bentley.

Beyond question, this is the most valuable book which the present season has yet produced, whether we consider the importance of the subject treated, or the intrinsic merit of the work itself. It can hardly be necessary for us to detain our readers with many remarks on the former point. To all it must be an interesting and delightful employment to investigate the character and manners of a people who have filled the whole earth with the fame of their deeds—whose great men, although "being dead, yet speak," and exercise even now the most extensive influence on the progress of events, and the development of modern society and national character. This has ever been the favourite pursuit of the statesman, the philosopher, the poet, and the military commander, the leaders of the human race. Of late years it has been matter of deep and just regret that the taste for classical studies in England was declining, that few books, and those not of a high class, were published on such subjects, that there was a want of profound and philosophic scholarship, and that Britain had no names to show to match against such men as the Niebuhrs, Mullers, Boeckhs, and Wachsmuths of Germany. We are happy to think that a better period has at length arrived, and we had, in the publication of so elaborate a work as the present, one of the most promising symptoms of the favourable change in public taste, and in itself a contribution of the utmost value to our knowledge of antiquity.

The works of the Continental writers we have mentioned possess singular merits, but we are constrained to add, equally serious defects. No one will deny that they have cleared up many disputed points in Greek and Roman archæology, that they have thrown light on much that was obscure, and corrected much that was erroneous, that they have afforded materials for forming a juster and more accurate appreciation of the customs and institutions of the ancients than any that could have been arrived at before their labours were given to the world. On the other hand, it must be said that their extreme love of theorizing often hurries them into the most groundless, and indeed ridiculous conclusions, and that their compositions are entirely devoid of all attractions of a popular character—a fault even more serious, considered with reference to its bearing on the general utility of the book. They are the productions rather of plodding antiquarians, than of thorough classical scholars possessing minds imbued with an intimate sympathy with the great writers of Greece and Rome, and even with something of their genius. To clear arrangement, to easy and eloquent exposition, to ingenious reasoning, to rich illustration, they have little or no pretension. They are heavy and repulsive disquisitions, unrelieved by either grace of style or variety of theme. Even the great work of Niebuhr himself (we mean his "History of Rome") is perhaps the most uninteresting book ever written on such a subject; and we doubt if any one but a reviewer, or an under-graduate cramming for his examination, ever had the patience to read it through. But enough of them. What English literature and the English public require for this province of knowledge is a class of writers who can combine German industry and patience with English energy and philosophy. Mr. St. John is at least as well qualified as any other author of the present day for the task he has undertaken. He is known to the learned world by his travels in Egypt, a book full of interesting matter both to the scholar and the general reader, and in which we may indicate his dissertation on the Pyramids as the best, and indeed the only source from which the curious inquirer can obtain anything like a rational account of the true use and purpose of those mysterious structures. He has travelled in the East as well as in Greece and Italy, and brings to the work, it is evident from the most cursory perusal of the book, a mind well stored with extensive reading. We gather from a passage in the preface, that he intended originally to present a complete picture of the Greeks, as well in their political or public, as in their private life; to describe the constitutions and governments of the various Grecian states, as well as their manners, customs, and character of the people. Subsequently, however, finding the work extending to an enormous length under his hands, he was induced to narrow his plan, and to confine himself for the present, at least, to the latter branch of the subject. But, after all, it is impossible very accurately to discriminate the boundaries of each division; and, in the present work, accordingly, we find much matter that might be introduced under either head, and that is indispensable for the proper study of Grecian history. Religion, literature, and the theory of art, have all the most intimate connexion both with private character and manners, and with national power and greatness. Mr. St. John says, in his preface—

It has been my aim to open up as far as possible a prospect into the domestic economy of a Grecian family, the arts, comforts, conveniences, regulations affecting the condition of private life, and those customs and manners which communicated a peculiar character and colour to the daily intercourse of Greek citizens. For, in all my investigations about the nature and causes of those ancient institutions which, during so many ages, constituted the glory and the happiness of the most highly gifted race known to history, I found my attention constantly directed to the circumstances of their private life, from which, as from a great fountain, all their public prosperity and grandeur seemed to spring

Indeed, the great sources of a nation's happiness and power must always lie about the domestic hearth. There or nowhere are sown, and for many years cherished by culture, all those virtues which bloom afterwards in public, and form the best ornaments of the commonwealth. Men are everywhere exactly what their mothers make them. If these are knave, narrow-minded, ignorant, unhappy, those in their turn will be so also. The domestic example, small and obscure though it be, will impress its image on the state; since that which individually is base and little, can never by congregating with neighbouring littleness, become great, or lead to those heroic efforts, those noble self sacrifices, which elevate human nature to a sphere in which it appears to touch upon and partake something of the divine.

By minutely studying, as far as practicable, those small obscure sanctuaries of domestic life, from which, as from a great fountain, all their public prosperity and grandeur seemed to spring I hoped to discover the secret of that moral alchemy by which were formed

"Those dead, but scepterel sovereigns who still rule
Our spirits from their urns."

In these haunts, little familiar to our imagination, lay concealed the germs of law, good government, philosophy, the arts, and whatever else has tended to soften and render beautiful the human clay. That this was the case is certain; why it should have been so, we may perhaps be enable satisfactorily to explain; but that is what we shall at least attempt in the present work, and for this purpose, it will at the first glance be apparent, that the most elaborate delineation of the political institutions of the Greeks must go altogether insufficient. These were but one among many powerful causes. The principal lay deeper in a combination of numerous circumstances:—a peculiarly perfect and beautiful physical organization; a mind fraught with enthusiasm, force, flexibility, and unrivalled quickness; a buoyancy of temper which no calamity could long depress: consequent, probably, upon this, a strong religious feeling incradicably seated in the heart; an unerring perception of the beautiful in art and nature; and lastly, the enjoyment of a genial climate, and an atmosphere pure, brilliant, and full of sunshine as at eternity.

The object of the author, as explained by himself, is fully carried out in the book, which contains the most ample and detailed accounts of the course of private life in Greece; of education, and funeral ceremonies; of trade, commerce, agriculture, navigation; of the manner of living among the people, their avocations, and amusements, their festivals and banquets. Added to these, there are, as we have intimated, chapters on the higher regions of philosophy, religion, and the fine arts. In fullness of statement and elegance of style, it is approached by no work which has yet been written on the subject. Archbishop Potter's "Greek Antiquities" is rather a school-book, than one which would satisfy a mature mind, and Hase's "Ancient Greeks," published a few years ago, is a mere manual, though a very excellent one.

It is obvious that we cannot follow the author into all the branches of so vast a theme; we can only select a few points which seem to us to call for particular remark. We recommend the chapters on Infanticide and Slavery to careful perusal, they will be found full of information on those very curious subjects, which it is important to weigh well even at the present day. The same may be said of that part of the work which treats of the condition of women among the Greeks. The second chapter contains a most eloquently written general view of the Hellenic character. There are perhaps one or two questionable positions advanced here. Mr. St. John seems inclined to ascribe the division of the Greek population into many separate states, not, as is commonly done, to geographical position, but to a more refined cause, the abundance of men in every district endowed with the ability and passion for governing, and the jealousies and strifes thereby engendered, which prevented the subjection of one district to another. (Vol. i. page 36.) Now, for our parts, we cannot help thinking that this is refining them too much. The real origin of these independent states is rather to be found in the primary separation of the race which peopled them into different families or clans; and we think the abundance of political talent rather the consequence than the cause of this subdivision of the nation. We have little doubt that were English so sub-divided at the present day, a similar consequence would follow; and even during the middle ages a parallel result may be observed in the greater number of active and energetic men among the nobility, for instance, produced by the greater power and independence then enjoyed by individuals within their own sphere. Again he says:—

The most remarkable peculiarity in the Greek character was a certain centrifugal force, or abhorrence of centralisation, which prevented insurmountable obstacles to the union of the whole Hellenic nation under one head. The inhabitants of ancient Italy exhibited on this point an entirely dissimilar character. Though differing from each other widely in manners, customs, and laws, they still possessed so much of affinity as enabled them successively to unite themselves with Rome, and melt into one great people. The causes lay in their moral and intellectual character; possessing little genius or imagination, but much good sense, they experienced less keenly the misery of inferiority, the anguish of defeat, the tortures of submission, and calculated more coolly the advantages of protection and tranquility, and all the other benefits of living under a strong government.

Is not the real cause of the union of Italy under the Romans, to be found in the fact that the Roman state, which rose on the ruin of the great Etrurian League, constituted in Italy a preponderating power, capable of subduing the rest, such as never at any time existed in Greece, where the various states were all too nearly balanced, and too firmly supported by equipollent systems of alliance, to allow one to gain a confirmed domination over the rest of Greece?

There are few subjects on which Mr. St. John leaves us to desire further information, yet we may indicate one or two omissions. We could have wished for some light on the cruel practice of vivisection, or dissection of the living subject, by anatomists—one among the many sanguinary usages of antiquity. In his account of the theatre (Vol. ii. p. 220—248), the author is far from being so minute as in some other parts of his subject; but we are perfectly aware that this branch embraces such an infinity of matters, that a separate treatise would be required to do justice to it. Still, some points are lightly touched that might perhaps as well have been dwelt upon. Among these is the very curious contrivance of the brazen urns and vases which the Greeks let into the walls of their immense theatres for the purpose of concentrating, diffusing, and directing the sound. These vessels of resonance were known by the name of ἠχεῖα, and are mentioned by Julius Pollux, as well as by Vitruvius. They appear to have been arranged—and, indeed, must have been, to produce the intended effect—in parallel lines, round the theatre, at fixed distances from each other; and Dr. Burney, in the "History of Music," is of opinion that they were framed and modulated on a musical scale of half-tones, so as to harmonize with the voices of the actors, who chanted the speeches of the Greek tragedies. We remember well consulting a celebrated professor of acoustics on this point, who gave it as his opinion that the employment of these vessels in unroofed theatres of enormous extent, calculated to hold 20,000 persons, or more, would be in perfect accordance with the laws of sound, and admirably calculated to answer the purpose above mentioned. But, in our modern close theatres, it would lead to nothing but confusion and jarring discordance. The principle on which these vessels were constructed is the same with that on which the whispering-gallery of St. Paul's, the echoing vase of Versailles, and the centre niches of Westminster-bridge, are formed. In the latter, it is known that if two persons place themselves exactly opposite to each other, one in the focal point of each niche, their whispers will be distinctly audible to the other, above the intervening hum of the passengers. It is rather unaccountable that Mr. St. John should have said so little of this most curious point of the theatrical economy of the Greeks; but he, like Homer, may be excused an oversight or two in a work of such immense labour, and collected from such a host of original writers, commentators, travellers, and essayists. It is easy to conceive that the theatrical festivals of the Greeks, when new tragedies were produced, must have presented a spectacle of astonishing splendour. An immense multitude of spectators collected in a glorious edifice under the blue sunny skies of Greece. The magnificence of the scenery, the strange effect of the masked actors bellowing through their voice-conductors the magical words, which were taken up and re-echoed through the audience by the gigantic brazen vases, must have formed a spectacle more easily imagined than described. We could wish to see some national celebration of this kind introduced at the present day, under proper modifications, at which prizes might be proposed for the most perfect dramatic work. Coleridge has somewhere made a similar suggestion, and we may take some future opportunity of explaining our views on this head more fully.

At page 186 of volume iii. we find mention made of an invention which would be very wonderful, if we could rely on the accuracy of the authority who states the fact. "Petronius," says Mr. St. John, "informs us, that in the reign of Tiberius a skilful experimentalist discovered the art of rendering this substance (glass) malleable, but that the emperor, from some freak of tyranny, put the man to death, and thus his secret was lost to the world." What a loss for our modern glass-manufacturers! But we are afraid the story is somewhat spoorphal. Petronius is the only authority referred to by Mr. St. John; and his assertion, which he puts into the mouth of Primalchio, the fictitious personage under whose mask he describes the Emperor Nero, is not worth much. The author, however, is also mentioned by Dion Cassius, lib. 57, page 617, as well as by Isidorus, book 16, chapter 16, in nearly the same words as Petronius. Pliny, in his "Natural History," book 36, chap 26, briefly alludes to the circumstance, but judiciously adds this caveat at the end, that the story was more rife than certain (eaque fama celebrior diu, quam certior, fuit). John of Salisbury, a learned monk of the 12th century, whose works, although long fallen into oblivion, are well worthy of perusal, is the first modern writer who mentions the circumstance, but with a hint of his disbelief of it. As he tells the tale better than any of the others we will amuse our readers by translating the passage from his Policraticus, book 4, chapter 5, a work, which, we are ashamed to say, has never yet been translated into English, although five or six times translated into French. "There was a certain artificer, who made glass vases of such tenacious grain that they could no more be broken than if they were gold or silver. When, therefore, he had made a goblet of this ware, of the purest make, and worthy, as he considered, of the emperor alone, he repaired to Cæsar with his gift, and was admitted. The beauty of the work was praised, the artificer applauded, and his present accepted. But he, that he might convert the admiration of the beholders into amazement, and win the favour of the emperor more fully, asked for the cup from Cæsar, and, having taken it, threw it on the pavement with such force, that not even brass of the most solid and firm contexture could have resisted the shock unbruised. Cæsar was not more astonished than alarmed at this. But the other took from the ground the goblet, which in truth appeared to be not broken, but damaged, as if the substance of brass had put on the figure of glass. Then, drawing a hammer from his bosom, he beat the glass smooth, as if it had been a brazen vessel injured, by repeated blows; which being done, he believed himself to be in the very seat of Jove, inasmuch as he thought that he had deserved the friendship of Cæsar and the admiration of all. But it turned out otherwise; for Cæsar asked if any other but he knew how to make such another goblet? To which, when the man answered no, Cæsar straightway ordered him to be be beheaded, saying, that if the trick were to become known, gold and silver would soon be as cheap as clay." So much for the infrangible glass, which we are afraid thrifty housewives must still rank in the catalogue of desiderata, and are long likely to do.

We extract the following passage (vol. ii. pages 16—17) on that universally interesting topic,

MARRIAGE CEREMONIES.

The relations and friends followed, forming, in most cases, a long and stately procession, which, in the midst of crowds of spectators, moved slowly towards the temple, thousands strewing flowers or scattering perfume in their path, and in loud exclamations comparing the happy pair to the most impassioned and beautiful of their nymphs and gods. Meanwhile, a number of the bride's friends, scattered among the multitude, were looking out anxiously for favourable omens, and desirous, in conjunction with every person present, to avert all such as superstition taught them to consider inauspicious. A crow appearing singly was supposed to betoken sorrow or separation, whereas, a couple of crows, issuing from the proper quarter of the heavens, presaged perfect union and happiness. A pair of turtle doves, of all omens, was esteemed the best.

On reaching the temple, the bride and bridegroom were received at the door by a priest, who presented them with a small branch of ivy, as an emblem of the close tie by which they were about to be united for ever. They were then conducted to the altar, where the ceremonies commenced with the sacrifice of a heifer, after which Artemis, Athena, and other virgin goddesses, were solemnly invoked. Prayers were then addressed to Zeus and his consort, the supreme divinities of Olympus; nor, on this occasion, would they overlook the ancient gods, Uranus and Gaia, whose union produces fertility and abundance, —the Graces, whose smile shed upon life its sweetest charm, and the Fates, who shorten or extend it at their pleasure, were next in order adored; and, lastly, Aphrodite, the mother of Love, and of all the host of Heaven the most beautiful and beneficent to mortals. The victim having been opened, the gall was taken out and significantly cast behind the altar. Soothsayers, skilled in divination, then inspected the entrails, and if their appearance was alarming the nuptials were broken off, or deferred. When favourable, the rites proceeded as if hallowed by the smile of the gods. The bride now cut off one of her tresses, which, twisting round a spindle, she placed as an offering on the altar of Athena, while, in imitation of Theseus, the bridegroom made a similar oblation to Apollo, bound, as an emblem of his out door life, round a handful of grass or herbs. All the other gods, protectors of marriage, were then, by the parents or friends, invoked in succession, and the rites thus completed, the virgin's father, placing the hand of the bridegroom in that of the bride, said, "I bestow on thee my daughter, that thou eyes may be gladdened by legitimate offspring." The oath of inviolable fidelity was now taken by both, and the ceremony concluded with fresh sacrifices.

As a specimen of the lively and animated manner of Mr. St. John, we subjoin also his translation of the song of the swallow, used by Rhodian beggars in spring-time (vol. iii. page 93):—

The swallow is come, and with her brings
A year with plenty o'erflowing;
Freely its richest gifts bestowing,
The loveliest of lovely springs.
She is come, she is come,
To her sunny home.
Then bring forth your store,
Bring it out to the door—
A mess of figs, or a stoop of wine,
Cheese or meal, or what you will,
Whate'er it be with a cot take it ill,
Even an egg will not come amiss,
For the swallow's not nice
When she wishes to dine.
Come, what shall we have? say, what shall it be?
For we will not go,
Though time doth flee,
Till thou answerest yes, or answerest no.
But if thou art churlish we'll break down the gate,
And thy pretty wife we'll bear away:
She is small, and of no great weight—
Open, open, then we say.
Not old men, but boys are we,
And the swallow says, open to me.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CONTRIBUTED BY LORD LEIGH.

If knowledge were the all-in-all, the good
Supreme, then Lucifer unchanged had stood;
Had still above angelic host outshone
Myriads who brighten round the sapphire throne,
Countless, as ocean-waves seen far and far
Glowing beneath the Day-God's blazing car
But knowledge is to good or ill allied
As coloured by humility or pride.

As wave Atlantic, urged by wintry gales,
A mural pile of porphyry assails;
Thus, mob-impelled, ambitious spirits strive
Old institutions from their base to drive;
Prophets of woes themselves create; disdain
To aid their living instruments of gain;
And hardens that they ought themselves to bear,
On others shoulders place, and fix them there.
They, as the swallows that perplex the eye,
With rapid and erratic movements fly,
With tortuous fancies, useless to mankind,
Vex, dazzle, and distract the public mind.
Panting for fame, these spirits soar above
The sober flights of charity and love;
While lightnings, flashing round their course, presage
Commotions on the earth, and civic rage!
Though zealots for the public good, they deem Self-sacrifice to be an idle dream.
(The priest refused his money to the knave That ask'd for alms, and yet his blessing gave.)
'Balm to hurt minds' their eloquence affords;
Cheap virtue is humanity in words.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

TAGLIONI AND CERITO.—These rival daughters of Terpsichore are both engaged for the Carnival at Milan, after which we may hope to see them in London.

MISS CLARA NOVELLO.—It is rumoured that this young lady, whose success throughout Italy has been so very and deservedly great, will shortly appear at Drury Lane in a new adaptation from the Continent.

DUPREZ AND STAUDIGL.—If it be true, as stated, that these great singers are engaged to appear at Covent Garden, in Rossini's "Guillaume Tell," what a treat we may look forward to, sung as that exquisite music must be by such artistes as the establishment will then have the pride to boast of!

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.—It is with unfeigned pleasure that we learn this most accomplished vocalist, in addition to her unrivalled abilities in her art, has had the judgment and delicate taste to refuse the part of Macbeth.

NATIVE TALENT.—We are glad to hear that a new opera or operatic piece is in rehearsal at Drury Lane, the music by Mr. J. L. Hatton.

EDINBURGH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—According to the will of the late General Reid, by which a provision was made to support a musical professorship at the University, and also a sum towards the "getting up" of a musical festival in Edinburgh, this latter will take place on the 13th of February next. Sir Henry Bishop, the lately-elected professor, has been in town, making the necessary engagements and arrangements, which we understand will be on the most splendid scale.

NATIONAL MUSIC.—No less than three champions are in the field in the cause of national song—Mr. Wilson for Scotch, Mr. Horncastle for Irish, and Mr. Russell for American (?) melodies. Mr. Wilson, who is peculiarly well adapted both for the recitation parts and vocal illustration of his subjects, also lectures upon the music of the Sister Isle in the happiest manner of his own discovered entertainment.

SPOHR.—This great master's new oratorio, "The Fall of Babylon," has been performed with the greatest success at Manchester. Why are the metropolitans so indifferent to thus grand work as not to produce it in preference to many others of inferior merit? Surely Professor Taylor (the author of the words) would most gladly lend his valuable aid in directing it, as he has done in the provinces.

MASTER PALMA.—This youthful pianist gave concerts last week at Dover and Canterbury (his native place), which were brilliantly attended. The extraordinary performances of this wonderful boy excited universal enthusiasm on the part of a delighted audience in both places, particularly in the latter, where of course the attendance was more numerous.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—We learn from Paris that Mr. Lumley, the director of our Italian Opera, has arrived in that city from Italy, where he has been forming engagements with some artistes, new to this country, but of the highest celebrity in their own. Amongst these is Signor Conti, a tenor of prodigious power and most finished style. The charming Moltini is re-engaged, we are happy to perceive. As to the ballet, Mr. Lumley seems determined to make it this season outshine all former brilliancy, having engaged no less than the three first danseuses of the day, who will in themselves form a constellation of beauty and art when they appear together in a pas de Graces! M. Perrot is preparing a new ballet for the opening, and a host of other novelties are to appear in succession.

Mr. Frederic Webster and his very talented little boy, who plays the part of Master Branch in "Racquet with the Tuft," take their benefit at the Haymarket on Monday. The bill of fare is full of attraction, and the beneficiaires both deserve the patronage of the public.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

TRAINING FOR THE NAVY.—The Perseus frigate, which, during the enlistment for the navy, was the receiving ship for men from the depot at Tower-hill, is about being changed into a training-school for the navy. Fifty boys, the sons of respectable parents, whose ages are not to exceed eighteen years, and whose several weights must not be beyond 9stbs., are to be placed in this frigate under the superintendence of Dr. Bell and Lieut. Greet, who are to prepare them for active service, by having them taught the different branches of useful knowledge, and well trained in the different tacts of naval discipline.

COAST GUARD SEIZURE.—A SMUGGLER SHOT.—BRIDPORT, JAN. 8.—This morning (Sunday) a seizure was made by Lieut. Hicks and crew, of the Coast Guard stationed at Burton, about two miles to the eastward of this harbour, of 150 half ankers and 9 flagons of foreign spirits, a boat, and three men. It appeared that the boat came on shore in a very heavy sea, at a place called the Freshwater, when the smugglers landed the kegs from the boat on the beach, and were almost immediately surrounded by the officers of the Coast Guard. The smugglers fled in all directions, leaving the officers in quiet possession. One poor fellow out of three captured, in endeavouring to escape, was shot through the neck, and carried to an inn at Burton, where he lies without the slightest hope of recovery. His name is Smith, and keeps an inn at Osmington Mills, near Weymouth. The other two taken have been committed to prison.

PORTSMOUTH, JAN. 10.—H.M. SLOOP VICTOR.—There is a private letter here from a person aboard the Victor, of a date subsequent to that of any other information quoted—viz., the 23rd September, in which the writer says—"You must make the most of this letter, as we are going on a cruise, and you cannot hear from me until after Christmas." It seems therefore probable that the ship in question may have proceeded far down the Gulf of Mexico, and out of the way of meeting any conveyance for more recent advices. The Rover, sloop of war, which arrived on Saturday from Bermuda, has, as usual, been ordered away from this port, and has sailed for Chatham, to spend the proceeds of four years' employment among a more favoured community. A Court Martial has been assembled yesterday on board the St. Vincent, to try the gunner of the Frolic, and the gunner and boatswain of the Thunderbolt, on charges of a comparatively trifling nature. The former has been dismissed, and the two latter "admonished," which might, perhaps, have been done as effectually for the service, and at less expense to the country, by the Commander-in-Chief. The force and solemnity of such tribunals is not enhanced by unnecessary exhibitions of this description, which should be rather held as the ultima ratio of naval discipline.

DESERTION.—It appears that up to the 7th inst. there were about 120 deserters from the army, this being at the rate of little more than a man for each regiment in her Majesty's or the East India Company's service.

It is said that Sir Henry Hardinge purposes to bring forward several measures which he recommended when given his evidence before the committee on military punishments. Among others, we understand that the comfortless state of the soldiers' barrack-room will be remedied, and that many of the useless and harassing regulations will be done away with; for instance, a soldier is not now allowed to smoke in his room; he is not allowed to sit down on his bed, nor to mend his shoes in his room. Such absurd restrictions ought to be removed.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

FIRST SHIP TO HONG-KONG.—The James Campbell sailed last week from the Bromielaw for Hong-Kong, one of the ports opened to the merchants of Great Britain, in terms of the late treaty with the Emperor of China. The vessel, we understand, is a complete bumper, having as much merchandise on board as it can conveniently carry.

WAR STORES FOR THE SULTAN.—On Monday nine cannon, eight of which weighing a ton of ten inches diameter, were shipped on board the Scotch brig Hebe, for Constantinople. Forty tons of shot and shells have arrived in the dock, to be shipped for the same destination. The guns, &c., are said to be for the Grand Seignior.

SOUTH SEA FISHERY.—On Monday morning the ship Marshall Bennett, Captain Hunter, arrived in the Downs from the South-sea Whale Fishery, with 2500 barrels of oil

On Tuesday morning, about six o'clock, whilst the wind was blowing heavily from the north-west, the schooner Croft, of Berwick-on-Tweed, laden with a general cargo of coals, &c., and the Nimble brig, of Sunderland, laden with coals, came in collision with each other in the Humber, when close in shore, off East Greenwich, and both of them were sunk; the cargo of the Croft, of course greatly damaged. No lives were lost. At the time of the occurrence it was raining very hard.

WRECK OF A STEAMER—TWENTY-FOUR LIVES LOST.—The steamer Monk, with engines of 50-horse power, Hughes master, sailed on Saturday evening last from Portdinllaen, having on board 140 pigs and a considerable quantity of butter (said to be worth £600), the property of persons residing in that neighbourhood. She was bound for Liverpool, and passed the black and red buoys on Carnarvon Bar, about five, P.M., when she appears to have missed the course, and struck on the North Bank in about three minutes afterwards. The crew consisted of eight men, and there were at least 18 persons more on board, the owners of the cargo. Six only from the whole have survived the catastrophe. Hugh Jones, the engineer, is the only one belonging to the vessel who is saved. The survivor and three others, soon after she struck, launched the punt, which could carry no more than six men, and reached a bank along which for a considerable distance they had to drag the boat and cross two other channels before they reached the main land. They informed the Llandudwyn life boatmen of the accident, who went towards the wreck about eight o'clock, but after two hours' fruitless exertions, the crew consisted of eight men, and there were at least 18 persons more on board, the owners of the cargo. Six only from the whole have survived the catastrophe. Hugh Jones, the engineer, is the only one belonging to the vessel who is saved. The survivor and three others, soon after she struck, launched the punt, which could carry no more than six men, and reached a bank along which for a considerable distance they had to drag the boat and cross two other channels before they reached the main land. They informed the Llandudwyn life boatmen of the accident, who went towards the wreck about eight o'clock, but after two hours' fruitless exertions, the crew consisted of not more than the steamer, and were forced to retire in consequence of the heavy swell then running over the bar. It was a trying thing for the survivors, though now aware of their own safety, to reflect upon the scene they had recently left, which is of a most heart-rending description. Many, in despair and fear, had lost all control over themselves, others were engaged in fervent prayer, and all seemed too timid or overawed to avail themselves of the example of the engineer and his party, to launch a more powerful boat on board, by means of which the whole might have been saved. The captain declared from the first that he would not leave the ship while a plank remained. About 11 o'clock, P.M., the vessel was breaking up, at which time the unfortunate sufferers on board had crowded into the rigging, from which one after another were seen to drop off as nature became exhausted. 15 unhappy beings, who clung to the weather shrouds, were washed off "at one fell swoop." On Sunday morning the shores of the Menai were strewed with carcasses of pigs and masses of butter; the owner of the latter was saved with another person, by the lifeboat, after enduring the most trying hardship all the night of Saturday. The corpse of Captain Hughes has been washed ashore at Beiran. None of the others have as yet been found.

ANNIVERSARIES.

In accordance with the suggestions of many of our correspondents, we have determined on introducing into our columns a new feature, which, we believe, will prove another fair occasional source of gratification, while it will serve to awaken wholesome recollections of history, and remind the reader, from time to time, that the passing day or hour which he is allowing to fly unheeded is the immediate anniversary of some bright or dark passage in the story of his country's fame—some hero's birth or death or gallant daring—some achievement of battle or of peace—some beautiful episode of personal or national romance — some marvellous institution founded, or shining dynasty overthrown;—in a word, something remarkable and memorable, which else might go forgot. To such events in the past records of history we now intend to give the illustration of art, and, under the general head of ANNIVERSARIES, to present a series of pictures, which may not only have present interest, but something like enduring character beside. We shall select the subjects at random, so that the variety may equal the attraction of the associations called up; and, as Monday will be the anniversary of the Peninsular battle of Corunna, suppose we commence with our artist's delineation of

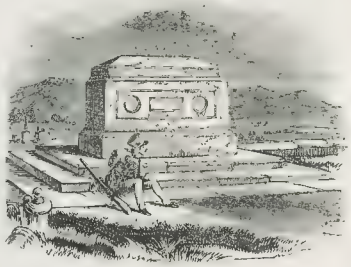
THE DEATH OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

This interesting event is thus narrated in Napier's spirited "History of the Peninsular War":—

Sir John Moore, while earnestly watching the result of the fight about the village of Elvina, was struck on the left breast by a cannon shot; the shock threw him from his horse with violence; he rose again in a sitting posture; his countenance unchanged, and his steadfast eye still fixed upon the regiments engaged in his front; no sigh betrayed a sensation of pain; but in a few moments, when he was satisfied that the troops were gaining ground, his countenance brightened, and he suffered himself to be taken to the rear. Then was seen the dreadful nature of his hurt; the shoulder was shattered to pieces, the arm was hanging by a piece of skin, the ribs over the heart broken, and bared of flesh, and the muscles of the breast torn into long strips, which were interlaced by their recoil from the dragging of the shot. As the soldiers placed him in a blanket his sword got entangled, and the hilt entered the wound. Captain Hardinge, a staff officer, who was near, attempted to take it off, but the dying man stopped him, saying, "It is as well as it is. I had rather it should go out of the field with me." And in that manner, so becoming to a soldier, Moore was borne from the fight.

From the spot where he fell, the general who had conducted the retreat was carried to the town by a party of soldiers. The blood flowed fast, and the torture of his wound increased; but such was the unshaken firmness of his mind, that those about him judging from the resolution of his countenance that his hurt was not mortal, expressed a hope of his recovery. Hearing this, he looked steadfastly at the injury for a moment, and then said, "No, I feel that to be impossible." Several times he caused his attendants to stop and turn him round, that he might behold the field of battle, and when the firing indicated the advance of the British he discovered his satisfaction, and permitted the bearers to proceed. Being brought to his lodgings the surgeons examined his wound, but there was no hope; the pain increased, and he spoke with great difficulty. At intervals he asked if the French were beaten, and, addressing his old friend Colonel Anderson, he said, "You know that I always wished to die this way." Again he asked if the enemy were defeated, and, being told they were, observed, "It is a great satisfaction to me to know we have beaten the French." His countenance continued firm, and his thoughts clear; once only, when he spoke of his mother, he became agitated. He inquired after the safety of his friends, and the officers of his staff, and he did not even in this moment forget to recommend those whose merit had given them claims to promotion. His strength was failing fast, and his life was just extinct, when, with an unsubdued spirit, as if anticipating the baseness of his posthumous calumniators, he exclaimed, "I hope the people of England will be satisfied! I hope my country will do me justice!" The battle was scarcely ended, when his corpse, wrapped in a military cloak, was interred by the officers of his staff in the citadel of Corunna. The guns of the enemy paid his funeral honours, and Soult, with a noble feeling of respect for his valour, raised a monument to his memory.

Thus ended the career of Sir John Moore, a man whose uncommon capacity was sustained by the purest virtue, and governed by a disinterested patriotism more in keeping with the primitive than the luxurious age of a great nation. His tall graceful person, his dark searching eyes, strongly defined forehead, and singularly expressive mouth, indicated a noble disposition and a refined understanding. The lofty sentiments of honour habitual to his mind, adorned by a subtle playful wit, gave him in conversation an ascendancy that he could well preserve by the decisive vigour of his actions. He maintained the right with a vehemence bordering upon fierceness, and every important transaction in which he was engaged increased his reputation for talent, and confirmed his character as a stern enemy to vice, a steadfast friend to merit, a just and faithful servant of his country.



TOMB TO SIR JOHN MOORE.

ALDERMASTON HOUSE.

Since we last addressed our readers this beautiful old mansion has been destroyed by fire, and now lies crumbled into dismal ruin where it once stood fair in the comely beauty of its architecture, a landmark of praise and admiration for the traveller, and an object of pride to the neighbourhood, not less than to its proprietor, as one of "the lords of English soil." We now give a reflex of the picturesque and ancient grandeur of what might, at a former period, have been well appropriated to the stolen glimpses of native scenery, which our readers get in the "Nooks and Corners of Old England," but which now assumes the character of a "relic of the past." Laid bare, and low, and waste, in the strife of elemental war, the beautiful domain is among our landscape treasures of the past, and we have now only to pay to its departed glory the natural tribute which history and topography cordially combine to bestow. As a matter of form we must commence to interest our readers with the news detail which records the calamity, and which is thus reported in the local newspaper:—

DESTRUCTION OF ALDERMASTON HOUSE BY FIRE.—Information was received in Reading at an early hour on Saturday morning that the ancient mansion of W. Congreve, Esq., was crumbling into ashes; it appears that between four and five o'clock a fire broke out near the drawing-room, which happily was almost immediately discovered by the inmates of the house, though not until the flames had become so violent as to render their suppression, by them, a hopeless task. At about five o'clock the fire was seen by some labourers, near Jack's Booth, and in a few minutes a great number of persons had reached the spot; messengers were despatched without delay for the parish engines, and shortly after eight o'clock two had arrived from Reading. They were speedily brought to play upon the burning timbers, but we are sorry to say with little or no effect. Before the flames, however, had extended beyond the room in which they originated, most of the furniture and plate were, by great perseverance and exertion, removed from the other parts of the mansion, although, it is feared some valuable property was still left to be consumed with the magnificent apartments to which it belonged. At seven o'clock the scene was one of the most terrific and imposing character ever witnessed in the neighbourhood, the whole building being apparently enveloped in one vast sheet of flame, which was distinctly seen at Newbury, and many miles round; at about this time the roof fell in with a tremendous crash, literally smothering the fire for a few minutes; and, at the moment our informant left, the beautiful stack of chimneys in the centre, so remarkable for their rich ornamental workmanship, was hourly expected to give way. By nine o'clock the flames were in some little measure subdued by the continued playing of the four engines at work on the spot, but the leading rooms, the hall, and by far the greater part of the building, had been totally destroyed. We understand also that the fire was discovered by a female domestic, in an attic over the ladies' drawing-room, in which, it is supposed, the spark of a candle had ignited a portion of the furniture. The worthy and much respected proprietor of the mansion, W. Congreve, Esq., is, we are happy to hear, as well as can be expected, after the awful calamity which has so suddenly disturbed the comfort and quietude of his advanced age.

Now we take leave to add to the above disastrous account the description given of Aldermaston House by an intelligent tourist of Reading, who has had the good fortune to present the best record of its former existence which the topographer will be able to preserve. The traveller in question then wrote in the present tense. His notes are principally confined to the interior of the edifice:—

Entering the house by one of the two principal doorways, which are flanked on either side with spiral or twisted columns, we find ourselves in a passage very similar to the screens in more ancient houses and colleges, from whence two folding-doors open into a beautiful and lofty hall, of an oblong form; it is the height of two stories, and is surrounded by a handsome and spacious gallery, enriched with carved statues and fine paintings. The whole of the windows are richly decorated with the coats of arms, impaled, of all the branches of the family, from a very early period, in perfect preservation, with the names of each attached.

The effect of stained glass, in almost any situation, is beautiful and imposing; but when viewed under circumstances like the present, the venerable hall illuminated with the subdued "dim religious light" of numberless escutcheons, accompanied with the reflection that in that very hall the noble owners have, in by-gone ages, presided over many a joyous revel and momentous conclave, it needs no great strength of imagination to picture again the secret council, and gathering of feudal vassals around their lord; or, turning "from grave to gay," the hall brilliantly lighted—the lord of misrule, "merrie Christmas," and their hoste of satellites, accompanied with the joyous laugh of youth and gaiety, making the aged pile echo to the sound of wassail and minstrelsy.

The dining-room is a large and beautiful apartment, ornamented with one of those ponderous chimney-pieces so characteristic of the domestic architecture of the middle ages— it is in fact, a large recess in the wall, fitted with immense and beautifully ornamented dog-irons, surmounted with the family crest of an eagle. Above the fire-place is a large and handsome allegorical bas-relief, in white marble; added to which, this room contains some very fine paintings, which possess, of course, only a local interest, inasmuch as they are principally family portraits. The great drawing-room is over the dining-room, and is also profusely decorated with carving and gilding:—here is another chimney-piece reaching almost to the ceiling, and similar to that in the dining-room below. The principal staircase affords another fine specimen of internal decoration, indicative of the domestic grandeur of the period. The rooms of the south front look down a splendid avenue of venerable oaks; several of them upwards of twenty feet in girth, and probably coeval with the original grant of the manor by Henry I. The park contains between seven and eight hundred acres, and innumerable fine specimens of the various timber indigenous to England.

STONE AT MINTING, LINCOLNSHIRE.

The above is a representation of a curious and interesting stone lately removed from a wall of the Church of Minting, in Lincolnshire, which has excited some commotion in that obscure village. An antiquary, perceiving it imbedded in the masonry of the porch, placed lengthways, and half covered with mortar, concluded that it was in no way appreciated by the inhabitants, and so, with the concurrence of the churchwarden, conveyed it to his own dwelling, a few miles distant. The rustics, however, evincing a praiseworthy attachment for this relic of antiquity, immediately demanded the restitution of the captured treasure.

The height of the fragment, for such it is, is about 5 feet 6 inches. The width at the base 1 foot 6 inches, and at the top 1 foot 4 inches; and it varies from 6 to 9 inches in thickness. Foliage similar to that at the lower portion of the front covers the back of the stone. The character of the mouldings corresponds with the general architecture of the humble but venerable building, a transition from the Norman to the early English style prevailing at the close of the twelfth century. As it is carved at both sides, and exhibits a rude design of the Crucifixion, with two figures apparently intended for the Virgin Mary and St. John, we may safely conjecture that it formed one of those crosses which usually stood in the churchyard previous to the Reformation and Rebellion, the obelisk being a common form at that early period, indicated by the mouldings. The bases of many still exist in the neighbouring villages: the broken shafts of some are converted into sun-dials, and Somersby presents a rare instance of an entire cross in its original position.

The foliage, which occupies so much space, and is connected with the cross, may probably be emblematic, alluding to the vine to which our Saviour compares himself, the "root of Jesse" or the "righteous branch."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

HENDLIP HALL, NEAR WORCESTER.

The "nook" for our last week's paper was selected as being surrounded by memories and associations of the Roman era in England; so, in like manner, is our present sketch highly characteristic of another epoch in the changing history of our country. In Henlip, or, as it is modernly called, Hendlip Hall, we have a record of those days when, the aspect of war having been completely changed by the introduction of gunpowder, the moated baronial stronghold—impregnable against archer, arbalest, or mailed knight—gave way to the hall of the country gentleman; and the foundations were laid of those "mansions of the olden time" which decorate the land, and afford resting-places for historical associations and tra-ditionary lore. The very style and fashion of the building gives a foretaste of its history. Raised in the early part of the reign of Elizabeth by "Mr. John Habington," the "collerer" of that queen, it boasts all the complication of towers, turrets, gables, square windows, tall chimneys, winding passages, secret staircases, and hidden closets, so frequently found in buildings of the same period. In means of secrecy it would appear to have been particularly well provided. Among its clusters of chimneys were some not leading to the ample hearths to which their compeers were allied, but forming outlets to dark hidden recesses secretly constructed in the walls and between the numerous chambers of the old hall. The son of the founder, whose name was afterwards written Abington, added to those already formed "many hiding holes; the access to some was through the chimney; others had trap-doors which communicated to back staircases;" and perhaps the temper which led to their construction happily anticipated the necessity for their employment. He appears to have been a man of a dark, mysterious, and discontented turn of mind, and willing to listen to those whose designs assimilated with the more dangerous aspects of his own character. He was concerned in various plots for releasing Mary Queen of Scots; and, these being frustrated, he still continued a secret aider of such as were favourable to the Catholic faith, until the Gunpowder Plot was proposed, and found in Abington at once a ready encourager but fatal friend. His wife was sister to Lord Monteagle, and she, gaining some information of the intended destruction of the Parliament-house, wrote the letter which led to the discovery of the plot. Among the Harleian MSS., which any curious scholar may now see in the British Museum library, is one giving a quaint and curious account of the apprehension of some of the conspirators in Henlip Hall, a statement "which agrees," says Nash, who quotes it, "with that given by Mr. Abington, in some manuscripts now before me, found in the house at Hendlip." It is entitled, "A true discovery of the service performed at Henlip for the apprehension of Mr. Henry Garnett, alias Woolley, provincial of the Jesuits, and other dangerous persons there found in January last, 1605;" and after alluding to rewards offered for the apprehension of the "traitors in the powder conspiracy" having not proved efficacious, and stating that a warrant was directed to the right worthy and worshipful knight Sir Henry Bromle, thus continues, "He, not neglecting so weighty a business, horsing himself with a sernly troop of his own attendants, and, calling to his assistance so many as in his own discretion was thought meet, on Monday, January the 30th last, by break of day, did ingirt and round beset the house of Mayster Thomas Abbington, at Henlip, near Worcester. Mr. Abbingdon not being then at home, but ridden about some occasions best known to himself, the house being goodlie, and of great receipt, it required the more diligent labour and pains in the searching. It appeared that there was no want: and Mr. Abbingdon coming home that night, the commission and proclamation being shown to him, he denied any such men to be in his house; and voluntarily to die at his own gate, if any such were to be found in his house, or in the shire; but this liberal, or rather rash, speech could not cause the search so nightly to be given over; the cause enforced more respect than that, or words of any such like nature; and proceeding on, according to the trust reposed in him, in the gallery over the gate there were found two cunning and artificial conveyances in the main brick wall, so ingeniously framed, and with such art, that it cost much labour ere they could be found. Three other secret places, contrived by no less skill and industry, were found in and about the chimnies, in one whereof two of the traitors were close concealed. These chimney conveyances being so strangely formed, having the entrances into them so curiously covered over with brick, mortared, and made fast to planks of wood, and coloured black like the other parts of the chimney, that very diligent inquisition might well have passed by without throwing the least suspicion on such unsuspicious places. And whereas divers funnels are usually made to chimneys according as they are combined together, and serve for necessary use in several rooms, so here were some that exceeded common expectation, seemingly outwardly fit for carrying forth smoke; but, being further examined and seen into, their service was to no such purpose; but only to lend air and light downward into the concealments, where such as were inclosed at any time in them should be hidden. But Mayster Abbingdon would take no knowledge of any of these places, until at length the deeds of his lands were found in one of them, whose custody, doubtless, he would not commit to any place of neglect, or where he could have no intelligence of them, whereto he could then devise no sufficient excuse. Three days had been fully spent, and no man found there all this while; but on the fourth day, in the morning, from behind the wainscot in the galleries, came forth two men of their own voluntary accord, as being no longer able there to conceal themselves, for they confessed that they had but one apple between them, which was all the sustenance they had received during the time they were thus hidden. One of them was named Owen, who afterwards murdered himself in the Tower, and the other Chambers; but they would take no knowledge of any other men's being in the house. On the eighth day the before-mentioned place in the chimney-place was found. . . . . Forth of this secret and most cunning conveyance came Henry Garnet, the Jesuit, sought for, and another with him named Hall. Marmalade and other sweetmeats were found there lying by them; but their better maintenance had been by a quill or reed, through a little hole in a chimney that backed another chimney into a gentlewoman's chamber, and by that passage candle, broths, and warm drinks had been conveyed to them. . . . . The whole service endured the space of eleven nights and twelve days." Garnet was a man of considerable learning, a native of Nottinghamshire, and Professor of Philosophy and Hebrew in the Italian College at Rome. There was no proof of his having been actively engaged in the gunpowder treason, yet he was hanged in St. Paul's Churchyard on the 3rd of May, 1606. Oldcorne was priest to Abington, and was executed at Worcester in April the same year. Abington himself, who had previously endured some years' imprisonment in the Tower for his share in the conspiracies for releasing Mary Queen of Scots, was also, for this last plot, condemned to death; but his relationship to Lord Monteagle, and perhaps the services rendered by his father, enabled his friends to obtain a commutation of his sentence, upon condition of his remaining within the limits of his county for the remainder of his life. Thus confined, he turned his attention from politics to literature, and made a collection of materials, chiefly relative to Worcestershire, which has been found valuable to subsequent topographers. Time and neglect have done their work with Hendlip, but the lover of the picturesque and the antique will still find much to gratify the eye in its proportions, while its history affords a theme fruitful in associations of bygone customs, characters, and events.

THE GREAT NORTHERN STEAMER.

This extraordinary steamer, now in the East India Docks, is the object of general astonishment. Her amazing length, breadth, and depth exceed, we believe, the dimensions of any steam-vessel ever in existence. She was built at Londonderry by Captain Capin, and is certainly a remarkable monument of marine architecture. She is propelled by the Archimedean screw, which works on each side the rudder, and is turned by an engine of 360-horse power. No paddles are required, and, but for the funnel which is seen amidships, she might pass for a square-rigged ship of the larger class. She has three masts, with lower and upper yards, and is rigged in every respect like a frigate or sloop of war. We were favoured by one of her officers with the following dimensions:—Length from the taffrail to the stem, 247 feet; breadth of beam, 37 feet; depth from the gangway to the keel, 50 feet. On her passage from Londonderry she ran, upon the average, 13½ knots without the engine, which can be spared or used, as circumstances may require. When it was necessary to put on the engine she ran nine knots, head to wind. The space for stowage is most capacious. Standing aft, and looking forward, on the orlop deck, the distance seems immense, exceeding, indeed, the length of the largest first-rate in the navy. With all this room, there is at present a want of arrangement for cabins; but we understand she will be fitted-up in the best style. With respect to her external appearance, the vessel seems a huge monster steamer, but pleasing in her mould and trim. A beautiful female figure is placed over the outwater, and her stern richly decorated with carving, gold, and colour. In consequence of the heavy masts, yards, and rigging, she will require an immense quantity of ballast. At present it is not decided whether she is to run to and from Ireland, or be employed on any other service. During the week many persons entered the dock-yard to gaze at this really wonderful object.

The following extracts from the ship's log during her recent trip from Londonderry to England clearly show that her sailing qualities are in no way impeded by the screw propeller, while the advantages of the latter adjunct are of the most important nature during the prevalence of adverse winds, &c.:—

Sunday, Dec. 25.—8 15 A.M. Weighed anchor in Cowes roads and put the ship on her course for London under steam and canvass. 9 50 A.M. Massey's log put overboard. Revolutions of engine per minute, 18. Rate per common log, 10 knots; Massey's log, 10½ ditto. 11 50 A.M. Stopped engines abreast of the Owes light-ship, and disconnected the screw. Ship put on her course up channel with sails only. Noon. Fresh breezes and cloudy. 2 30 P.M. Abreast of Beachy Head. Hove to for a pilot, but could not procure one. Ship brought to her course. 5 5 P.M. Abreast of Dungeness. Wind squally, with rain. 5 15 P.M. Massey's log hauled in. Note.—The distance run from the Owes light-ship by chart, 66 nautical miles in 5 hours 2 minutes. Hove to and fired guns for a pilot. 5 50 P.M. Took a pilot on board. Wind increasing. 7 50 P.M. Anchored in the Downs in 8 fathom water.

Monday, Dec 26.—8 A.M. The wind blowing a gale down royal and top-gallant yards. 8 50 A.M. Changed pilots. Noon. Gale increasing and a great number of ships running for the Downs. Midnight. Weather about the same.

Tuesday, Dec. 27.—9 A.M. Gale suddenly moderated. Steam raised to assist in getting the anchor. 11 40 A.M. Got under weigh and proceeded through the Downs setting fore and aft sails. 2 30 P.M. Abreast of Margate. Took in all sail, wind being directly a-head. 5 17. P.M. Abreast of the Nore light. 6 P.M. Anchored nearly opposite the Chapman beacon.

Wednesday, Dec. 28.—7 A.M. Got under weigh, steaming only. Wind a-head. 9 5 A.M. Stopped off Gravesend and changed pilots. 9 17 A.M. Started for London against ebb tide and light wind. 12 A.M. Abreast of Woolwich. 12 20 P.M. Arrived at Blackwall and moored ship, having stopped 6 minutes in Long Reach to adjust machinery, thus accomplishing the run from Gravesend to Blackwall (21 miles) in 2 hours 57 minutes, the mean rate of the tide being taken at 2 miles per hour.

Thursday, Dec. 29.—Ship steamed into the East India Import Dock.

The experiments hitherto made with vessels fitted on Mr. F. P. Smith's principle are altogether satisfactory, both as to speed, action, and total absence of the swell caused by paddles, while the protection afforded by the depth at which the propelling screw is worked promises to be of the highest importance to war-steamers. This screw is placed in a rectangular opening at the rear of the vessel, and is put in motion by the engine's action on a combination of wheels. The gearing consists of a cog-wheel 20 feet in diameter, working into a smaller one of 5 feet diameter, the axis of which is on the same shaft with that of the screw. The screw makes from 64 to 66 revolutions per minute.

The following is a list of the vessels already fitted with the Archimedean screw:—

COUNTRY NEWS.

BATH.—As this period of the year is considered the Bath season, there is no lack of public and private entertainments in that ancient, but still fashionable city, and the concerts have already exceeded, in point of numbers, those for some winters past. At the theatre Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean are engaged for five nights: the dramatic company retained comprises Farren, Wallack, Webster, Buckstone, Vandenhoff, and Strickland; Miss Vandenhoff, Mdlle. Cerito, Mdlle. Celeste, Mrs. Glover, &c. The promenade musicale at the Grand Pump Room has proved highly successful. Mr. Edward D. Anson, youngest son of General Sir G. Anson, G.C.B., was married at Bathwick Church on Wednesday to Miss Louisa Clapcott, second daughter of Mr. G. B. Clapcott, of Sydney-place. Many families of rank are resident here this winter. The Earl of Athlone has apartments at the York House Hotel. Mrs. Somerville, widow of Mr. Somerville, and Count Mazzhinghi have been staying at the Lion Hotel during the week. The Marquis of Conyngham, Earl Mount Charles, and family, Hon. Archibald Macdonald, Lady Hipperly and Miss Hipperley, Lord Bolingbroke and the Honourable Mr. St. John, Sir D. and Lady Mackworth, &c., are among the recent departures.

BRIGHTON.—The first and only ball this season took place on Tuesday evening, at the Old Ship Hotel, and though designated a fancy dress ball, but very few of the company appeared in costume. The dresses were, notwithstanding, very elegant, and when the whole of the company, about 320, had assembled, the rooms had a splendid appearance. Dancing commenced at ten o'clock.

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.—This lady was engaged to sing at a concert in Brighton on Wednesday evening; but to the great disappointment of many persons who depended upon hearing this celebrated contralto, a handbill was widely distributed through the town, containing a medical certificate of the lady's inability to attend.

CHESHIRE.—On Thursday night last, between eleven and twelve o'clock, the stacks in the farm-yard of R. W. Barton, Esq., an extensive farmer in the county of Chester, were discovered to be on fire, the flames spreading with such rapid ty that, had the most efficient aid been at hand, it would have been impossible to save stopped their progress until they had entirely expended themselves. It appeared that the corn and hay stacks in the yard had been set fire to in no less than four different places, and a strong wind prevailing at the time, the fire in a few minutes reached such a height as to illuminate the whole country for miles round. The farm-buildings being detached, were all saved; but five stacks of fine wheat, one of oats, one of hay and clover, a cart loaded with straw, a farm cart, and eleven hundred feet of timber, were all entirely consumed. The value of the property consumed was about £1000, and no doubt remains but it was the work of an incendiary. An agricultural labourer named Peter Evans, has since been arrested, and committed to gaol to take his trial for the offence.

LANCASHIRE.—The Liverpool March Assizes are likely to be extremely heavy. There are now in the county gaol upwards of 130 prisoners, more than the ordinary number of whom are charged with murder: there are also between 60 and 70 prisoners in the same gaol who will take their trials at the sessions on the 19th inst.

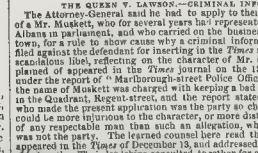
LINCOLNSHIRE.—During the last six days three extensive fires, two of which were caused by incendiaries, have occurred in the neighbourhood of Sleaford, in Lincolnshire. The first fire took place about six o'clock on the evening of the 4th inst. on a farm the property of Wilkinson Peacock, Esq., situate at Thorpe Tilney, ten miles from Sleaford, which destroyed several ricks of wheat, barley, straw, &c., to the value of upwards of £500, and was undoubtedly the act of an incendiary. The second fire occurred on the morning of Saturday last, about half-past five o'clock, on the farm of Mr. Edward Rusher, situate at Heckington, five miles from Sleaford, which destroyed great part of the valuable stock, farming implements, &c. The incendiaries, not satisfied with the destruction of the stacks, &c., also hamstrung a cow in calf, worth sixteen guineas, and pushed her near the flames, in order that she might be roasted alive, which was, however, prevented, as she was discovered and immediately slaughtered. Both the above properties are insured in the County Fire-office. The third fire occurred on the afternoon of Sunday last, about half-past four o'clock, on the extensive farm and premises of Mr. Richard Cooper, situate at Ramsden, six miles from Sleaford, which destroyed three stacks of wheat, two of barley, and one of hay. The loss, it is expected, will exceed £1500, and will fall on the Norwich Union Fire-office. The fire was caused by a boy engaged in shooting rats on the stacks setting fire to one of them, and, the wind being high, they were all burned in less than two hours.

SUFFOLK.—GANG OF BURGLARS.—Considerable excitement prevails in the parish and neighbourhood of Lavenham, in Suffolk, from the discovery of a gang of depredators, who have infested the neighbourhood for some time past. Three men have been apprehended, whose names are Rust, Bere, and Smith, natives of Lavenham. They have since been taken before the Rev. — Johnson, of Lavenham, when Rust and Bere were committed for trial, and Smith was discharged for want of identity. From a statement made by one of the prisoners it appears that the gang consisted of about fifteen, who were chiefly engaged in robbing malthouses, and plans had been laid for plundering two or three others.

INCENDIARY FIRE AT GREAT OAKLEY.—About six o'clock on Sunday evening, a fire was discovered on the premises of Mr. Edward Cooper, farmer, of Great Oakley. Assistance was promptly obtained, and, aided by the engine from the Thorpe station of the Essex and Suffolk Equitable Fire Office, which arrived about half-past seven, the fire was extinguished, but not until a stack of wheat straw, and two boats of hay had been entirely consumed; and a stable, and barn (empty) nearly consumed. The damage is estimated at about £200; the property is insured in the Farmer's Fire Office. Two men, named John and William Abbott, were apprehended by the police, on suspicion of setting the premises on fire, and were examined before J. M. Leake, Esq., and a full bench of magistrates; but the evidence not being sufficient to warrant their committal, they were discharged.

SURREY.—INCENDIARY FIRE AT THORPE.—The village of Thorpe, Surrey, was thrown into considerable alarm by the discovery of a fire at the extensive farm of Mr. Woodward, situated near that village. The flames, when first discovered, burst suddenly forth from a large barn containing a quantity of wheat, which was speedily on fire from end to end. Another barn, containing oats and barley, soon caught, the flames from which communicated almost instantly to the stables, which with their valuable contents were totally consumed. It is not known in what office Mr. Woodward is insured, but we regret to state that it has beyond doubt been ascertained to have been the act of an incendiary.

WINDSOR.—DISPOSAL OF CROWN PROPERTY.—It is now determined that the whole of the materials of the numerous buildings, consisting of the extensive stabling, coach-houses, loose boxes, sheds, &c., shall be forthwith suomitted to public competition.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—THURSDAY.
(Sittings in Banco)

THE QUEEN v. LAWSON.—CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

The Attorney-General in his Term applied to their lordships on behalf of a Mr. Muskett, who for several years had represented the borough of St. Albans in parliament, and who carried on the business of a banker in that town, for a rule to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against the defendant for inserting in the Times newspaper a gross and scandalous libel, reflecting on the character of Mr. M. The article complained of appeared in the Times journal on the 13th of December last, under the report of "Marlborough-street Police Office." An individual of the name of Muskett was charged with keeping a bad and disorderly house in the Quadrant, Regent-street, and the report stated that the gentleman who made the present application was the party so charged. Now, nothing could be more injurious to the character, or more distressing to the feelings of any respectable man than such an allegation, which was untrue, as he was not the party. The learned counsel here read the alleged libel, which appeared in the Times of December 13, and addressed the court at considerable length.—Their lordships consulted together for a minute or two; after which Lord Denman said, We are of opinion, Mr. Attorney General, that the paragraph complained of is a galling and offensive publication; but not one, under the circumstances, which would warrant the court in allowing Mr. Muskett to proceed by criminal information. It appears that that gentleman required certain terms of the conductors of the Times, all of which were not acceded to, and Mr. Muskett let the case to the editor of the Times as he pleased with it. The editor contradicts the accuracy of the report, and offers to insert any further letter from the parties if they thought it necessary, but refused to state anything more. Now we think that he (the editor) had done all that was necessary on the subject, and therefore, the court would not be justified in granting your application.—Rule refused.

Wednesday being the first day of Hilary Term, the judges proceeded in state to Westminster-hall, and opened the several Courts of Law and Equity with the customary formalities. No case of any public interest came on during the sitting of the courts. There appeared to be rather a plentiful lack of business for a first day of term.

The Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held a meeting on Wednesday morning, and gave judgment in an appeal case of considerable importance, relative to the privileges of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, as to the power of arrest and adjudication possessed by the House in certain cases. Their lordships reversed the decree of the court below, by which decision the power claimed by the House of Assembly, in the case in question, is negatived.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—A countryman named Thomas Messenger, who was very meanly dressed, and over whose clothes was a dirty smock frock, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having conspired with other persons, by perjury, to defraud the Court of Chancery of sums of money amounting to between £1400 and £1500.—Mr. Waddington appeared upon the part of the Crown, and Mr. Prendergast attended upon the part of the prisoner. It appeared that about the year 1786 a man named John Messenger died, leaving a will, in which he bequeathed all his property to his wife for her life, and, after her decease, to the children of his brothers and sisters, to be divided equally amongst them. In the course of so many years the identity of the family branches became somewhat puzzling, but the prisoner, however, determined to set the Gordian knot, and, accordingly, by perjury he accomplished the task. With respect to his father's share there was no difficulty, but with respect to Ann Dunstan's, the prisoner made affidavit that she died in the life of Mrs. Messenger, on May 1822, intestate, and a spinster, without parent, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece. For the purposes of the Ecclesiastical Court that affidavit was sufficient, and the prisoner obtained letters of administration, the bondsmen to which were White. In the Court of Chancery, unfortunately, it was not necessary to produce witnesses, and thus a facility was afforded to the fraud, swearing being all that was required. The prisoner accordingly embodied all that had been stated in his petition, and procured the assistance of his wife and another female to personate, in the presence of an Extraordinary Master in Chancery, two women of different names, and to swear that Ann Dunstan died at Ipsden, in Oxford, on or about the 22nd of May, 1822. By these means the prisoner obtained an order for the payment of the sum of money to which Ann Dunstan had been entitled.—The prisoner was committed.—Warrants were then issued against White and the prisoner's wife.

Captain Rorby, of the brig Esex, which was abandoned on her voyage from Jamaica to London, appeared, on Tuesday, at the justice-room, in consequence of a complaint made against him by the mate and carpenter of the vessel, charging him with having refused to pay them the arrears of their wages, and combining other charges of the most serious nature. The investigation, which lasted several hours, attracted a great number of mercantile men. Mr. Thompson, the secretary to the Alliance In urance Company, attended to watch the proceedings, and gentlemen from other insurance offices were also present. Mr. Humphreys appeared upon the part of Capt. Rorby.—Mr. Hobler informed Mr. Humphreys that the mate and ship's carpenter of the Essex, in stating their complaint for non-payment of wages, charged the captain with having unnecessarily abandoned the vessel, and also with having proposed to scuttle and sink her in the ocean. In these accusations they persevered.—William Hepwood, mate of the Essex, was then sworn and examined by the Lord Mayor, all persons who were in attendance on the prisoner's behalf having been ordered to withdraw. He went at considerable length into the details of the voyage, down to the date of the 2nd of October, when the brig unshipped her rudder, about 300 miles from land. He said that the captain, having expressed his determination to leave the Essex, and go on board a vessel which appeared alongside, he declared that if the captain would not give him a note for the whole of his wages he would not go on board. The reply was that if he remained on board the captain would consider the lives of all on board upon his head. Witness observed to the captain, that if they left the vessel they would be disgraced, as she would be picked up; and the captain said there was no way of avoiding that, for he (the mate) could knock out the bow port and the ballast port (that is, effectually scuttling the vessel). The whole of the crew got on board the Neapolitan vessel which had have alongside, and the Essex was thus abandoned. He to d one of the men to dismantle the pumps of the Essex, when they were leaving her; and ordered the pump boxes to be taken on board the Neapolitan vessel.—Mr. Humphreys then produced a paper to which the witness's sig nature was affixed. It was a declaration that the Essex was abandoned for the purpose of saving the lives of the crew, that her hatches were fastened down, that the rudder was lost, and the vessel was altogether unmanageable.—The witness admitted that the handwriting was affixed to the document.—Several other witnesses having been examined, the Lord Mayor said he was decidedly of opinion that the insurance-brokers ought, if they saw good grounds, take up the case themselves, instead of watching to take advantage of any evidence that might come out before him in his investigation as a magistrate. The case was then adjourned till next week, when the whole of the evidence was gone into; after which the captain was adjudged to pay the seamen their wages, but was acquitted of any criminal intention in abandoning his vessel.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—Mary Ann Whitaker, a young woman of about 17 years of age, was charged with having at different times robbed her father of considerable property, and within the last few days to the amount of £5 and upwards. The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Sarah Harris, a well-dressed woman, was finally examined, on the charge of having stolen 300 yards of lace, value £21, the property of Messrs. Swan and Edgar, silk-mercers, Piccadilly. She was fully committed.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—In consequence of the receipts of English wheat up to Mark-lane since our last report having been extremely scanty, and the attendance of dealers—many of whom have been short of stock—being on the increase, we have had a decided improvement in the demand for both red and white samples, at an improvement of 2s. per quarter, on last week's quotations of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and good clearances have been readily effected by the factors. In free foreign wheat a large amount of business has been transacted; the finest qualities have advanced 2s, other kinds 1s. per quarter, but bonded descriptions have been little inquired for. The supply of barley being small the sale for it has proved firm, at a rise of quite 1s per quarter. Malt has likewise participated in the improved demand, but we have no alteration to notice in the rates of value. Good sound oats have sold on full as good terms, but other kinds, as well as beans, peas, and flour, have hung on hand.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 3170; barley, 5550; oats, 8600; malt, 337 quarters; flour, 2920 sacks. Irish: oats, 6420. Foreign: wheat, 1700; and barley, 510 quarters

Mark-lane Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 54s; ditto white, 54s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 49s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; malting, 28s to 31s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; English and Cork, 15s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 37s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 34s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 26s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 20s to 26s; peas, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Flour, America, 23s to 24s; Baltic, 23s per barrel.

The Seed Market. We have had rather more doing in clover seed since our last, at full prices, but in all other kinds of seeds scarcely anything has been passing

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 43s to 46s; hemp seed, 34s to 36s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 9l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 1d; barley, 26s 5d; oats, 17s 2d; rye, 31s 7d; beans, 29s 0d; peas, 29s 1d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 4d; Barley, 26s 9d; Oats, 17s 4d; Rye, 37s 5d; Beans, 29s 4d; Peas, 31s 8d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 6d; Barley, 10s 0d; Oats, 6s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Sugar.—The public sales of last week were 4000 casks from 7d to 7¾d; of household ditto, 6d to 6¾d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—At the public sales of tea held this week about 30,000 packages have been offered. Nearly 12,000 of them have found purchasers, at an advance of quite 1d per lb. on most descriptions of congou, twankay, and hyson. The stock of tea in London is now 27,957,000, against 24,909,000 lbs. in 1841, and 26,339,596 ditto in 1840. The deliveries from the warehouses are large.

Sugar.—We have had a very steady inquiry for all kinds of sugar this week, and the rates have been firmly supported.

Coffee.—In this article very little has been doing, but holders remain firm for late currences.

Cocoa.—The trade have purchased rather freely, at full quotations.

Rice.—The market is firm, and good Madras has sold at 10s to 10s 6d per cwt. for good yellow.

Saltpetre.—There have been three public sales of this description of produce, which went at 25s 6d to 27s per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil has considerably advanced in price, 33s having been paid for parcels on the spot. Rapeseed oil is dull, and unaltered in value.

Tallow.—The market is quiet for Russian, with sellers of P.Y.C. on the spot at 47s 6d. per cwt.

Hops.—There is a good business doing in most kinds of Irish butter, at an advance of 1s per cwt. Foreign butter, of fine quality, is scarce, and in demand at 112s per cwt. for the best Friesland. The bacon market is steady, at 44s to 46s per cwt. Lard is likewise dull, the late supplies having exceeded the demand.

Wool. This market is rather active, and late rates are well maintained.

Potatoes. About 20s0 tons of potatoes have reached the Pool this week, which have moved off slowly, at from 30s to 60s per ton.

Coals.—Adair's, 16s; Od Tanfield, 15s; Tanfield Moor, 18s 6d; Townley, 18s 6d; Russell's Hetton, 18s 6d; Hetton, 18s 6d; Harrison, 19s; Pemberton, 19s 6d; Caradoc, 21s 6d; Cassop, 20s 6d; Adelaide, 20s 9d per ton. Ships arrived, 6.

Smithfield.—The demand for each kind of fat stock this week has proved dull, at the annexed rates: Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 6d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 10d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Owing to the supplies of meat here being large, the general inquiry has ruled heavy, and prices have had a downward tendency. Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 6d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., by the carcase

ROBERT HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The commercial expectations latterly entertained by British merchants and manufacturers will not be disappointed in the Chinese empire, at all events; for, by the information received by the India mail, which arrived in the beginning of this week, we learn, with great satisfaction, that the trading licenses recently granted to the native hongs lately opened in China for the purposes of increased commercial intercourse, had already commenced, under circumstances more favourable than could have been looked for at this early period since the conclusion of the peace. Large purchases of teas had then been made from the Chinese merchants in the Yang-te-kiang, at rather moderate prices, and some sales of British goods had been effected in the same quarter. From our East India possessions, likewise, the commercial intelligence received by this conveyance is more cheering than it has been for some years past. At present in the case of all staples of trade we gradually progressing. The stocks of British manufactured goods had been latterly considerably reduced, and such future prospects were anticipated from the profound tranquillity which then reigned throughout our immense Indian empire. In our manufacturing districts these encouraging accounts from the East have already produced favourable results. The demand for cotton and for sheep's wool has been increased, and prices have been generally rather on the advance. In Glasgow, Manchester, and Leeds, the sale of manufactured goods continues to be large, and labourers are again fully employed, at fair wages. For hardware goods, and particularly for cutlery, at Birmingham, Sheffield, and other places, rather extensive inquiries continue to be made, and their value is evidently on the advance. Of opium the stock in this country is not large at present, and the prices demanded for it are so high that it is impossible to say what it is actually worth. At Bombay and at Calcutta the news from China had increased the price of this article to 1000 rupees per chest of 140 lbs., the demand having continued large at this value at the last dates.

In the colonial markets at home the demand for colonial produce during the week has been in every respect satisfactory. The sales of sugar effected for consumption have been large throughout all the markets, and prices continue to be fairly supported for all articles, indeed, in some instances, needy buyers have been compelled to pay higher prices for the supply of their immediate wants, particularly for sugar, coffee, and rice. The spirits of our colonists are considerably raised by the fair prospect now placed before them, that African immigration, in future, must materially aid them in the cultivation of their estates, and eventually render their produce fully equal to the consumption, not only of the United Kingdom, but of the European continent itself. Our colonial labourers receive excellent wages, and the greater the demand which we receive from them for their produce, must be the quantity of our manufactured goods used by them. By encouraging the consumption of foreign sugar, we do not, however, apprehend, add to the exportation of our goods to foreign sugar states, because in them the work generally is performed by half starved slaves, receiving no wages, and, consequently, not having any means to pay for additional quantities of British manufactures, however materially increased may be the consumption of their produce in this country. It must, therefore, be, for even their own sakes, most satisfactory to British manufacturers of every description to observe the gradual improvement which is now taking place in our West India colonies. In the article of tea little change has occurred since this week. Sales have been effected of the usual quantities, and in prices little alteration can be noted, indeed, its value is now moderate enough, and not beyond the means of the consumers thereof. In the corn markets generally the advance in the value of wheat, to which we alluded in our last number, has been during this week more than fully maintained; and to Mark-lane a further improvement is becoming daily more obvious, as evidenced by the millers in extensive, the farmers' supplies are unusually small, and the holders of foreign free wheats now in London, reduced to half a million of quarters, are but shy operators, as they well know the present consumption requires prices.

In the money market health prevails in an extraordinary degree, for money is so abundant, and confidence amongst capitalists is so strong that Consols have advanced during this week fully one half per cent, in the face of a deficient revenue. This can only be considered a favourable symptom, which the energy of the people, improved prices for farmers' property, and extended commerce must eventually remove. In Spanish, a good deal of speculative business continues to be done at about last week's improved prices. The same observation is applicable to the bonds of all the new states of America. In the leading railway statistics, money, to a considerable extent, continues to be invested at improving prices. In the London and Birmingham Line purchases cannot be made under £191; for the quantity of shares in the market for sale is small, indeed, the capital embarked in securities of this description is chiefly for investment and not for speculation.

Money continues to be extremely abundant in the City, and to employ it profitably and safely is a matter of considerable difficulty to bankers and capitalists. Those who feel inclination to make temporary loans of it cannot obtain more interest for the advance of their property on bonds of first-rate character than after the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum, whilst those who desire a permanent quarter for investment have chiefly secured their attention to the leading railroads. Some rather large purchases have been accordingly made in the shares of the London and Birmingham line, by which an improvement in their value of from £2 to £3 has been effected. In those of the Brighton line also some business has been done to a small advance in prices. On the Foreign Stock Exchange, likewise, considerable activity has existed during the week. For the Bonds of Colombia many inquiries have been made, and some purchases effected, at rather a considerable advance in their value. This improvement has been occasioned by some favourable advices received lately from New Grenada. In Mexican Bonds also, some business has been done at rather higher prices. Chilian Bonds are now considered safe securities, and to many persons offer a further to any extent cannot be done unless at the expense of £30 for each £100 bond. The annual interest is one per cent, on these securities. In Spanish Bonds also a speculative demand, in addition to a money one, exists to a considerable extent. Should the Spanish Regent succeed in his object of smuggling by the imposition of moderate import duties on all articles of foreign production, then, in a short period, some improvement may be expected

On the English Stock Exchange a good deal of business was done during the week, and for the account in Consols higher prices were quoted than they have commanded for some time previously, although at the same time considerable sales were effected in respect to the actual state of the quarterly revenue. When this was ascertained, however, the market became less buoyant, and a decline, but to no material extent, has since then been submitted to by those wishing to close their time speculations

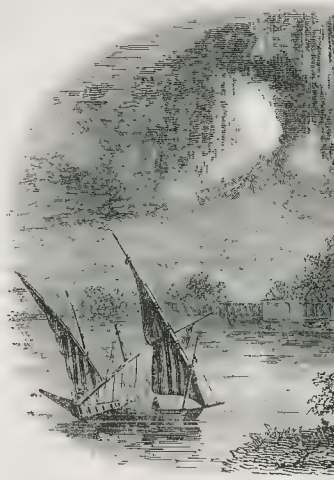
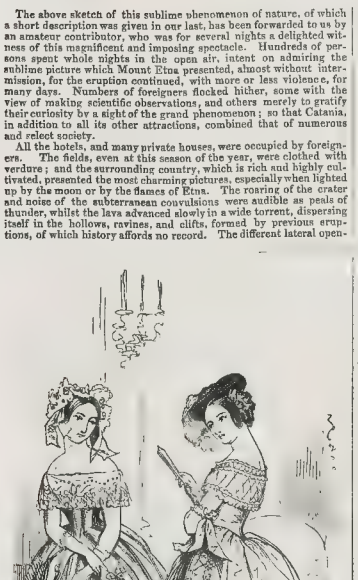
TESTIMONIALS of the extraordinary curative powers of PARR'S LIFE PILLS can be had of the agents.



ERUPTION OF MOUNT ETNA.

The above sketch of this sublime phenomenon of nature, of which a short description was given in our last, has been forwarded to us by an amateur contributor, who was for several nights a delighted witness of this magnificent and imposing spectacle. Hundreds of persons spent whole nights in the open air, intent on admiring the sublime picture which Mount Etna presented, almost without intermission, for the eruption continued, with more or less violence, for many days. Numbers of foreigners flocked hither, some with the view of making scientific observations, and others merely to gratify their curiosity by a sight of the grand phenomenon; so that Catania, in addition to all its other attractions, combined that of numerous and select society.

All the hotels, and many private houses, were occupied by foreigners. The fields, even at this season of the year, were clothed with verdure; and the surrounding country, which is rich and highly cultivated, presented the most charming pictures, especially when lighted up by the moon or by the flames of Etna. The roaring of the crater and noise of the subterranean convulsions were audible as peals of thunder, whilst the lava advanced slowly in a wide torrent, dispersing itself in the hollows, ravines, and clifts, formed by previous eruptions, of which history affords no record. The different lateral openings of the crater were agitated with fearful violence, and they by turns vomited ashes, sand, and scoria, mixed with small quantities of liquid lava. This circumstance, combined with the peculiar nature of the locality (the declivity not being steep), checked the rapid course of the burning torrent, which appeared to be about 600 French feet in breadth, and from 20 to 22 feet in length. The mass seemed to become cool, and to coagulate. Its distance from the nearest cultivated or inhabited point might then be about six Italian miles, and it would require copious eruptions to enable the lava to reach that point. In that direction, therefore, no danger might be feared. On the evening of the 8th December a heavy rain set in, and lasted until the 11th. Every morning a beautiful effect was produced by a zone of snow encircling the upper part of the cone, and thus forming a boundary between the cultivated region, abounding in luxuriant vegetation, and the region of terror and destruction. The volcano continued to throw out columns of fire and immense masses of thick black vapour. On the 12th and 13th the lava had not made much progress in advance, which served to confirm the opinion that it was cooling, at least superficially. On the 14th some shocks of the earthquake were felt, but they were not very severe. A great number of foreigners continued to arrive and depart.



THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussee d'Antin, 5th January, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur.—Amidst the numerous gaities attendant upon the present season, and with a people so proverbially tasteful as the Parisians in every thing that regards dress, it becomes for a moment difficult, in the great variety seen at a public assemblege here, to select that which may be actually called the fashion. You must, therefore, allow me to choose at random from those which appear to me the most tasteful and recherché, and which seem to be most generally adopted by public taste. Let me then mention in the first place, a ball dress which I observed at a late splendid reunion, and which, whether on the score of taste, simplicity, or effect, was most successful. It was a simple robe of gauze over gauze, which had no other ornament than a high bertie of blonde, a single flower, and a knot of ribbons. Nothing could be more simple, nothing more elegant than this costume, which, however, had the advantage of appearing on the person of a most lovely woman. At the same party I took notice of several other novelties—amongst others, several dresses in rose-coloured or white tulle, with four garnitures of the same material, embroidered en chenette in silver, and placed flat upon the skirt; and the effect was fully as pretty as the finest embroidered lace: the berthe was exactly similar. One of these robes, with gold embroidery and white tulle, was most superb. As a head-dress, nothing I have seen surpasses the figured satin capotes now worn; for though they are very numerous, they are by no means common. One which was worn by a lady of rank was of white figured satin, and had several heads of marabout feathers, united in one point, and fastened by a knot of white ribbon, with the ends hanging down, and terminated with a long twisted ornament. Under the passe there were placed some charming rose and straw-coloured flowers in velvet. But, perhaps, the triumph of this sort of coiffeur, which must be seen to be appreciated, is a delicious cap, called the "bonnet bebet." The name alone describes it, as it is nothing more than broad pieces of blonde, relieved just above the ears by two pretty bows of velvet, fixed in the middle by a brooch of precious stones. One most beautiful one had a rosette of cherry-coloured velvet, with a large diamond in the centre of each rosette; another, more simple, was formed entirely of blonde, with a tuft of little May roses; a third had simply a bouquet of violets, whilst another was ornamented with a mass of little narrow gauze ribbons, rose-coloured and green, which fell on each side of the neck. There were, however, several more elaborate head dresses worn by some of the most elegant women in Paris. These were chiefly of bright green shaded velvet, intermixed with little scarfs in gold thread, terminated with magnificent Arab tassels of gold and green, which fell on either side of the neck, and formed what is here called the Moorish coiffeur. For out-door costume the velvet bournous, lined with ermine, and the Armenian mantle, are still the most fashionable articles, and are to be seen reproduced in satin, velvet, and cloth, with the turn-back buttoned up to the throat, and the sleeves buttoned to the wrists. At all our fashionable parties here, I should remark that nothing is more remarkable than the beautiful hand-screens which are to be seen everywhere; they are mounted with all the elegance of a fan, and adorned with painting and ornaments of extreme cost and beauty.—Adieu, mon cher Monsieur.

HENRIETTE DE B.

FLORICULTURE.

THE SPANISH NIGELLA.

This is the only beautiful species of the genus, the flowers growing very large. There are six species of Nigella, but only two are usually grown in our gardens. Nigella was so named, by Professor Willdenow, from niger, black, in allusion to the colour of the seed. The treatment of this plant is that usual for hardy annuals. The first sowing should be made in the open border, if the weather is favourable, about the end of February; in doing which, remove the earth to the depth of about half an inch; scatter the seed thinly, and replace the earth in an even and neat manner. The plants from this sowing will usually bloom about the end of May; but if a succession of flowers is desired (which, in fact, constitutes the chief feature in the proper management of a flower-garden), more seed should be sown about the middle of March. These plants will produce flowers six or seven weeks later than those from the first sowing. When the plants have grown about an inch and a half in height, a few of them may be transplanted, and thus afford more room for those remaining, and also produce an intermediate and safer blooms, as those removed will reach perfection a fortnight later than those allowed to remain where first sown. The plants require some little attention in fastening them to sticks when they arrive at their full size, or they are liable to injury from wind. For preserving seed, it is essential that none but the ripest is gathered, which may be known by its black colours, and that it is perfectly dry when taken off: it should be kept in small paper bags till wanted. If a sowing is made in the autumn—about the middle of September, the produce will be plants of surprising vigour, and which will bloom a fortnight earlier than those sown in the spring; but for this it is necessary to provide a warm and well drained situation on which to deposit the seed; under such circumstances, the plants withstand the winter without any protection.

EXECUTION OF TWO SPANIARDS AT MONTE VIDEO.—Two young Spaniards, members of one of the first families in Madrid, were recently executed at Monte Video for murder. The motive to the murder was of the most trivial character, but the atrocious circumstances which attended its commission put it altogether out of the power of the judge to interfere with the course of the law. It appeared that, in the course of a political discussion, Francisco Jaramille Etchenique and Fernando Fernandez, the two culprits, had taken great offence at the remarks of Nicolas Garcia, who had been most strenuous in combating their opinions. They accordingly waylaid him, and, when he came out of the house, they, without the slightest further provocation, attacked and murdered him. They then proceeded to cut off his head, and bury his mutilated body in a neighbouring field. After the prisoners had been tried, convicted, and condemned to suffer death for their diabolical crime, great efforts were made by their friends to obtain a commutation of the sentence, but in vain; and, when the day was fixed for the execution, it was stated that some of their countrymen had resolved to prevent their lives from being taken, even by force of arms. A strong body of troops was accordingly ordered out, but no such attempt was made. When the mournful procession reached the Market-place, Jaramille begged an orange and a cigar, which were both given to him, and he nodded coolly to those of his friends whom he recognised in the crowd. On their arrival at the scaffold, Fernandez was so weak that he could scarcely stand, even with support. Jaramille was, however, much more firm. He would not listen to the priests, and held up his head with an air of assumed indifference, while he played with his partly smoked but now extinguished cigar. While on the scaffold he was called out to the Spaniards present to resene him. They were then fastened each to a low bench by the negroes in attendance, but they for some time obstinately refused to allow their eyes to be bandaged. At length all being ready, they received two successive discharges of musketry of five or six pieces each, and died after much struggling, showing remarkable tenacity to life. The execution was a frightful butchery, and an evidence of the necessity of some more certain and speedy mode of taking the lives of offenders against the laws.

ABOLITION OF THE SLAVE TRADE AND THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

Among all the glorious achievements which have reflected undying lustre on the English name, among all the great measures which our legislature has passed during a long series of ages, for the advancement both of national prosperity, and the general welfare of humanity, among all the claims we have established to the admiration of succeeding ages as the great diffusers of civilisation and benefactors of our species, there is none which has a stronger title to the gratitude of the world than the persevering efforts of the British government, continued for half a century, for the extinction of the African slave trade. Notwithstanding all the efforts which have been made by our rivals or enemies to depreciate the purity of our motives, and to ascribe to self-interest or to a tyrannical love of domination and intolerance for the customs of others, that course of action which really had its origin in the native generosity and humane inclinations of the British people, it is certain that posterity will do us justice, and that the good men of future times will regard with unmixed admiration the noble policy which we have pursued in reference to this great subject. From the period of 1784, when the frightful mortality in the West Indies and on the coast of Africa, with all those aggravated miseries caused by the proceedings of the slavers, attracted the attention of Clarkson and Wilberforce, and roused a religious nation to protest against the monstrous cruelties perpetrated on the benighted heathens of Ethiopia by men who dared to call themselves Christians, the exertions of our public men have been steadily directed to crush these enormities. Nor is this a matter for which any one political party in the state can take exclusive credit. Statesmen of all creeds and opinions have been forward to denounce and expose the mischief, to stigmatise its authors, to brand and crucify their abettors in the face of the civilized world, and to punish with deserved severity their crimes. Pitt and Fox, those intellectual giants who were the pillars of the empire, and whose names were the watch-word of contending factions, both joined with equal sincerity in the glorious work. The former uniformly gave his warmest support to every proposal which was made in Parliament for abolishing the slave trade; the latter had the crowning glory, which circumstances precluded to his rival, of suppressing it by legal enactment. Wyndham, Burke, Grenville, Huskisson, and Mackintosh, those philosophical minds who stood more aloof from the mere strife of party, lent their hearty co-operation. In this field the brightest triumphs of Brougham were achieved; and in days still more recent, Peel and Russell, Palmerston and Stanley, have been active in this warfare against the powers of darkness. These indeed are men who well deserve to be held

Lights of the world, and demigods of fame!

Nor was it only our legislators who were zealous in the cause. Vain would have been their efforts, had they not been, we will not say seconded, but spurred on, stimulated, and outstripped by the energies of the people. That love of freedom, which Nature has implanted in the breasts of Englishmen, in order that they might become the masters of the world, and set a bright example to the less noble nations of the Continent, was never more gloriously exemplified than on this question. Casting aside all love of lucre, and disregarding even the interests of commerce for more worthy purposes, they sacrificed property to an immense amount in abandoning the slave trade, that they might be no more contaminated by that moral plague, nor have on their heads the blood of the benighted children of Africa. At length their labours were consummated by the measure of 1833, which set the seal of triumph on the work, and for ever put an end to slavery within the circle of their wide-spread dominion. This is an act of which they may be more truly proud than even of the thousand victories which adorn the wondrous history of England.

Turning now to our neighbours of France, among whom the question of the right of search, in connection with the slave trade, now excites such keen discussion, what contrast can be more humiliating and disgraceful than that which their conduct offers? Down to the present day they have viewed our efforts with a cold indifference, and, for a long time, even with decided hostility. At the peace of 1814, and again in 1815, they resisted our solicitations to abolish the slave trade, which they were allowed, from too great indulgence on our part to their barbarous prejudices, to continue for seven years longer, and not yet have they mustered courage, if ever they will, to imitate our example in giving freedom to the slave. Their ministers denounced even this tardy concession as "an anti-national treaty," and would fain have continued the trade to the present day. At length, after repeated entreaties—after every resource of diplomacy had been well nigh exhausted, and the instances of the British Government had been pushed to the last degree of urgency, they consented to a certain degree of co-operation in putting down the traffic still carried on; and in 1831 and 1833 treaties were concluded, granting power to search all ships suspected of being engaged in it, and, if found guilty of participation, to detain them, and send them for trial before the tribunals of their respective countries. Similar treaties were also concluded with European states, of less power, indeed, than France, but possessing greater commerce, and a more numerous maritime population, in proportion to their size. Holland, ever jealous of its naval strength and honour, Sweden and Denmark, those powerful limbs of the celebrated "armed neutrality" of the north, also acceded to the convention. Again in 1838 England took measures for obtaining the sanction of all the great powers of Christendom to a treaty still more extensive and effectual; France, apparently awakened to a sense of shame for her backwardness, eagerly joined in the endeavour, and even seemed bent on taking the lead in activity. The treaty was concluded, and signed in London by representatives of Austria, France, England, Prussia, and Russia. Well! how did France act? Did she remain faithful to her engagements, and adhere to the compact to which she had set her seal? Nothing of the kind. The ancient rancour of her people against England had been roused anew by the political events of 1840, and her politicians pretended to discover that it would be dishonourable, forsooth! to keep the faith they had pledged, and remain parties to a treaty to which the whole of Christian Europe had acceded. On the shallowest of all pretences,—that it would interfere with and embarrass the operations of legitimate commerce in the tropical seas—as if England had no commerce!—the French government refused to ratify the treaty, without which of course it became mere waste paper. And now, not content with this, her rabid politicians are seeking to annul the ratified treaties of 1831 and 1833, which have been the unquestioned law of the seas for ten years, and have been acted upon in every part of the Atlantic, with less inconvenience to commerce than the most sanguine friend of humanity could have anticipated, and with enduring benefit to that unfortunate race for whose good they were concluded. It appears to be the general expectation, that the legislature of France, a country which claims, in the height of its presumption and vanity, to be the metropolis of civilisation, will address their sovereign to abrogate these conventions.

Can the history of nations afford a parallel to the infamy of the conduct we have detailed? Is such faithlessness to be tolerated in an age which boasts its superior morality, and among a people which vaunts its enlightenment? If the war party in France, which, in the excess of its hatred to us, would stop short at no crime—could they but hound on their king's ministers to cry "havoc, and let slip the dogs of war,"—should be successful in its present object, that success will be fatal to the character of their government and their country, which has already received several heavy blows; but we trust that M. Guizot, who has evinced an honourable attachment to the faith of these treaties, will resist their violation to the last. It is not enough, it would seem, to sneak meanly out of an engagement into which they had recently entered, under the pretext that the forms of diplomacy allowed them to refuse to set their seal to their own treaty, but national compacts of long standing, which had become part of the public law of Europe, and acquired a sacred character in the eyes of her jurists, are to be broken through and cast to the winds! Should they dare to commit this act of treachery, "Punic faith" will no longer be the word, but "Gallic faith." No country will henceforth make a treaty with the French, or it will make it only to depart from it at the first convenient moment. Their name will become a by-word among the nations. Avoided and detested, no state which respects itself will court their amity, or seek their intercourse; they will be regarded as the wolves of Europe.

But to the people of England we say—go on in your glorious career, disregarding alike the faithlessness of pretended friends, or the menaces and hostility of avowed enemies. Relax not in your efforts, nor turn aside from the good work, and be satisfied that you are already on the eve of final triumph. The measures which your Government have passed have well-nigh crushed the Hydra; and the treaties which are in negotiation with Spain and Portugal, with Brazil and the South American powers, will, ere long, sweep from the seas the last vestiges of this accursed traffic.

RESOLUTION BAY, MARQUESAS ISLAND.

This "worthless cluster" of islands has lately been taken possession of by the French Government, by whom they are regarded of such importance as to be referred to in the King's speech. "By the occupation of the Marquesas Islands," said Louis Philippe a few days since, "I have secured to our navigators in those distant seas a protection and refuge of which the necessity had long been felt." It may be interesting, therefore, to glance at the actual worth of this newly-acquired possession of the French, which, we suspect, will be found far below the royal estimate.

The Marquesas, then, were so called in honour of the Marquis of Mendoza, Viceroy of Peru, at the time of their discovery in 1595, by the Spanish navigator Mendana de Neyra, whence the cluster is also called the Mendana Archipelago. After being long forgotten, they were re-discovered and attentively examined by Cook: they lie in the Pacific Ocean, and extend about 200 miles in a north-east and south-west direction, between 10° 30′ and 7° 50′ S. lat., and 138° and 141° W. long. A wide channel divides them into two groups, of which the south-eastern contains five, and the north-eastern eight islands. The latter, having been discovered by the Americans in 1797, are also called Washington's Islands. They were examined in 1804 by Krusenstern, and have since been frequently touched at by British and American ships. The largest islands of the southern group are Santa Dominica, or Hevaoa; Santa Christina, or Tahuata; and Hood's Island, or Tibon: they are about ten miles in length. The principal islands of the northern group are Noukahivah, Nahuga, and Naopa. Noukahivah, the largest, is nearly twenty miles long and seventy miles in circumference. Each island is traversed lengthwise by rocky mountains, which, in the larger one, rise to 3000 or 3000 feet; and from this ridge are offsets extending to the sea shore, and thus dividing the low land into valleys, which are fertile and picturesque, and copiously watered. The coast is rocky, abrupt, and surf-beaten. Noukahivah is decidedly of volcanic origin, and of rich soil; and "A Recent Visitor to the Marquesas" (in the Times) states this to be the only island which possesses "anything like a harbour or anchorage:" he mentions also two natural curiosities—one, an enormous tree, 108 feet in girth, measured by his own hands, and which was, probably, flourishing before the flood; the other, an intoxicating spring of water: in Murray's "Encyclopædia of Geography," too, is mentioned a cascade in Noukahiva, 2000 feet high.

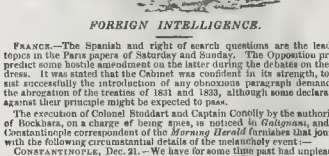
The climate is very healthy, but rather warm, the thermometer seldom descending below 64° or 65°; in June it is about 80°. Rain is the characteristic of winter; but sometimes the want of rain for nine or ten months causes famine. The prevailing wind is the eastern trade-wind, which blows strongest in autumn. Thunder storms are of rare occurrence. The cocoa-nut, bread-fruit, and papaw are the principal fruit trees; and bananas, sweet potatoes, and taro are cultivated. The sugar-cane is abundant, of large growth, and excellent quality: tobacco is much raised, and the wild cotton superior; but the natives make their garments from the bark of the mulberry-tree. From the plant which yields the liquor kawa they also make their mats. The animals are hogs and rats; the dog is wanting; fish is abundant, and commonly eaten.

Thus far, little appears unfavourable to the French occupation of these islands; but the character of the inhabitants remains to be described. They belong to the Society and Sandwich Islands race, as is evident from their language and bodily conformation. Their complexion is of a dark copper, but the women are much lighter than the men. Their figure has been described as the most finely formed of almost any known race; and Langsdorf states the measure taken of the body of one of their chiefs to have agreed exactly with the proportions of the Apollo Belvidere. As in the case of the Patagonians, however, this fine stature is an exception, and not the average; for later travellers state the men to vary in height from 4ft. 10in. to 6ft. They tatoo the body more perfectly than any other nation; distinguished persons are covered with figures of very beautiful pattern, so that the skin becomes the mere canvas of a picture. The women have handsome features, but ill-formed limbs, and they hold virtue in scarcely any estimation. The latest accounts represent the people to be cannibals, eating the bodies of their enemies who are killed in battle, and of other persons at the instigation of their priests, or rather sorcerers: in time of famine, too, women and children are killed for food. Their sorcerers have great influence over the people, and have hitherto frustrated the labours of Christian missionaries in the islands; although the natives have otherwise shown themselves friendly to Europeans, and they are ordinarily friendly, open, and engaging. Krusenstern states the population of the entire cluster to be about 40,000, of whom 18,000 are assigned to Noukahiva.

The people have chiefs, but they are without authority: all are subject to King Vatete, whose barbarous state proved very amusing to his recent French visitors: his holiday costume was limited to a French colonel's uniform and one shirt; while that of the Queen consisted of only one petticoat, which had long done theatrical duty on board the French Admiral's frigate. The "Recent Visitor" (in the Times) has lately smoked a cigar with his naked Majesty, who is a fat, good-natured personage, who all day under a shady tree in Resolution Bay. This correspondent, having visited the entire group, asserts that, "as to soil, harbour, situation, and appropriateness for either occupation or emigration, the Marquesas are the most worthless cluster of islands in the Pacific Ocean; and so far from whalers and other ships being able to procure supplies of hogs, fruit, and vegetables, the scanty inhabitants can hardly provide for themselves." Nevertheless, the French papers state that the Danaë frigate is ordered to convoy two transports to the Marquesas, laden with troops and stores for the new colony: the appointment of Capt. Brust, as Governor, has been announced by royal ordonnance, dated Jan. 4; and a sub-commissioner, principal secretary, and four secretaries of the marine are about to be nominated to make up the local government; thus being the first act of "the last French farce" of colonization.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Spanish and right of search questions are the leading topics in the Paris papers of Saturday and Sunday. The Opposition prints predict some hostile amendment on the latter during the debates on the address. It was stated that the Cabinet was confident in its strength, to resist successfully the introduction of any obnoxious paragraph demanding the abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833, although some declaration against their principle might be expected to pass.

The execution of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly by the authorities of Bockhara, on a charge of being spies, is noticed in Galignani, and the Constantinople correspondent of the Morning Herald furnishes that journal with the following circumstantial details of the melancholy event:—

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 21.—We have for some time past had unpleasant reports in circulation concerning the fate of two British officers of great merit who were in Central Asia, and were detained as prisoners at Bockhara, but as the climax of their misfortunes might possibly have been unfounded, I abstained from alluding to them, lest their mention should create uncalled for anxiety and distress among their friends at home. Hearing, however, now that the details regarding these gentlemen have been confirmed by official communication, there is no longer any necessity or withholding the facts. The two officers in question were Colonel Stoddart, formerly attached to the mission in Persia, and Captain Conolly, who wrote a most interesting work of his travels in Central Asia, and who was here in 1837 or 1838. They were detained by the authorities of Bockhara as spies, and could, it is said, have got away through the favour of the Russian political agent, but refused his assistance; and, after a number of trials and sufferings, they were at last taken from prison to the market-place, where Colonel Stoddart was first beheaded. That having been done, Captain Conolly could still have saved himself had he consented to embrace Islamism. He firmly rejected this offer, and he also immediately fell under the headsman's knife. Such is the relation as I learnt it. Both must have been Government agents, one bound to Khiva, the other to Khokan. Communications with that distant part of the world are so irregular and uncertain, that it strikes me as being still possible that our countrymen alluded to may be in existence, whilst their friends mourn over their deaths.

The overdue London mail of Thursday was received simultaneously with that of Friday, at a late hour on Sunday morning in the French capital, where the weather continued terrific, and the accounts of damages, both from the interior and exterior, supplied lamentable details.

The Courrier Français mentions a rumour that the Committee of the Peers has in its address adopted a paragraph against the right of search.

The Courrier Français says:—It was stated last evening, in the best-informed circles, that the ministry had come to the resolution to retire in a body, or to dissolve the Chamber, if it should not succeed in keeping out from the address the paragraph relating to the right of search, which the grand majority of the Deputies of all shades of opinion desire to introduce.

The Constitutionnel contains the following with regard to the Baron Thierry:—Our readers will remember that pretensions had been set up by Baron Thierry to the sovereignty of New Zealand as a sovereign chief, but that his claim having been disputed by the English Government, he contented himself with remaining at New Zealand as a simple landowner with some thirty or forty leagues of territory, but it was not generally known that he had also declared himself king of a portion of the Marquesas, and received a formal recognition of his authority from the chiefs. Then followed the act of recognition:—"We, kings and chiefs of this island (Nukaheva), take a solemn oath in favour of the person of Baron Charles de Thierry, our King and Governor—an oath by which, according to our ancient customs, whoever shall touch his person, flag, or property, will become our mortal enemy.—Signed at the port of Anna Maria, in the island of Nukaheva, the 21st day of the year 1835, and the first of the reign of our sovereign King Charles." Anna King of Hoohaha, grand priest; the chief of Vavanova, King of Partna; the chief of Nehetro, King of Nukaheva; the King of Horogs; the King of Tipui; the sovereign of Platine, Queen of Happa; the sovereign of Hoohaka, Queen of Nukaheva; the chief of Mananooha, King of Heppa.—Witnessed by Edward Firgus."

With this is the following certificate:—"We hereby certify that we have seen the flag of the Baron de Thierry, sovereign Chief of New Zealand and King of Nukaheva, hoisted at the port of Anna Maria by the chiefs and kings of that island, the 22nd of July, 1835."

The Constitutionnel adds that the flag and royal seal of the Baron de Thierry were sent officially to Admiral Rosamel, the French Minister of Marine, in 1838.

The contents of the Paris papers of Tuesday are of little interest. In the absence of news they are chiefly occupied with denunciations of England and the English, and blustering demands for the abrogation of the right-of-search treaties. The consistence appointed to draw up the address in reply to the Royal Speech received on Monday the explanations of all the ministers (with the exception of the Minister of Commerce) in regard to their respective departments. Dupin, the meeting Messrs. Odilon Barrot and Dupin deprecated the policy of M. Guizot on the right-of-search question, and were opposed in their turn by Messrs. Dumon, Hebert, Felix Real, and Desjobert. The last two deputies, however, joined M. Bignon in demanding that a paragraph suggesting negotiations on the subject should form part of the Address. The Spanish question was next discussed.

The committee appointed to draw up the address in the Chamber of Peers had nearly concluded their labours. The Duke of Glucksburg, chairman of the committee, was to send the address to the Chamber on Wednesday, with a view to its being voted in the course of the week. The Opposition journals express a confident belief that M. Guizot will give way on the right-of-search question. His friends appear to be of a different opinion, and seem to think that he will not swerve in the slightest degree from his purpose, and that if he maintains this resolution he will be enabled to command a majority. The question is literally one of peace or war. The effects of the late hurricane appear to have been as severe in France as in England. At Boradeaux the floods were so extensive that the mail did not arrive until several hours after it was due, and was then conveyed part of the distance in a boat. The Saone has risen ten feet in twenty-four hours.

SPAIN. We are gratified at being enabled to state that there are every grounds to expect that the misunderstanding between the Spanish and French Cabinets will be arranged in an amicable manner, without sacrifice of personal dignity on the one hand, and with full satisfaction for substantial complaints on the other.

An Englishman named Scott, and calling himself colonel and agent in the service of Abdel Kader, had been making himself very busy and ridiculous in the cafés at Bayonne, by attempting to induce Spanish officers to enlist for the Emir. Unfortunately the man did not pay his bill, and his baggage was seized by the Italian landlord of the Quatre Nacons.

A melancholy shipwreck occurred at the entrance of the port of Passages. The lost vessel was the Spanish brig Velero, and had on board three indos. Every body perished with the exception of the captain.

A petition to the Chamber of Deputies for the transportation of galleys to the Marquesas is being numerously signed. These vagrants are a perfect nuisance in the neighbourhood.

The Belvidera sailed from Toulon on the 7th for Malta. On the same day a boat belonging to the Tilsitt was captured, and 4 seamen out of 6 drowned. A very unfortunate gale drowned. On the 8th the war steamer Ramier left Toulon for Tunis.

A battalion of 970 men is ordered to be formed immediately at Brest, for the Marquesas. The force at present there are two companies of the 3rd Marine Regiment, 31 artillerymen, and 18 engineers. The 17th company of artillery is also under orders.

Captain Pereira, who a few months ago stole the colours of the regiment of Isabella II., and attempted to enter Portugal, has been ordered to be confined as a lunatic in the asylum at Valencia. Such will be a severe punishment to the young man, and a more foolish than mad.

Disputes between the Political Chief of Bilbao and the new Ayuntamiento continue, and much angry feelings prevail in consequence.

The forced contributions in Barcelona appears to have made but little progress, and great discontent prevails on the subject. Fear, anxiety, and resentment appear to have taken possession of every mind. Up to the 8th instant, at six o'clock in the evening, the total amount received of the moiety levied on commerce and trade was 786,008 reals, or about one eighth of what those branches are to pay, and from the proprietors 1,979 reals, or £745, which is intended is 6,000,000, or £60,000! From both species of property the total amount, as yet collected, is about £8000, from the commencement up to the latest date; but references to be yet paid up as £113,000, and for this only 6 days are yet to run: £38,000 per day must then have been paid!

It was said that the officers of the National Guard at Madrid intended to present an address to the Government, praying for the adoption of measures against the licentiousness of the daily press. The editor of El Sol, having been informed that some violence was contemplated against him, immediately waited on the Political Chief, to apprise him of his fears. The functionary hastened to reassure him, and promised him the protection of the authorities. No illegal attempt was made, and the conduct of the Government on that occasion had dispelled the apprehensions of the friends of the liberty of the press.

PORTUGAL.—LISBON, Jan. 9.—The Cortes were opened by the Queen in person on the 2nd instant.

The sessions of the past week have been taken up with the usual preliminaries, and, in all probability, another or two will elapse without any business of importance being entered upon. This is not to be wondered at, when, in 1840, fifteen days were actually wasted in discussing the literal meaning and value of the word "co-operate." This is no ill-natured criticism, but a positive fact. On the second day of the meeting of the members, their whole time was occupied in a long controversy relative to the election of the president, and whether the presidency should be an annual one or otherwise. This debate led to another difficulty, which was, how was the beginning and end of the legislative year to be considered and decided; and, finally, an adjournment of the question was proposed, as being too intricate and important for any hasty determination respecting it. Such is the sort of Parliament to which the interests and almost vitality of the country are confided! It cannot be denied that there are, among the members of both Houses, men of very superior talent, but if it is never brought into action, the people they represent are beginning to doubt the advisableness of the system they have adopted in the case of the Peninsular war.

OPORTO AND THE PAPER. PAPERS.—AMSTERDAM, Jan. 12.—The Staats Courant publishes the additional article to the convention with France for the transmission of letters and journals between the two kingdoms, by which additional article they are to be sent in transit through Belgium, by the shortest route, that is, between the French office at Lille, and the Dutch office at Breda

Jan. 15.—We learn that a great number of our principal commercial houses have signed a petition to the second Chamber of the States-General, containing numerous objections of our merchants to the treaty concluded with Belgium on the 5th of November last year.

THE HAGUE, Jan. 13.—On the 7th of this month, in the evening, the English barque the Centenary, Captain James Foster, with a cargo of beans, bound from Alexandria (in Egypt) to Rotterdam, was stranded in the Banjaard. The crew, consisting of fifteen men, including an English and a Flemish pilot, have arrived at Scharrendyke, and are placed under quarantine. On the 9th the vessel lay on one side; and it is probable that, in consequence of the stormy weather, but little of the cargo will be saved.

A despatch has been received from the Vice-Consul of the Netherlands at Tantajo, who states that an iron lighthouse has been erected at the extreme end of the east part of the harbour; it is 55 feet above the level of the sea.

Private letters received at Rotterdam state that on the 9th of September last another fire took place at Semarlanya, which reduced to ashes nine hundred houses, of which four hundred were of brick and roofed with tiles. The particulars are not known, but it is believed that the Commercial Company has not suffered any loss on this occasion.

The Petersburgh Journal of Commerce of the 28th of December gives the list of the articles of the tariff, the import duty on which is changed. Among them are woollen cloths and shawls; English cotton, and German cotton, silk, woollen, and mixed manufactured goods; and all articles worked and embroidered with coloured patterns, in the manner of the Turkish and Cashmere goods; likewise all those which have merely worked and embroidered borders woven or sewed to them; and all new manufactures of this kind; the duty on which will be 9 rubles 45 copecks silver.

GENERAL AFFAIRS in this country are becoming more and more critical. It appears to be a matter beyond all doubt, that the treasury is completely empty. At the first council of ministers after his nomination, Monsieur Scarlis, by an ingenious balancing hold of the King by the hand, and by various other sayings and doings, gave ample proof of being mad, and the wits of Athens of course asserted that the first sight of the empty chest drove him so. Be this as it may, it was evident enough that another minister must be looked for; but such is the notoriety of the difficulties of the King in his financial affairs, that, although men of all parties have been applied to, not one has been found to undertake the hopeless task of "making a purse out of a sow's ear," or, in other words, to squeeze money out of a people reduced to rags and beggary by the grinding system of the Bavarians.

Publicly, after two years' refusal to listen to all claims, it appears that the Greek Government has not refused the British mission here that the question of the claims of the British merchants arising from the abolition of the vessels at Patras, and overcharged duty on currants in 1840, is acknowledged; but it is said that, in making this avowal, the Greek Government asserts its incapacity of paying the claims, which amount to the enormous sum of £60,000. It must not, however, be supposed that King Otho has given in with a good grace; for it is well known that Lord Aberdeen has been obliged to reiterate Lord Palmerston's threat of sending an English squadron to Greece to bring him to reason; and it is only the knowledge King Otho had that such an event would have been the signal for a revolution throughout Greece that has induced him to own himself in the wrong. But what a humiliating confession for a Government to make, that it cannot afford to return a sum of £40,000, which it owns it had no right to possess itself of!

AMERICA.—ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA. UNITED STATES.—The fine steam-ship Britannia, Captain Hewitt, arrived at Liverpool about nine o'clock on Sunday night last. She sailed on the 3rd from Halifax, about ten at night, and has consequently made the passage across the Atlantic in less than twelve days, bringing twenty-four passengers. Captain Hewitt has been presented by his passengers with a handsome piece of plate. The news by the present arrival, although extending over twelve days, is by no means prolific in interest.

Congress was in session, but the public business had, as usual, been impeded by needless declamation and personal squabbling. Nearly a month of the session had been consumed, and as only two months remained for business, there was little hope of much, if any, progress being made with the tariff, the exchequer, and other topics of paramount importance.

The intelligence which had been received from this country respecting the termination of the war between Great Britain and China had not been without a favourable effect upon trade. The price of tea had become depressed, and brother Jonathan fondly expected that he would share with his friend and relation, John Bull, the full tide of success likely to result from the cessation of hostilities.

A new and splendid packet-ship, of 1000 tons burden, named the Ashburton, has just been completed, and would sail for Liverpool on the 7th inst. Her cabin is described as one of the finest specimens of naval joinery ever seen in the United States. Two other large ships, intended for the Liverpool packet trade, were in progress. It is remarkable that the merchants of New York should be extending their shipping at a moment when their operations are so much depressed, and therefore with but little augmentation of import duties.

It is gratifying to find that the question of State indebtedness and repudiation was undergoing a thorough discussion, not merely in the newspapers, but in the State Legislatures. Governor Porter, of the Governor of the State of Mississippi, who had approved of the repudiation robbery, and the other Governors in their inaugural addresses, and the press generally, had condemned such dishonesty in unmeasured terms of censure in strong and manly terms respecting the necessity of preserving the national honour unstained and inviolate.

A court-martial was being held at Brooklyn, respecting the late mutiny on board the Somers, the horrifying details of which are already before the English public. The inquiry had not terminated, but, as far as it had progressed, the belief was general that the commander and officers had performed a perfectly justifiable act in condemning and hanging the chief parties implicated in that notorious business.

The news from South America is not devoid of interest. A young general, named Hercelis, who was recently banished from Peru, had secretly returned with 300 men; and in a battle had defeated General Jorrico, with a much larger force, leaving a number of the latter dead on the field. Peru was, as may be imagined, in a very unsettled state, and the victor had possessed himself of all the northern provinces. Bolivia was quiet, and Chili in a prosperous state, principally owing, as the Mercantile Gazette of Valparaiso, it is asserted, in the accounts from Buenos Ayres, that Rivera, the President of Monte Video, had formed an alliance with the insurgents in the Brazilian province of Rio Grande, and that in consequence the Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires had demanded his passports.

The news from Mexico and Texas is unimportant. Santa Anna was still residing at his country-house near the city of Mexico. The message of Houstan, the President of Texas, has given general satisfaction. A vessel (the Kmeline) arrived at New York from Tampico reported that an English steamer had been lying there for several days, and had come in on the day of her sailing (December the 5th) for the purpose of receiving, for transportation to England, a large amount of specie. A conducta was expected at Tampico from the interior on the 7th of the same month with a million and a half of dollars, of which 200,000 were destined for New Orleans. The captain also reported the wreck of the English brig Prince Albert on the coast of Tampico bar. The value of the vessel and cargo was estimated at 240,000 dollars, which would prove a total loss.

Colonel WATSON WEBB, the famous editor of the Courier and Inquirer, after consenting to the New York District Court suing one of his brother journalists calls a "jolly sum" in his schedule, hands in the following as his assets:—"I state to the court that I have not made out any schedule of property because I have no real estate whatever, except what is described in schedule A, and which is encumbered far beyond its value. So also with regard to the personal estate, I have literally none. Under the last execution issued against me, I surrendered to the sheriff of the city of New York the few articles of household furniture which I had at my lodgings at 47, Murray-street, the books, bed, and bedding, et cetera, which had been sold off at sale by the sheriff of Queen's county, under the laws of New York, and the few articles of jewellery of my wife, including my own watch. I state, therefore, that I have no property, either real or personal, except one small carpet—four chairs—a few knives, forks, &c., and the necessary wearing apparel for myself and family; that I have lived on a weekly salary since my failure in 1837, and that schedule A includes loans made to me since my failure, by personal friends, for the purpose of aiding me in the support of my family."

THE SOMERS' MUTINY.—NAVAL COURT OF INQUIRY.—The inquiry into this extraordinary case of mutiny in the American navy, the particulars of which we gave in our last, had not concluded when the latest accounts left Washington. Commander Mackenzie had furnished the Government with a clear and succinct account of the affair from the first indication of the mutiny until the final execution of the unhappy culprits; and adds, with great sincerity, his belief that had they lived to reach America without carrying their diabolical plot into execution, they would have met a clear death as an American a man with money and influential friends can always get clear.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Extract from a letter dated Buenos Ayres, Nov. 7.—"The war still goes on with vigour. The Federal forces (ROSAS) are concentrating in Entre Rios to the number, it is said, of 12,000. The savages (Orientalists) are also strong, a large auxiliary force has never been known to be added in any former war. I think the congregated force may amount to 20,000 combatants by the last accounts. The Corrientine forces are again commanded by PAZ; these, as well as the Orientales, are on the coast of Santa Fe Paraguay, on the confines of Entre Rios. They may have a fight soon; at any rate they cannot remain much longer as they are, for corn is getting to be a scarce article with them. There is no saying how things will end, but I think the Federals will prevail, yet when they shall have attained their purpose they will have a bootless prize, for ere they can achieve their ends, the country will be made a desert. Some time ago an English man-of-war's vessel contrived to pass Martin Garcia, and proceeded up the Parana. Admiral Brown went in pursuit, and came up with them five leagues south of the Esquina, when, after a hard fight, the Englishmen abandoned and set fire to their vessels, leaving wounded and prisoners to blow up with them; it is said a hundred persons lost their lives in the explosion."

CANADA.—Angry determination on the subject of the recent Government appointments continue to form the stock subject of the Canada papers. Even those journals which are most opposed to the policy of the governor join in expressing ardent wishes for his restoration to health and vigour.

SIR CHARLES BAGOT.—The Kingston Chronicle of the 21st of December, says:—It is with feelings of heartfelt pleasure we announce to our readers that the health of his Excellency the Governor-General has much improved for the last two days. The disease seems to have taken a favourable turn, and there are now good hopes of his ultimate recovery.

WHOLESALE DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY.—All the mills situated on the streams flowing into the Bras d'Or Lake, with but one exception, are said to have been swept away by the recent freshets. Such extensive injury to property has not been experienced since this island became a British colony.

THE BRAZILS.—His Excellency the Right Hon. Henry Ellis, late ambassador extraordinary to the Persian court, arrived per her Britannic Majesty's steamer Salamander, on the 11th ultimo, on a special mission from the court of St. James to the court of Brazil. The presentation of the right hon. gentleman took place on the 19th, when his excellency was received with the honours paid to an ambassador.

Her Majesty's packet, Lieutenant Herrick commander, arrived at Falmouth on Sunday last, and landed mails from the Brazils, bringing advices from Rio de Janeiro (whence she has come home direct) to the 27th of November, the day of her sailing, and having on freight about £40,000 in gold and diamonds.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CARMARTHEN.—ATROCIOUS MURDER.—A most dreadful murder has lately been committed in the parish of Llanon, in the county of Carmarthen, it is supposed by one Margaret Hughes, and her daughter, Elizabeth Hughes, on the bodies of two male infant children, of which the former was delivered about the beginning of the present month. We have not been able to collect the whole of the particulars of this most unnatural murder, but it appears that Margaret Hughes, whose husband was transported, told one of her neighbours she had dreamed one of their children had fallen into an old coal-pit, and said it would be better to have it filled up, fearing an accident might occur. It seems the daughter intended employing a person to fill it up, which gave rise to a suspicion that something was wrong; upon which E. Thomas, constable, and others were induced to examine the pit, where, to their horror, they found the bodies of two fine newly-born male infant children. Evidence as to the criminality of the two prisoners was taken before the Rev. Mr. W. Glendare, sen., when both were committed to take their trial at the ensuing assizes.

DOVER.—On Sunday last a very singular circumstance occurred at St. Mary's Church, Dover. A young woman actually forbade her own banns, much to the astonishment of the clergyman, and to the very great surprise of the congregation. Not content with raising her own voice in public protest against the odious match, and "to make assurance doubly sure," the fair damsel enlisted her mother into the service, and having performed the duet of "I forbid the banns," they took their departure from the church. The young woman, who is a servant at the Rose, had been previously informed that although the banns were published, she was not compelled to change her name; but having some misgivings, and much dread of becoming Mrs. ——— (which the banns aforesaid proposed she should do), she adopted the above novel course, and herself threw in the way "the just cause and impediment." The hapless swain will not fail to remember that "there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip."

HINDLEY.—DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE. The Manchester Guardian says that the Rev. W. Corbett, the Catholic minister of that place, has just opened an institution for the diffusion of knowledge; and the entire expense of preparing the building, supplying it with books and papers, paying the teachers and others in attendance, and every further cost incidental to the undertaking, he purposes defraying from his own private purse. A great number of the inhabitants will, doubtless, avail themselves of this liberal and enlightened generosity; indeed, there is but one opinion as to the universal feeling of gratitude expressed in favour of the rev. gentleman.

LANCASHIRE.—AN EFFECTUAL OPIATE.—A few days ago a simple lad, in the employment of a respectable firm in the Lake district, had been threatened by the foreman with a flogging for neglect of duty. This threat preyed so much upon his mind as to deprive him of sleep for several nights. At length, to obtain some relief, he communicated his distress to two of his companions, expressing his wish that the flogging was over; that he could neither sleep nor eat for the thoughts of it. His companions told him that the remedy for the complaint might easily be provided, and that, if he would go to the stable, and submit to be tied up, they would apply the punishment, the expectation of which caused him so much apprehension. This the lad immediately complied with; and the next morning, upon returning to his work, told them he was very glad it was over, as he had slept very comfortably.

LEAMINGTON SPA.—Gaieties and festivities follow each other in rapid succession at this fashionable watering-place, which is now filled with visitors. A ball was given at the Shire-hall in Warwick, on Tuesday evening last, by the Odd Fellows, for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans' Fund, established by the Society, when upwards of six hundred persons were present. A grand dejeûné was served in sumptuous style, at the Regent Hotel here, on Thursday last, in honour of the nuptials of Blaney Townley Balfour, Esq., with Miss Reynell; the Earl and Countess of Ripon, Earl of Enniskillen, Hon. Lowry Cole, &c., being among the number of the guests. Doctor Jephson has distributed during the past week to the poor of the parish more than a thousand tickets for the supply of coals. The leaders of the beau monde have also lately, as usual at other seasonable acts of charity have been performed by the wealthier classes for the relief and comfort of the necessitous.

LIVERPOOL.—PROSECUTION FOR SABBATH-BREAKING.—Five cases of alleged Sabbath profanation were brought before Mr. Rushton, stipendiary magistrate, at the Police Court, and excited the attention of an immense number of the merchants and other inhabitants of the town, partly on account of the extraordinary and unusual nature of the proceedings themselves, and partly because Mr. R. Gladstone (the mayor of the borough, and the brother of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade) was one of the parties mainly interested in the result. His worship occupied a seat on the right of the bench, surrounded by several gentlemen. The first case investigated was that of Joseph Sheppard, a newsvendor, of Vauxhall-road, who had been summoned on a charge of having his shop open for the sale of the London journals and other publications on the preceding Sunday. This was the third occasion, during as many weeks, on which Sheppard had been summoned on a similar charge. On the two former occasions he had been fined in the penalty of 5*s.* for each offence, but on both he informed the court that it was utterly impossible for him to meet the demands of his customers unless his shop was open on the Sunday; that he was determined to keep it open, even though he should thereby subject himself to a 5*s.* penalty for every infraction of the act during the next twelve months; and that he could not understand why he, a poor man, should be singled out as an object of persecution, while the mayor was permitted with impunity to ride to and from church in his carriage, the public newsrooms of the town were kept open, and many of the more respectable of the inhabitants were allowed to indulge themselves in other practices on the Sabbath, of a like profanatory nature! Mr. Rushton, while he admitted the justness of this line of reasoning, and the necessity that existed for having caution exercised on the part of those who instituted prosecutions of the kind, declared, at the same time, that he had only to deal with such cases as might happen to be brought before him, and that as infractions of the act had taken place in that instance, the fines should be paid. Finding that he had been fined a second time, and wishing to bring the subject more at large before the public, Sheppard had summonses served this week upon William Spence, the mayor's coachman, for having driven his worship to and from church on Sunday last, and also upon John Jones, the master of the Exchange; David Hughes, the master of the Lyceum; and Edward Griffiths, the master of the Athenæum news-room, for having had those respective rooms open for public amusement and instruction upon Sunday last. This mode of retort upon Sheppard's part, which was rather unexpected, has evidently been compounded with a view of impressing what he calls "the persecution" carried on against himself. It appeared that the prosecution against Sheppard had been instituted by the churchwardens of the parish, and the case being clearly proved, he was fined five shillings. The case against the mayor's coachman was then proceeded with. Mr. Shuttleworth, the deputy town-clerk, who appeared on behalf of the defendant, contended that the latter was not a person within the meaning of the Act of Parliament under which the information had been laid. The act provided, that "no tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer, or other persons," should exercise any business of their ordinary calling on the Lord's-day: but the defendant was neither a tradesman, an artificer, a workman, nor a labourer, and the words "or other person" had been held not to be applicable to coachmen. In the case of "Sanderman v. Beech," in the seventh volume of Barnewall and Cresswell, the court held that a stage coachman did not come within the act. Mr. Rushton said, under the authority of this decision he thought the present information could not be sustained. The other cases were then dismissed for want of sufficient proof, and the parties withdrew MONMOUTHSHIRE.—DESPERATE AFFRAY WITH POACHERS.—Last week the butler of Sir Benjamin Hall, bart., hearing the report of a gun in the preserves, summoned the keepers and assistants, and went in pursuit of the parties. On arriving within a field or two of the place from whence the sound was heard, they met two men on the turnpike-road, whom they accused of having been shooting. On attempting to take them into custody, a fearful conflict took place, the men using the butts of their guns, knocking about them right and left. The head keeper and an assistant were both knocked down and much bruised. One of the men made his escape, and the other, Joseph Bailey, was eventually captured, after resisting until he had been repeatedly knocked down. The prisoner was examined before E. H. Phillips, Esq., and the Rev. Dr. Jones, but being too much injured to be brought to the station-house, the magistrates kindly went to the White Lion, Pontypool, where the prisoner was in bed, and after hearing the evidence, fully committed him to Monmouth Gaol, to take his trial for a misdemeanour. The prisoner gave his name Joseph Bailey, but that he is also known as Joseph Jones. He is a powerful man, and evidently possessing considerable courage.

NORTHAMPTON.—THE DEAN OF PETERBOROUGH.—On Monday last, in the forenoon, a young woman, residing in the parish of Milton, with a view to self-destruction, threw herself into the Northampton arm of the Grand Junction Canal, a little above Miltonbridge. Most providentially (as nobody else was at hand) the dean of Peterborough (Dr. Butler), who was riding from Gayton to Northampton, arrived at the spot just in time to witness her last struggles, and see her sink beneath the surface. He immediately sprang into the water and effected the instantaneous rescue her, though in an insensible state, before life was extinct. After some time, having obtained assistance, he had her conveyed to the Navigation Inn, at no great distance from the spot, where, under the usual treatment, she was restored to animation and is now doing well. We understand that the cause of her rash conduct was distress of mind, aggravated by some sharp words which had passed between her and an acquaintance of her own sex. We are happy to learn that the dean, notwithstanding the severity of the cold and the length of time that he was in the water, has suffered no inconvenience.

SHEFFIELD.—STOPPAGE OF PARKER AND CO.'S BANK.—It is with unfeigned sorrow that we announce the most severe commercial calamity which has ever fallen upon the town of Sheffield, in the stoppage of the old established bank of Parker, Shore, and Co., which was officially notified a few days since. To those who are acquainted with banking affairs in Sheffield this announcement will be a matter of astonishment and deep regret. The senior partner, Mr. Parker, has for upwards of half a century been held in the highest respect and estimation by his townsmen, having discharged the duties of a magistrate during that long period; and, in troubled times, when decision and promptitude were required to suppress disturbances, or prevent disastrous consequences, he has faithfully performed the duties required of him, and in his official capacity has always tempered justice with mercy. His partners, the two most prominent in every public movement for the diffusion of civil and religious liberty; and when the claims of distress, either public or private, have been brought under their notice, their benevolence and kind sympathy have been manifested with a liberal and generous hand. A run on the other banks is anticipated, but we are glad to learn that they are prepared to meet all their liabilities, which will tend to preserve that confidence on which commercial affairs mainly depend. We have heard that circulars have been issued, announcing that arrangements are in progress for immediately re-opening the bank.

SURREY.—WHOLESALE SHEEP-STEALING.—Information has been received at the Croydon police-station of a daring robbery of nine sheep from the fold of Mr. George Langford, an extensive farmer, living at Farleigh, in Surrey. Sunday last was the day when the sheep were folded is at some distance from the homestead, and on the shepherd counting the flock he discovered that nine young ewes were missing. The sheep were traced across an adjoining field into the Addington Lodge Bottom-road, where they turned in the direction of the village of Addington, at least no evidence of further trace of them was lost. There must have been more than one person engaged in this robbery; and from the circumstance of no sheep answering the description of those stolen being seen upon any one of the roads in the vicinity, although active search has been immediately made, it is believed that they must have been carried away in a van, or some other vehicle of the same description, that being the mode now generally adopted by expert sheep-stealers to get away with their booty, which, by this means, is speedily conveyed to the London or other markets, without leaving any trace of its route. A reward of £30 has been offered for the apprehension of the offenders.

DEVONSHIRE.—DOING PENANCE.—The church of Heanton Punchardon on Sunday last was the scene of an unusual spectacle, a young woman (a farmer's daughter) having to do penance in pursuance of the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, in the cause of Martin v. Priscott; Miss Elizabeth Martin (daughter of the tenant of Heanton Court) being the plaintiff, and Miss Agnes Priscott the defendant. The grounds of action were certain defamatory expressions which the defendant had made use of to the plaintiff's prejudice. We are informed that the ceremony produced great excitement, a large concourse of the parishioners having crowded into the vestry to witness it; and the utmost exertions of the rector were insufficient to maintain the order becoming the sacred edifice.

WILTSHIRE.—FIRE CAUSED BY LIGHTNING.—The whole of the southern part of Wiltshire was visited on Monday night and early on Tuesday morning with a very severe storm of thunder and lightning, and a fire, caused by the lightning, broke out in a newly-erected barn and skilling, in the occupation of Mr. Thomas Parham, of Knook, which were completely destroyed. There were four sheep in the skilling, and the poor animals were scorched to death. The barn, which was of extensive dimensions, and had only been finished last autumn, was consumed by the flames. The stock was insured in the Globe-office. The building (the property of Lord Heytesbury) was uninsured.

IRELAND.

EXAMPLE TO LANDLORDS.—The Marquis of Lansdowne has placed at the disposal of his Irish agent the sum of £1000, to be laid out in draining, under the guidance of an eminent agriculturist, whose services are to be employed in advancing the improvements of the farms, and the tenants are to have the benefit of earning this money among themselves.

In the matter of "Spread, a lunatic," the Lord Chancellor, in giving judgment a few days ago, said, "I could hardly have believed that such an outrage on humanity as is disclosed by the affidavits in this case could have been perpetrated at the present day. A gentleman of a highly respectable family, who is afflicted with insanity, was put under the care of a keeper appointed by persons of whom one of his brothers was appointed committee, and he placed the lunatic in a house in Cork. This unfortunate lunatic was found by two gentlemen who are magistrates in the county, and they immediately exerted themselves on his behalf. The lunatic was found by those gentlemen in an outhouse belonging to the man with whom he had been placed, and from the state of the roof there was access for the weather and the rain; and, though it was in the latter part of the year, he was stark naked, his legs chained and clenched together, and fastened to a chain not more than two feet in length, without even straw, and not able, on account of his chains, to lie down in such a way as to rest himself, and without power to move beyond the limit of the narrow circle which the chain would describe. Such were the circumstances in which, through the intervention, to say the least of it, of his brother, the lunatic lived. This is a case upon which, naturally, I have felt great pain on account of the family; but I felt bound to have it fully investigated and exposed, because I am afraid the evil exists to a considerable extent." His lordship then announced that it was his intention to carry into execution a series of arrangements which he thought would tend to secure to this unhappy class of persons much more care and attention than, in too many instances, they have heretofore experienced. He made no final order in the case before the court.

The sudden demise of Colonel Cuninghame, member for the county of Cavan, was reported in the Mail of Monday evening last, and a letter received from a correspondent, at Coothill, confirms the statement. The death of this lamented gentleman took place on Wednesday evening week, at half-past seven o'clock, caused by apoplexy.

On the morning of Wednesday week last the town of Monutrath was thrown into a state of the greatest excitement, in consequence of a report that two men had shot each other near the church. It was ascertained that one of the men was dead; and in the course of the day a coroner's inquest was held, when it appeared from the examination of witnesses that the deceased, named William Scully, went to bed in company with a lemon dealer, named Healy. They appeared on the best terms, and had been intimate for two years previously. Shortly after their going up stairs a man in the kitchen heard two heavy blows, and on going up with Delany (the owner of the house) they found the lemon dealer bleeding profusely. The deceased then came down stairs with a case of pistols, and shot himself in the kitchen. The jury returned a verdict of suicide and temporary insanity. The lemon dealer lies in a dangerous state, his skull being fractured.

At Belfast Quarter Sessions, last week, the assistant barrister, Mr. Freeman, disposed of 700 civil bill cases; amongst others, certain cases, at the suit of the Attorney-General, all of which he dismissed, as on a former occasion, on the ground of want of due notice to the parties defendant.

The Unitarian party among the Presbyterians have submitted to a decree against them in the case of Anderson v. Watson—a case on which many others are depending. The proposal to submit was made in the Court of Exchequer, but was made to a decree without costs, and on this point a warm discussion arose. Mr. Brooke, Queen's County, addressing the Court for the Trinitarians, said, it is hard, after paying £2,000 to gain your lordship's judgment—after spending five years in carrying on the case—to accept of an offer made at the last hour, and not to have that judgment which we really look for, not for the gratification of any particular feeling, in this case—for I pledge myself, if this were the only case on the subject, we never should have asked your lordships to say a word about it—but it is one of many cases. An arrangement was at last entered into which appeared satisfactory. The Unitarian party are likely to suffer severely in a pecuniary way by this decree.

AWFUL LOSS OF LIFE—EIGHTY MEN DROWNED.—The Evening Mail of Monday states, on the authority of a private corn speculant, that eighty poor fishermen lost their lives in the snow storm of Friday, off the Morne coast, in the County Down. The following is an extract from the letter referred to:—"DUNDRUM, Jan. 10th, 1843, Three o'Clock, P.M.—Friday morning was so very fine, that almost all the boats from Newcastle to Amlong went out to their fishing in the bay, where they had quite an uncommon take of fish. About noon it came on to blow, with snow. Up to four hour there are, I believe, seven boats from Newcastle and four from Amlong missing. They were skiffs, manned with about six hands each. Some of them were seen to go down by the crews of the boats which got in. One made for Killough, and sold five or six-and-twenty guillings' worth of fish there; in fact, I believe they were all heavily loaded. One boat drifted in, with two dead men in it. I think they reckon on a loss of 48 souls at Newcastle, and about 30 at Amlong,—or about 80 altogether; but I do not pretend to give you an official or accurate account of the numbers, only what appears to be the best, and least exaggerated. You can easily picture the state of the unfortunate widows and children along the coast. It is the most afflicting event that has ever occurred in this quarter."

The Waterford Independent states that the barque Santon, of Liverpool, Captain Haxtell, master, from Batavia to Liverpool, with rice, sugar, and saltpetre, was driven on shore at Ballytengue in a gale of wind on Saturday morning last, and became a complete wreck. After the vessel struck, the captain and three of the crew went into the cabin, and while there she heeled and went down. The other hands succeeded in reaching the shore.

ILLICIT DISTILLATION.—The imposition of the additional duty of a shilling on Irish spirits has had just the effect anticipated, viz., a vast increase in the manufacture of illicit whisky. In Mayo, and part of Galway, immense quantities of grain is converted into potteen, and in several instances very serious affrays have occurred between the smugglers and the revenue police. The most recent took place on Saturday last, on an island in the Shannon, near Lanesborough, where the police, in the act of seizing a still, were attacked by the people. One of the latter was shot dead, and several others wounded. The police expended all their ammunition (20 rounds), and I regret to say the commander of the party was very dangerously wounded, and is now lying in a very precarious state in the infirmary of the county Longford. Several of the police are very badly wounded.

THE NATIONAL BANK ROBBERY.—The long-protracted trial of Mr. Egan, for the robbery of the bank parcel, was brought to a conclusion on Tuesday afternoon. At 11 o'clock Judge Jackson commenced his charge to the jury, and did not terminate till 2 o'clock. The jury then retired, and after 20 minutes' deliberation, brought in a verdict of Not Guilty. The announcement was received with great cheering.

MELANCHOLY INCIDENT. On the 21st of October, when the Clutha, from Greenock for Bombay, was in latitude 2 deg. 50 min south, longitude 65 deg. east, one of the boys fell from the bowsprit into the sea. Captain Naismith, the commander, who witnessed the accident, instantly leaped overboard, taking with him a rope made fast to the ship. He caught the boy, but unfortunately at the same time, let go the rope. The vessel, which had consi erable way on her at the time, soon drifted past. A boat was launched, however, and on reaching the spot the boy was found floating, apparently lifeless, but the captain had disappeared. The boy was taken on board, and after considerable exertions was restored to consciousness. The first words he uttered were exclamations of grief for the fate of his master, who had saved his life at the expense of his own. Captain Naismith, who was a native of Port Glasgow, was a most promising young seaman

EARTHQUAKE.—Extract of a letter dated Calcutta, Nov. 14 "We had an earthquake here on the 11th inst. It did not last more than one minute, which was quite long enough. I was reading up stairs, when I heard the shutters rattle, and the house rock and reel. I left my chair and ran down stairs. I do not think it lasted longer, it would have done great damage. For 15 minutes afterwards I felt the same sensation as after you have been electrified with the machine."

BEAUMONT SMITH.—Extract of a letter from Van Diemen's Land, dated July 14, 1842:—"Yesterday saw Beaumont Smith. The only remnant of the gentleman about him, in point of dress, was a black silk stock. His dress consisted of coarse grey trousers, jacket, and vest, with a leathern hat, and slop shoes. He seemed in better spirits than could have been expected, though ordered off, in measurably on his arrival at Hobart-town, to assist his fellow convicts in sinking a shaft in a coal mine. Times are altered. There is no respect of persons here."

REBECCA AND HER DAUGHTERS. The state of society in Wales may surprise some of our English readers, especially when we acquaint them with the fact that there has been for some months past, in the neighbourhood of St. Clears, a mob of lawless depredators amounting to about 600, who assemble nightly for the purpose of destroying the turnpike-gates on the various lines of road in the neighbourhood of St. Clears. These ruffians are headed by a very tall man, dressed for disguise as a female who goes by the name of Rebecca, and his many of his associates are likewise dressed as females, the whole going have been christened Rebecca and her daughters.

THE PRESS IN PRUSSIA. A letter from Cologne states that the introduction of the Leipzig Gazette in Prussia has been taken out but that, in order to obtain the boon, it was found necessary to make the editor, who has given evidence of the power of M. Hergenhahn's letter.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Mr. Fall," Chesterfield, who expresses himself in such eulogistic terms of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, is thanked for his attention.

"Mr. Bewsey," Liverpool. This gentleman, whose exertions on behalf of Miss Tuffs are really very creditable to his nature, has our best wishes for his success, as being employed in a truly laudable and benevolent undertaking; but we must decline complying with his request, for reasons which it is unnecessary to state particularly.

"Hornsey Road."—A Constant Subscriber is entitled to receive the print from his newsman, who has had it from the office.

"F. R. S."—We are thanks; but we have the book already in our possession. We are unable to answer his query with certainty.

"J. B."—Kilcullen.—His suggestion shall be attended to.

"F. C. N."—It is impossible.

"George Pewter" under consideration.

"H. D. C." is difficult to please, and therefore a compliment from so grave a critic is doubly sizable.

"Philanthropos," Glasgow.—We should be happy to comply with our correspondent's request, did we think that we should thereby serve the benevolent cause of want and disseminate information which he espouses; but the thing has been done so often, that we consider it unnecessary.

"S. B." should wait till the sky falls, when he will be spared the trouble of repairing to Leadenhall-market.

"Mr. Manfill," Lewes, has our thanks.

"Critic," Edinburgh.—We are happy to deserve the good opinion of our subscribers in the northern Athens.

"Mr. G. Hardman," Bury.—We really do not know.

Our Brook-green correspondent is very obliging. The object of his solicitude has not been lost sight of.

"J. V. T."s" equation is too long and not suitable. "It's a way they have in the army."

"C. P." Leamington.—Please send the drawings.

"G. H."—In case of special licence, the period of residence is immaterial.

"H. P." Perfectly.

"J. W." Newcastle-on-Tyne. A half year's subscription.

Our Sheffield Correspondent has our thanks. The drawing shall appear.

"H. B."—Yes.

"A Subscriber," Gloucester-place, from the tone of the epistle, must be a very charming person.

"Cuntab" is under consideration.

We cannot answer "M."s" query.

"A Subscriber," Hertford.—The intention is not abandoned. The same answer will apply to "W. H," Clapton.

"G. D. L."s" suggestions shall have early attention; as shall also the letter of "Incognita."

"Rookie," Chatham.—The appointment would be valid, but he cannot be a witness to the will.

"T. J. H."—Through the agent who supplies the paper.

"Mr. Whittaker," who writes from Ballina, can hardly be a native of a country so proverbial for generosity as Ireland. He sends us a shilling for two prints and two copies of the paper.

"A. A," Clapton.—The charge was correct.

Persons wishing to have their prints coloured should apply to Mr. Moore, print publisher, St. Martin's-lane.

"A Subscriber," Woolwich. We know nothing of the society referred to.

"V. E." has our thanks. Procure an "Illustrated" cover, and any bookbinder can do it.

In answer to a host of correspondents, we beg to state once for all, that the prints were in every instance supplied to the newsmen with the papers, and if any of them have been withheld from the subscribers, we regret that, having fulfilled our engagements to the letter, we have no control over the circumstance.

"A Constant Subscriber," Brighton. The adversary may claim the pawn if he chooses.

"R. Heywood," of Lancashire, and all others whom it may concern are referred to that the payment of six months' subscription in advance will entitle the subscriber to a copy of the print.

A friendly correspondent corrects an error into which we were led in our last with regard to the Old Tom of Lincoln, which, it appears, was not by twenty hundred weight as heavy as the new bell, which weighs five tons eight hundred weight.

 Many persons having expressed great disappointment during the week at not being able to obtain the bound volume of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, we beg to state that the entire supply was so eagerly bought up on Saturday last, that not a single copy remained after that day. Arrangements, however, are in progress for reprinting the whole of the back numbers; and we hope in the course of a fortnight at furthest to be able to meet the demand. In this case no blame whatever attaches to the newsagents, and we therefore trust that our friends, under the circumstance, will wait with patience. The Portfolios and Covers will be also ready.

☞ The beautiful ballad entitled "Absence of a Day," by WADE, which will be found in our present number, will be sung by Mrs. ALFRED SHAW at some early concerts, that lady having kindly undertaken to lend it the aid of her splendid powers.

 The selling price of Part VII. is Three Shillings.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1843.

There are few subjects more worthy the attention of the statesman, or which demand it more speedily than that of emigration. In whatever light we view it, whether as regards its bearing on the welfare of the mother country, of her numerous and valuable colonies, or of the emigrant himself, it is great and important. The evils which have ensued from the neglect of the Government, and the inefficient measures adopted for the superintendence of emigration, are so serious that some measure on the subject is imperatively called for during the next session of Parliament.

What that measure should be in its details it is not for us to point out, but it is evident that means much more stringent than any that have hitherto been employed must be resorted to in order to the selection of classes of emigrants adapted to the wants of the various colonies, as well as to secure proper comfort to the emigrant on his passage, and due care for his wants after his arrival at his destination. Abuses without number have sprung up under the present system, to which the pruning-knife must be unsparingly applied. The conduct of emigration has been left in the hands of jobbing companies or individual speculators, who have revived the worst practices of the cramps of former days, when British subjects were deported to the plantations of America or the West Indies to perish under a burning sun and the attacks of tropical disease. The operations of these selfish and designing men can hardly be said to have been controlled in any manner at all effectual by the appointment of an emigration agent at several of the seaports; further powers must be called into action, and municipal or county boards must be entrusted with this duty under fit regulations. The mischiefs attendant on the absence of proper control have not been less remarkable during the voyage, in which the emigrant is exposed to privations, nay to positive dangers and miseries which seem almost to recal the horrors of the slave-trade and the middle-passage. Crowded and unhealthy ships, which are often mere dens of filth and nastiness, scanty and unwholesome provisions, combined with the inconveniences inevitable on every sea-voyage, make but a bad preparation for the labours and hardships he is to undergo in a new and untried country. It will be necessary most strictly to bind down companies and private merchants as to the number of passengers, the size and quality of the ships (for hitherto the greed and avarice of the speculating have induced them to select worn-out hulks, little better than so many tubs, or sieves, or rotten egg-shells), and the allowance of provisions. Again, Government ought to provide with all care that the emigrants shall be well attended to on their arrival in Canada or Australia. Exhausted by the fatigues of the voyage, they are generally unfit to enter immediately on a course of hard and unremitting labour, while the scantiness of their funds, nay, the utter state of destitution in which too many find themselves, render it impossible for them to subsist on their own resources. What has been the treatment which they have up to this time experienced? They are crowded into miserable and unwholesome "barracks," as they are termed, where the scanty and precarious fare of the pauper is all that is allotted to them, till they are fortunate enough to procure employment. There are two parties on this question, as on so many others. There are some who think that emigration cannot be carried too far, and that you have only to land your men on some desert shore, when they will, by art magic we suppose, forthwith cause the wilderness to blossom like the rose, while the mother country derives from their removal blessings unnumbered, in relief from the pressure of superabundant population, and the diminution of superfluous mouths. There are others who would discourage emigration altogether, denouncing the expectations of the labourer, and his desire to improve his condition, as wild and visionary, and all prospect of benefit, whether to the mother country or the colony, as chimerical. We are of neither sect. We believe that emigration, under due superintendence, may be made a most important instrument of national advancement and prosperity; and we wish to see this superintendence efficaciously applied. There ought to be constant communication between the home and the colonial authorities as to the state of the colony, the field for employment, and the demand for labour. The intelligence supplied ought instantly to be disseminated through the districts to which intending emigrants belong, and steps taken to contract or extend the supply of labour according to circumstances. We observe that the last Sydney papers are full of accounts tending to show that the market for labour is overstocked, and that emigrants have in consequence been reduced to the extremity of distress, only exchanging one set of evils for another, yet hardly more than a year has elapsed since the same journals were filled with cries for labourers, and bitter reproaches of the home Government for neglecting to supply them. We remember well being present during a discussion in the House of Commons in 1841, when Lord Mahon described the difficulty of obtaining labourers in Australia in the most pathetic terms, and asserted that the colonists were absolutely reduced to distress from their inability to supply their wants. This incontestably proves the necessity of creating some such machinery as we have endeavoured to point out, or of adding greater means of usefulness to whatever may exist.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

We had last week the gratification of acknowledging our obligations to several of the leading London Journals for the very handsome and flattering manner in which they had thought proper to notice the exertions of the Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and we have this week a similar duty to discharge towards our brethren of the provincial press and sister kingdom, from whom we have received an unanimous verdict of approval, couched in such terms that it really looks like egotism to quote their opinions. The sin of vanity, however, is much less heinous than that of ungratitude, and in this dilemma we cannot hesitate on which horn to impale ourselves. From all parts of the civilized globe, and from all parties, whatever their political shade or colour, have we received those flattering testimonials to our merits (which can only serve to stimulate us to future exertions); but our space precludes the possibility of quoting more than the few following, which may be taken as fairly indicative of the general tone with which our labours have been hailed. Our country friends will perhaps excuse us for giving the pas to our adopted distinguished evening contemporary the Globe.

From the Globe.

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is unique in its character and design. The proprietors select the most interesting subjects connected with the passing events of the day, and supply a series of beautifully executed wood engravings, accompanied by letter-press descriptions, to illustrate and perpetuate their occurrence. In addition to the enterprise which marks the progress of this weekly publication, its proprietors have shown their sense of the patronage their undertaking has obtained from the public, by presenting their regular subscribers with a colossal engraving from a steel plate, the superior execution of which must have cost a very considerable sum; the value of each impression, on a moderate estimate, must go far to equal the sum of the entire cost of the journal from the publication of its first number. We draw attention to the journal as meriting unqualified approval; and invite an inspection of the engraving, which is exhibited in the window of the office, in justification of the terms of praise to which we have felt impelled to speak of it.

From the Hereford Journal.

The enterprise of the British press in procuring information is admitted on all hands, but it was reserved for the LONDON NEWS to go far beyond all its compeers in pictorial embellishment. "London in 1842," a view taken from the summit of the Duke of York's column, is not merely remarkable for its gigantic dimensions, but for the correctness and delicacy of its details. It is worthy of an elegant frame, and a place in the library or sitting room. Besides this engraving, Nos. 35 and 36, with the supplement, are adorned with an almost endless variety of superior pictorial embellishments.

From the Derby Mercury.

In an age like the present, remarkable for the abundant resources to which the intellectual and inquiring mind may have recourse for increasing knowledge and information, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS must be acknowledged to be without a rival. Valuable as an historical record of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria's visit to Scotland, and as a faithful delineation of the times in which we live, it abounds in less with spirit-stirring anecdote and affecting incident of every-day occurrence. The magic influence of its pictorial embellishments, alone, cannot but create the most pleasing interest in its favour in the general sentiments and opinions of its readers. We particularly recommend the volume for the past year, if appropriately bound, as admirably adapted for a Christmas present to the young of both sexes, certain that they will be delighted with its perusal, while, at the same time, it will form a useful and attractive addition to their libraries, and prove an entertaining companion in a lady's boudoir, or drawing-room.

From the Liverpool Courier.

Decidedly the most spirited literary effort of the day is the getting-up of the above periodical, the plan of which is as novel as the execution is beautiful. The design, indeed, is one which could scarcely fail to be successful, combining, as it does, information on the passing topics of the day with pictorial representations, and thereby appealing to two of the strongest of the popular appetites, curiosity and the love of amusement. The only marvel is, how it can answer the purposes of the publishers, seeing the enormous expense they must be at, for a continued weekly succession of new cuts. By a most extended circulation alone can they possibly be remunerated; and we cannot doubt but in this they will not be disappointed. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is honourably distinguished from many of the popular periodicals of the metropolis, and may safely be admitted into any family, being not less unexceptionable in its tone than it is attractive in its aspect.

From the Wilts and Gloucestershire Standard.

We have been favoured with a map of London, presented by the spirited proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers. This artistical production is really of a first-rate character, and gives a convincing evidence of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood engraving.

From the Western Luminary.

VIEW OF LONDON.—We have been much gratified with a sight of a new view of London, recently published by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It was taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures—one a north and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest is well brought out, and the most conspicuous features of the great city are at once discovered. As a work of art this picture deserves to be most favourably spoken of, and the proprietors of the LONDON NEWS are entitled to great credit for their liberality and spirit in bringing it out. But apart from itself we are glad of an opportunity of saying a word in commendation. Its illustrations are executed with great skill, and its epitome of the news of the week is very full and correct.

From the Liverpool Chronicle.

We suppose the paper appellated the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is now known to everybody, and purchased by almost everybody; if not, we would direct the commencement at once, for every body ought to be in possession of so rich a fund of art as it embodies. Unlike the generality of illustrated works, the subjects get better and better, both as regards finish and design. The views of London, given with the final number for 1842, are beautifully and correctly engraved, and are of themselves prodigies of art. We wish the proprietors of this spirited paper all the success they deserve, and feel assured that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will outwing and outlast all the ephemera of the day.

From the Liverpool Albion.

We believe that all our readers have either seen or heard of this paper, which has recently been making such creditable efforts to gain public favour that it has become popular throughout the three kingdoms, and we have even read its praises in the journals of the West Indies and of North America. All who have seen the numerous illustrations published in each number must be aware of their great excellence. The artists employed must be individuals of high ability, for the freedom, grace, and boldness displayed are indications not only of long practice, but of great genius. In addition to the lavish embellishments given in each number, the proprietors have recently presented their subscribers with two superb views of "The Queen and Royal Consorts of England," which ought to be preserved with extreme care, as they are certainly extraordinary specimens of art.

From the Bristol Gazette.

It is really, in this age of puffery and pretension, quite refreshing to be able to speak sincerely in terms of praise of a new publication, and we are able to do so most unqualifiedly of this work. It is unique in its conception, design, and execution; bringing the aid of the pencil to the description of the press and a great variety of beautifully executed wood-engravings illustrative of the different subjects treated of. In fine, we consider the ILLUSTRATED NEWS one of the best and cheapest publications of its kind.

From the Ulster Times.

LITERATURE AND FINE ARTS.—Some months since a weekly newspaper was established in London, called the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, which professedly, or rather, at its commencement promised to present, the rare attraction of combining pictorial illustrations of public events and of the scenes of their occurrence. We confess we were anything but sanguine of its success when looking over the first number, and less so when we obtained the first number, as the literary matter was excellent, well selected, and well arranged, and the illustrations really admirable. We could not even conceive how the proprietor would contrive to remunerate himself for the immense outlay of capital which was evidently required to support, weekly, the talent which the first number displayed. In fact, we concluded that it was merely a gudgeon thrown out to catch the whole, and that each succeeding publication would be inferior to its predecessor, until eventually it would die a natural death. From a feeling of curiosity we continued to purchase the paper, and we were so much pleased as astonished to observe, that, instead of diminishing, it was weekly increasing in beauty and strength. Every subject of popular interest for the time we found illustrated in a manner which did credit to works of a very ambitious class; and not those alone, but foreign scenery, metropolitan churches, public characters, nooks and corners of old England, came from the hands of the artist with surpassing merit, and delicacy of finish. The publisher, however, although his readers were getting treble value for their money, considered that at the close of the year he would treat them to a bonne bouche, surpassing anything they had previously received from his hands, and accordingly, with an enterprise seldom, if ever, equalled by a weekly paper, he engaged M. Claudet with his Daguerreotype apparatus, perched him on the top of the Duke of York's column, and from the view there taken produced the most accurate, and decidedly one of the most admirably-executed pictures of London we have ever seen. In the Times, Herald, and Post, we observe the achievement noticed in terms of the highest eulogy; but in those notices in no more favourable than they are, they would not have exceeded the truth. We feel gratified in having it in our power to recommend this agreeable and benign newspaper to public attention, as well on account of its literature as of the variety and beauty of its illustrations.

From the Somerset County Gazette.

NEW VIEW OF LONDON. We have received a copy of the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a weekly newspaper of considerable ability, embellished with a variety of wood-cuts, accompanied with an engraving on one enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is cleverly executed, every object of interest is neatly defined, and the most remarkable features of Modern Babylon are at once recognised.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, JAN. 14.—This day, being the first day of Hilary Term, a congregation was holden, at which the following degrees were conferred:—Masters of Arts—Henry George Maddleton Pretyman, Oriel, Grand Compounder; Rev. John Ratcliffe Pretyman, Trinity, Grand Compounder; Rev. George Smith, Magdalen Hall; William George Henderson, Demy of Magdalen; Rev. Henry Randall, Fellow of Brasenose. Bachelors of Arts—George Bayley, New Inn Hall, Grand Compounder; John Benne Hilton and George Augustus Oldne, University; Edward Browne Heawood, Christ Church, Joseph Smith, Magdalen Hall; Frederick John Vipan, Wadham; John Crosier Hilliard, St. John's.

CAMBRIDGE.—ELECTION TO PROFESSORSHIP OF DIVINITY. On Tuesday last the electors (viz., the Vice Chancellor, the Provost of King's College, the President of Queen's College, the Masters of St. John's and Christ's Colleges, with the two Senior Fellows of Trinity College) and the Registrary met in the schools, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of receiving the declaration of the candidates for the Regius Professorship of Divinity, vacant by the resignation of the Very Rev. Thomas Turton, D.D., Dean of Westminster. The following reverend divines declared themselves candidates:—1. The Rev. William Hodge Mill, D.D.; 2. The Rev. Alfred Olivant, D.D.; 3. The Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, Jun., D.D., Head Master of Harrow. It was the intention of Dr. Graham, Master of Christ's College, to have offered himself as a candidate, as we have before intimated to our readers, but one of the electors having entered a protest as to that eminent divine's eligibility, on account of holding the mastership of a college, Dr. Graham immediately withdrew. Tuesday, the 31st inst., is fixed for hearing the exercises of the above-named gentlemen, and we believe the election will take place on the same day.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Claremont, Sunday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the royal suite, attended divine service. Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated.—Archdeacon Wilberforce arrived at Claremont on Saturday, and had the honour of joining the royal circle at dinner in the evening. The venerable archdeacon remained at Claremont after divine service, and dined with the royal party.

Monday.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Mr. George Edward Anson, went out shooting in the morning in Claremont Park. In the afternoon, at half-past two o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, and attended by the royal suite, left Claremont, escorted by a party of Hussars, for Windsor Castle.

Windsor, Monday Evening.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Princess Royal, arrived at the castle from Claremont at twenty minutes past four o'clock, escorted by a party of the 2nd Life Guards. The Duchess of Norfolk, General Wemyss, and the Hon. C. A. Murray, followed in a second carriage and four.—Baron Gerstdorff, the Saxon Minister, and Sir H. Wheatley, arrived at the castle, on a visit to her Majesty.—The Duke of Norfolk was expected to arrive at the castle on a visit to her Majesty, but his Grace was prevented by a severe cold. The royal dinner party at the castle in the evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Norfolk, Lady Fanny Howard, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Baron Gerstdorff, Lord Rivers, Mr. O. Gore, Colonel Bouverie, General Wemyss, Sir H. Wheatley, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pratorius.

Windsor, Tuesday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert walked out in the royal pleasure-grounds.—In the afternoon his Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback, attended by Colonel Bouverie.—The Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal have been taken an airing.—Sir H. Wheatley left this morning.—The Duchess of Norfolk and Lord Rivers went to town, but returned to the castle to dinner.

The court, according to the present arrangements, will leave Windsor for Buckingham Palace on Saturday, the 28th instant.

Her Majesty has signified her intention of taking frequent excursions to sea during the coming summer, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, in order to give them the benefit of the sea air. The Victoria and Albert Royal yacht, now building at Pembroke, is expected to be complete, and perfectly equipped for sea and the reception of her Majesty, by the latter end of June. Her internal arrangements will be far superior, and much more commodious, than those of the Royal George. It is understood that she will be placed under the command of Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, and that she will be manned by the officers and crew of the Royal George, many of whom are well known to the Queen having formerly sailed in the Emerald with her Majesty, when she was Princess Victoria. Portsmouth, we believe, will be the station of the new yacht, it being considered the most convenient for her Majesty's embarkation on her aquatic excursions. Her Majesty will be enabled to leave Windsor in the morning, take an excursion to sea or round the Isle of Wight, and be back at the castle to dinner in the evening. Either the Chertsey or Farnborough station, on the south-western line of railway, will be the point selected, as being the nearest to Windsor. It is said that the Queen's first trip in the Victoria and Albert will be to Dublin, at which time caused the noble and gallant lord considerable pain and inconvenience. The contusions he received by the accident were on the right shoulder, the same side he lost his arm at Waterloo.

Baron de Talleyrand, appointed to succeed M. Vaudriel as attaché to the French embassy, arrived at Manchester House on Saturday, and on Tuesday made visits to the whole of the corps diplomatique.

His Grace the Duke of Wellington arrived in town at three o'clock on Monday, from Strathfieldsaye, in good health.

The Duke of Buccleuch has arrived in town from Dalkeith Palace, by railroad, for the season. The duchess is at Newbattle Abbey, the seat of the Marchioness of Lothian.

The Late Countess Munster.—The will of the Countess Munster has been proved in Doctors' Commons by Lord De Lisle, General Wyndham, and Mr. Cameron, the executors. Her ladyship gives to her three younger sons £50,000, the remainder of her property to her eldest son, the present earl; her daughters, the two Ladies Fitzclarence, having been separately provided for by their maternal grandfather, the late Earl of Egremont.

Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Wharncliffe will give his annual banquet to the ministers and great officers of state on Saturday, the 28th instant, at Wharncliffe-house, on the occasion of selecting the sheriffs for the present year.

Count Schonnenegre, the Hanoverian minister, had the honour of entertaining the Duke of Cambridge at dinner on Monday, in Grosvenor-place.

Baron de Nieumann, the Austrian minister; the Duke of Beaufort, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, and a select party, were invited to meet his Royal Highness.

Windsor, Wednesday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Home Park and Slopes. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal were taken an airing. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, and attended by the Earl of Morton, Colonel Bouverie, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Hon. C. A. Murray, shot in the forest and preserves. The Baron Gerstdorff, the Saxon minister, took his departure from the castle this morning. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, joined the royal dinner circle at the castle in the evening.

Sir Robert Peel gave the first Cabinet dinner this season on Wednesday evening at his residence in Whitehall-gardens. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Wharncliffe, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, Earl of Haddington, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull, were present. Major Selwyn, R.E., had the honour of dining with Lord Stanley at the Colonial-office. Capt. Seagram, R.N., had also an interview with his lordship. Cards for a full-dress parliamentary dinner party have been issued by Sir Robert Peel for his private residence in Whitehall-gardens, on the 1st of February, the day preceding the meeting of Parliament. Despatches from the Governor of Malta were received on Wednesday at the Colonial-office. The Duke of Wellington will entertain the members of the Cabinet on Wednesday next, at Apsley House. Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston are entertaining a large party at Broadlands, the noble viscount's seat near Romsey. His lordship has re-engaged the Earl of Chichester's mansion on Carlton-house-terrace, and it is at present undergoing internal repairs for the approaching season. Lord Claud Hamilton, M.P., who has been sojourning for some time past with Sir Robert Gordon at Vienna, is expected at Argyll House, the Earl of Aberdeen's, in the course of the next week.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Meeting of Parliament.—The following official summons has been issued by Lord John Russell, as leader of the Opposition:—"January, 1843.—Lord John Russell presents his compliments to ——, and takes the liberty of informing him that questions of importance, affecting the state of the country, will be brought forward at the commencement of the session, which opens on Thursday, February 2."

On Tuesday last a meeting of the Court of Aldermen was held for the despatch of business, when Sir Peter Laurie brought forward the subject of wood paving, the substitution of which for stone he considered fraught with the greatest mischief and danger. The worthy alderman then proceeded to point out the objectionable features of the plan, and was warmly seconded in his views by Alderman Gibbs and Copeland. It was finally agreed that a substantive motion on the subject should be brought forward on a future occasion.

We have been requested to correct some inaccuracies which appeared in our description of the Great Northern steamer in our last number. The depth of the hold was stated at 50 feet, but it is in reality only 26½, and the rate of speed, which was stated to be 13½ knots, should be only 8½.

A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The following Ministers were present:—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Haddington, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull. The Ministers assembled at half-past three o'clock. The Council broke up at five o'clock.

A deputation from the Commissioners of Assessed Taxes, Tower division, consisting of Sir William Clay, Bart.; Colonel Wood, M.P.; Messrs. Offer, Black, and Gingell, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Tuesday, at his official residence in Downing-street.

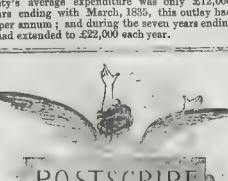
Impending Hurricane.—Alarming Increase of Land Sharks.—One hundred and forty-five gentlemen have given the regular notices of their intending to apply during the present (Hilary) term to be admitted to practice as attorneys of the Court of Queen's Bench. And there are also twenty-eight notices of applications for re-admission.

Desperate Attempt at Suicide.—On Wednesday morning a man, named James Beeby, aged 25, living at No. 32, Wynyatt-street, Goswell-street-road, attempted to destroy himself with a carving-knife, with which he cut the radial artery of each wrist. Finding that the blood flowed but slowly, he placed the point of the knife beneath the sixth rib of his left side, and thrust the blade to the haft into his body in an upward direction. The material substance of the heart escaped, but the weapon divided one of its arteries, and penetrated the left lobe of the lung. Mr. Tarnton, surgeon, of Goswell-street, who had dressed the man's wounds, has little or no hope of his recovery, as the strong probability is that internal bleeding must destroy life. Not long after the commission of the desperate act Beeby became sensible, and expressed the strongest sorrow and contrition for his sinful folly.

The awful loss of life which has lately taken place on the French coast seems to be attributable in a great measure to the want of ordinary precautions against such calamities as those that have recently happened. It does not appear that arrangements for affording assistance from the shore have been effected on the French coast since the loss of the Reliance. Unless the subject is followed up it is probable that no alteration in the lights exhibited will follow the recent dreadful wreck of the Conqueror. It would seem that humanity is not sufficient inducement for enforcing domestic regulations in matters of this kind; but as the interests of ship-owners and underwriters have been affected, it is to be hoped they will proceed to devise some means for preventing future sacrifices of life, which are accompanied by a loss of property.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

On Monday last a Special Meeting of the Proprietors of the London and Birmingham Railway was held at Euston-square, for the purpose of authorising the directors to apply to Parliament in the ensuing session to make a branch line from the Blisworth station, in the county of Northampton, to the city of Peterborough. A series of resolutions was passed, empowering the directors to raise the required sum, which was intended to form an integral portion of the capital of the main line in a certain amount of shares, to be divided rateably and at par amongst the proprietors.——A Quarterly Court of the Royal Naval Benevolent Society was held on Monday, for the purpose of granting relief to deserving objects, when upwards of eighty applications received assistance.——Lord Huntingtower passed his final examination before the Commissioner of Bankruptcy (Fonblanque) on Monday last. His lordship's examination disclosed an excess of gullibility hardly to be credited in any one outside the walls of a lunatic asylum.——Ilford Church was discovered to be on fire on Sunday morning last, in consequence of the mismanagement of a stove, but owing to the exertions of the police, and some farm labourers, the flames were extinguished before any damage was incurred.——A numerous and respectable meeting of the rate-payers of Hammersmith was held on Monday, for the purpose of taking into consideration the vexatious and oppressive nature and character of the income-tax, and of the machinery alike unequal, unfair, and inquisitorial, by which the odious impost is inflicted upon a too generous and too confiding public; and also the expediency of adopting petitions to the House of Legislature for its immediate repeal. The chair was taken by Mr. Churchwarden Fowell, and a series of spirited resolutions were unanimously adopted.——The half-yearly meeting of the London Coffee and Eating-House Keepers' Association was held at Anderton's Hotel, in Fleet-street, on Monday last, when it appeared that nearly a thousand pounds had been invested in the funds on behalf of the institution.——A man named William Feltham, was killed in Portland-place during the hurricane on Friday week, by the falling of a chimney-pot.——On Monday a mad bull broke away from Smithfield-market, and injured several persons in the course of his furious career; he was at last hemmed in by the police in Wilmington-square where he was ultimately destroyed.——Messrs. Seed and Co., of Addington, cotton-spinners, were convicted last week before Messrs. Ferrand, M·P., Ellis, and Greenwood, of having shamefully overworked several of the girls employed in their factory, and were fined in full penalties in each case, amounting altogether to £125.——During the storm on Friday morning the new mill, belonging to Mr. Ashby, on Warlingham-common, was struck by lightning, and seriously injured.——Lord Clive was on Monday last unanimously elected M.P. for the Northern division of Shropshire, in the room of the present Lord Hill, elevated to the peerage by the death of the late Commander-in-chief.——A numerously attended meeting of the London Missionary Society was held at Exeter Hall on Tuesday evening last, for the purpose of adopting means for promoting the objects of the society in China, when a series of resolutions were adopted, and a collection made in aid of the missionary labours.——The first meeting for the season of the Horticultural Society was held on Tuesday at the society's rooms, in Regent-street, when an elegant show of flowers was exhibited. The prizes awarded were—the Silver Knightian medal to Mr. Goode, gardener to Mrs. Lawrence, for a specimen of Dendrobium nobile, and Messrs. Lucombe and Price, of Exeter, for an orchidaceous plant; silver Banksian medals to Mr. Green, gardener to Sir Edmund Antrobus, for Euphorbia jacquiniflora, and Messrs. Loddiges, of Hackney, for an Epidendrum, and Mr. Moore, for pears.——William Cantwell, a soldier in custody on a charge of attempting to murder Elizabeth Magnus, the barmaid at the Auction Mart Tavern, was again brought before the Lord Mayor on Tuesday last, but, the unfortunate woman not being yet sufficiently recovered to give evidence, the prisoner was remanded for another fortnight.——Another claimant to the freedom property of the late James Wood, of Gloucester, has arisen in the person of John Wood, of Brierly-hill, Staffordshire, and the case is to come before the public at the next assizes, in the shape of an ejectment process.——The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of the St. Katharine Docks was held at the dock-house on Tuesday last, when a dividend of two and a half per cent. for the half year ending 31st December was declared.——The annual general meeting of the Society of the Civil Engineers was held on Tuesday evening last, when a satisfactory account of the progress of the institution for the past year was placed before the members.——At the quarterly court of the Royal Hospitals of Bethlehem and Bridewell held on Monday, after an animated discussion, it was resolved, by a majority of 20 to 16, that reporters for the press should be admitted at the future quarterly court. In the present state of the public mind upon the subject of the treatment of lunatics, this is a most important concession to public opinion, and likely to be attended with very advantageous results, in affording opportunities for the promulgation of the great improvements now making in the management of that hospital.——The officers and company lately paid off from the Acorn, 16, sloop, will be paid on and after the 26th inst. the prize money arising from the capture, in October, 1840, of the Portuguese slave-vessel Rahanana. The following are the proportions:—Commander, £104 13s. 10½d.; first class, £39 10s. 5½d., second class, £21 17s. 10½d.; third class £11 18s. 11½d.; fourth class, £7 19s. 3½d.; fifth class, £3 19s. 7½d.; sixth class, £2 13s. 1d.; seventh class, £1 6s. 6½.——On Tuesday last a young woman named Sarah Compton committed suicide by swallowing oxalic acid. No cause was assigned for the fatal deed.——A meeting of the Incorporated Society for Building and Enlarging Churches and Chapels, was held at the Society's Chambers on Monday last, the Lord Bishop of Rochester in the chair. It appeared that during the seven years, ending with March, 1838, the society's average expenditure was only £12,000; during the seven years ending with March, 1835, this outlay had increased to £14,000 per annum; and during the seven years ending with March, 1842, it had extended to £22,000 each year.



Friday Evening.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE MR. E. DRUMMOND.

At a quarter to four o'clock, on Friday afternoon, as Mr. Edward Drummond, the private secretary of Sir Robert Peel, was passing from Charing-cross towards the Treasury, he was shot at by a person, who looked like a gentleman's servant. The ball took effect behind the shoulder. The assassin drew a second pistol, but a policeman who was passing seized his arm, the pistol was discharged, and the ball struck the pavement.

Upon our reporter proceeding to Gardner's-lane police-station, to which the assassin was removed, he was informed by the constable on duty that no information would be afforded until such time as the case had undergone a preliminary investigation before Mr. Mayne, or some other of the Police Commissioners. The prisoner was described as a person whose garments were what is termed "shabby genteel," and had no trace of insanity in his manner or bearing. The greatest excitement prevails in the whole neighbourhood, and throughout the lower part of the Strand and Whitehall, and various and wild surmises are afloat as to the motive that could induce the attempt, some attributing it to private revenge, and others to politics, Mr. Drummond being secretary to the Premier.

The police authorities declined to give the prisoner's name, or afford the slightest information relative to the matter, previous to the investigation before Mr. Mayne.

Subsequently the man was examined at the police-office. He gives the name of Daniel M'Naughton, but will not state any reason for the act. The bullet has not yet been extracted, and fears are entertained that the wound is of a dangerous character. He is about twenty-three years of age, and of a gentlemanly appearance. Various rumours are afloat, such as being taken for Sir R. Peel, or the act being committed by a discharged clerk; but none can be traced to any authentic source.

Windsor, Thursday.—The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their accustomed early walk in the Home Park. Her Majesty honoured Sir George Hayter, M.A.S.L., by sitting to him for a whole-length portrait in the robes of the order of the Garter. His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out hunting with the harriers, accompanied by the Duke of Buccleuch, and attended by Colonel Bouverie, General Wemyss, Mr. G. C. Anson, and the Hon. C. A. Murray; they met at Bishopsgate, and had excellent sport. The Duchess of Norfolk left the castle for London, in consequence of the continued illness of the Duke of Norfolk. Mr. F. G. Moon had the honour to lay before her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, for their inspection, the magnificent present of a large brilliant, splendidly set in gold, and also a gold pencil-case of considerable value, which his Majesty Louis Philippe has conferred on Mr. Moon the high honour of presenting him, as a mark of admiration of his work of the "Holy Land," by David Roberts, R.A. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, Lady Isabella Wemyss, Miss Gurney, and Colonel Reid, joined the royal circle at the castle at dinner.

Sir George Clerk and Sir Thomas Fremantle transacted business with Sir R. Peel on Friday morning, at the right hon. baronet's residence at Whitehall-gardens.

Lord Granville Somerset had a long interview with Sir James Graham on Friday morning at the Home Office.

The grand jury for the county of Middlesex were sworn on Friday morning before Mr. Justice Patteson in the Court of Queen's Bench. His lordship shortly addressed them on the nature of the public duty they were called upon to perform. He was not aware that any case of difficulty would be presented for their consideration.

Owing to the dense fog which prevailed on Thursday, there were very few arrivals and departures of the foreign and other steamers, and, with two or three exceptions, the Woolwich and Greenwich steamvessels were laid up.

On Thursday night the annual ball in aid of the funds of the Licensed Victuallers' School, took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The ball was opened by Mr. Walter, the Governor of the Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers, and Miss Walter; Mr. Kemble Price, jun., son of the governor-elect, and Miss Kemble. Numerous agreeable card parties, formed chiefly by the senior part of the assembly, were distributed over the rooms, and there was nothing wanting to complete the satisfaction of old and young. At twelve o'clock, tickets closely approximating eight hundred had been received; the greater portion of the company then being composed of ladies, the scene was animated and brilliant in the extreme. The exciting pleasure of the dance was kept up till an early hour on Friday morning.

Further details of the dreadful effects of the late hurricane are still coming in to Lloyd's, and it is remarked that in proportion to the amount of property destroyed the loss of life has been much greater than usual. Extract of a letter received at Lloyd's on Friday morning, dated Boscastle, Jan. 18:—"I have now to inform you that many of the skins and bales of cotton, and fragments of the Jessie Logan, have been secured, and the whole of which is now warehoused. The ship struck against a perpendicular rock, 400 feet high, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and of course in a few minutes went to pieces." Another letter states that about ten wreckers, engaged in plundering the Jessie Logan at Boscastle, attacked the revenue officers and coast guard, but were beaten off, and nine of them secured.

FOREIGN.

The Paris papers of Wednesday are chiefly occupied with discussions on the sugar question. It was still believed that the right of search would be maintained intact. The statement of the Presse, that ministers had resolved to permit it to be an "open question," turns out to be wholly untrue. The Paris journals are wholly destitute of news, foreign or domestic.

Letters and journals from Madrid of the 10th inst. have reached us. Frequent cabinet councils had been held, but neither the measures discussed, nor the results of the debates, had transpired.

Letters from Barcelona of the 13th mention the extension of the period for the payment of the revolt contribution to the 16th.

The correspondence of Sir Robert Peel with the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, relative to the distress of the country, and the remedial measures propounded to alleviate that distress, has excited considerable interest in the monetary circles.

We learn from Amsterdam, that the King of the Netherlands is indisposed with the small-pox; but no serious apprehensions are entertained.

THE COUNT OF PARIS.

Louis Philippe Albert d'Orleans, Comte de Paris, is before you. How beautifully has the painter given to the world the features of the child whose lamented father had already been the subject of Winterhalter's speaking pencil! The Count of Paris, with his silken tresses, and truly Bourbon expression, is now one of the most interesting of children. The heir to the throne of France,—what will he his destiny? Is he to traverse with safety the stormy days of an uncle's regency—that uncle being, after his death, the probable representative of the Orleans branch for the Duke of Chartres is so sickly that no hopes are entertained of his life being prolonged for many years? To predict the future, we must glance at the past. The July dynasty, on the birth of the Count of Paris, seemed to have had a security for three generations at least. The monarchy of the three days was coldly regarded by its brothers in royalty, and the late Duke of Orleans made the circuit of the European courts before a partner could be found to share the perils of a revolutionary crown. At length, in an obscure German Court, the Protestant Princess—the Princess Helena of Mecklenburg Schwerin was found to accept the offered hand of the de facto heir to the French throne. On the 20th of May, 1837, Fontainebleau witnessed the royal nuptials, and the capital received with tumultuous joy the royal couple. On the 24th of August, 1838, was born the Count of Paris. Was the omission of a princely title, and the revival of one of metropolitan fame merely, a good or a bad sign? The Parisians, however, felt flattered by the compliment bestowed on them, and a costly sword was voted by the municipality to the royal infant. Was this, again, a sarcastic allusion of the citizens to the pacific policy of their rulers? Was it intended to convey the opinion that France was to be ruled by the sword—the France who had sprung out of the barricades, and who had rejected the elder branch of the Bourbons, to have the "Best of Republics," and a "Citizen King?" We answer not these questions, for they appertain to parties, and we are of no party. With order at home and peace abroad, we dive no further into the career of France; but this fatherless child—this as yet unspotted prince, is he not entitled to the warmest sympathies of every well-thinking mind, whatever may be the political colour? We saw him for the first time, with Regal splendour surrounding him, when he was christened Count of Paris. It was a doubly interesting ceremonial. A new Archbishop of the capital had been nominated, who was not tied to the fallen family like M. de Quelen—who had never taken the oath of allegiance to the elder family. It appeared therefore as if there was a bond of reconciliation with the Church, with the christening of the eldest son of the late Prince Royal; and it seemed also as if religion were about to resume its proper sway over the minds of a propagandist population. And after the grand day at Notre Dame, when the Count of Paris was received, and as it were acknowledged by the Church, the infant, who had been suffering, acquired daily more strength; and a father's hope and a mother's joy became more and more endeared, as a knowledge was gained of his pretty prattle and infantine impulses. With infinite ease and grace does the little fellow receive the felicitations so prodigally tendered. Already has the Count of Paris spoken of his sword to defend France, and he goes through the first military rudiments with the most perfect gravity and self-possession. Up to the 13th of July catastrophe, all was apparently sunshine for him. But, in one moment, a fatal accident deprived him of his parental guide, and left him to the mercy of interested relatives and of a fickle population. God help the poor child! Why can he not remain always as he now appears before you, young, innocent, and beautiful? Must he be hereafter thrown headlong into the vortex of political passions, and of wars of succession? And now is he the only pride and consolation of a widowed mother, whose tears fall daily over one child next to the grave, and over another whose, being an Orleans, is of itself sufficient to cause the most sinister anticipations as to his future fate. Already does that mother feel the gulf that is before her. She is isolated at the Pavilion Marsan, in the midst of the royal tumults of the Tuileries. By one fell blow she lost the husband of her heart, a future crown, and security for the career of her children. She has been even asked to abandon the suite of rooms rendered dear to her by her former happiness shared with the Duke of Orleans. She has firmly and nobly refused; but why was the pang inflicted on the best of wives, the tenderest of mothers, and one of the cleverest of women in France? It was explained to the Count of Paris, during the debates on the Regency Bill, that it was requisite for the Regent of France to be able to wield a sword, and therefore the Duke of Nemours was to be his protector. "But," replied the royal boy, "I have a sword, and mamma can wave a flag, and France would fight for us both."

CITY MAGISTRATES.—No I.

SIR PETER LAURIE, Knt.

The name of Sir Peter Laurie must be as familiar as "a household word" in the ears of those who are daily readers of the public journals in general, and of the police reports of the Guildhall and Mansion House in particular. It is the misfortune of some of the metropolitan magistrates to become more notorious than celebrated, their names being connected with decisions which render them much better known than respected. This is not the case with Sir P. Laurie. Well known he is, but with all that he has done there has generally been combined so much shrewdness and clear common sense, so much independence of thought, ability to see the spirit of the law apart from its letter, and determination to pursue the first even against the strict interpretation of the latter, that he has not only effected an immense amount of public good, but, at the same time, made for himself a creditable reputation. Bubble companies, swindling associations, the imposturés of all kinds with which this great city abounds, have in Sir Peter Laurie a most determined and active enemy. His zeal may sometimes take an eccentric direction, and he may exhibit a little intolerance to such things as the fashion of long hair, in which the young gents "about town" delight to indulge, and his individual antipathies to this and other peculiarities may be made rather prominent, but these manifestations do not detract from the value of his services to the public in other things of more consequence. On the whole he has the fullest right to the first place in our series of the "City Magistrates."

Sir Peter is a native of Stichell, in Roxburgshire, where his family have for a long period been connected with agricultural pursuits. His commercial career we need scarcely trace; enough to say, that he came to London in humble circumstances, and by his business talents and perseverance has amassed a handsome fortune, principally as a contractor for military stores for the Government. He has filled all the usual offices of civic dignity. He was Sheriff of London and Middlesex in 1825, Alderman in 1826, and Lord Mayor in 1832-33. He has retired from business, but is any thing but an idle man. He fills a considerable number of honorary offices connected with public institutions; but he has directed the greater portion of his activity to the discharge of his magisterial duties, and numerous indeed are the cases in which he has been the means of detecting or exposing the frauds and chicaneries of those who live by preying on the ignorant or unwary. The case of Coster was one of these, but the transaction belongs to the past; others of less magnitude, such as that of Joseph Ady, the letter-writer, will also be remembered. But we must confine ourselves to the cases which have occurred within the last two years, some of which have been sufficiently remarkable. The spirit of imposition is ever active and fertile in its expedients, with a Proteus-like power of evading detection.

In December 1840 Sir Peter Laurie was called by a body of merchants to hear a very important case at the Mansion House, where two well-connected men, brothers, named Wallace, were charged with fraud, in insuring a ship (the Dryad) for £6000, which they had planned to sink. The plan was carried out, and part of the insurance had been received when the investigation was opened. The inquiry occupied a fortnight, and, although urged by the powerful friends of the accused, and by his own clerk, to admit the prisoners to bail, he firmly refused, well knowing they would then escape. They applied to the Court of Queen's Bench; but the judges, instead of bailing them, only directed another inquiry. The brothers were tried, convicted, and transported for life—which obtained great credit to Sir Peter Laurie. The next was a fraud of the most extraordinary description, which, for skill and daring, was unequalled. Two bankrupts, Hole and Knowles, opened an office in Baker-street, for insuring lives and property, and granting annuities on unusually low terms. The latter part of the scheme brought in large immediate payments from all parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and about £300,000 was obtained. Appearances were excellently kept up. The prospectus of the Independent West Middlesex Company exhibited an ample number of esquires in the direction, and a portion of them were represented by three or four poor fellows, who received a paltry daily allowance for their attendance, in smart suits and a profuse show of Birmingham jewellery. The gulls were gratified with an introduction to the mock board of directors. The exposure of the fraud, which ought to have been made at the west end of the town, Sir Peter Laurie took up at the Mansion House; and it created such a sensation in the public mind that a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the subject of self-constituted companies. Mr. Shiel, the President of the Board of Trade, was the chairman, and Sir Peter Laurie, and his nephew the barrister, as well as others, were examined. The dissolution of Parliament, however, arrested the inquiry.

PORTRAIT OF SIR PETER LAURIE.

His next remarkable effort was to prevent the frequent attempts at suicide. Many women were at the time brought to the Guildhall police-office for attempting to drown themselves at Blackfriars-bridge, which attained such a notoriety for these doings, that the spot was selected by persons residing in all the distant parts of the metropolis. One woman travelled up even from Epping Forest to drown herself at this chosen death-place of the wretched, and favourite resort of those who only sought to excite the public sympathy and charity. Sir Peter Laurie, by boldly encountering the risk of being rated for a want of feeling, sent two women to trial at the Old Bailey for the misdemeanour of attempting to commit a felony, observing justly that it is as criminal in the eye of the law for a man to destroy his own life as that of another individual. The dread of exposure at the Old Bailey put an end to the drowning mania.

The next, and perhaps the most important, bold step taken by Sir Peter, was the inquiry he made into the proceedings taken by the Caoutchouc Company to protect their patent. The company had prepared bills in Chancery against fifty-one tradesmen, and had obtained evidence to commence proceedings against one hundred more. In about thirty cases the solicitor of the company had quietly compromised on paying him the costs, thus preventing the matter from coming to a public hearing, and the publicity from putting tradesmen on their guard, and thus stopping the increase of the list of victims to be sued. The retail hosiers and others concerned watched for an opportunity of finding Sir Peter on the bench to assist them; but finding no such opportunity was likely to occur at an early time, they asked Sir John Pirie, then Lord Mayor, to allow Sir Peter Laurie to sit for him one day and hear their application, which request he kindly granted, and the hearing was obtained on the 4th of November, 1842. It was a scene of extraordinary excitement. The proceeding was adjourned to the Guildhall justice-room, and the result was that, to the great joy of the retailers who had compromised and paid an amount of above £300, Mr. Leaf, the chief proprietor, paid back all the money, and his representative even consented to take the bills off the file of Chancery at his expense. One of the sufferers emphatically thanked God that the City of London had such a magistrate as Sir Peter Laurie, and the whole body cheered the sentiment with great enthusiasm. Sir Peter said nothing had given him greater satisfaction in the course of his magisterial duty than this happy conclusion.

Sir Peter Laurie is a Conservative, and though he has occasionally found himself strongly opposed to the views of his brother aldermen in the court, he is popular with all parties; in the last election for the office of City Pleader, his nephew, Mr. Laurie, a barrister, was chosen by a large majority against a candidate of great influence; this cannot, however, be altogether ascribed to the influence of Sir Peter, Mr. Laurie being well known as an able and talented barrister. The public generally judge correctly as to the persons who have done them service, and among those persons public opinion has long given a prominent place to Sir Peter Laurie.

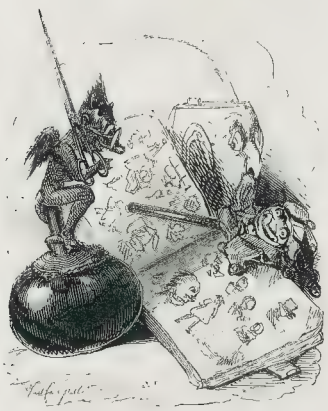
The last question with which he has connected himself is a decided opposition to the system of wood paving, now so generally adopted in the metropolis, and of which we have elsewhere given some illustrations. Sir Peter introduced the question at a meeting of the Court of Aldermen on Tuesday last, and was joined by several members of that body in his denunciations of the whole plan. We only mention the fact, to show that he is as active as ever in censuring what he believes to be injurious to the interest of the public.

SPORTS OF ENGLAND.—No. I.

STAG-HUNTING.

The accompanying sketch is to illustrate the cheering scene described by Somerville in his poem of "The Chase"—Stag-hunting is little known to our metropolitan sportsmen, but as connected with the mimic scene of hunting, such as the Queen's and one or two others. Where it is followed in the wild natural state, according with the habit of the animal and the scenery congenial to it, it is at once noble and cheering, full of daring exploit and courage; and it is the last link of the primitive chase brought down by our forefathers. The deer has suffered no mutilation; its antlers show him to be a stag of full head, therefore arrived at maturity; and from the determined manner of his going, he is likely to lead his followers "through wood and brake, o'er moss and moor," a pretty good chevy. There are few hunting establishments now such as this describes, where the animal is drawn for and found in his wild state. One reason may be that they are not numerous enough to afford sport, the forest and wild districts no longer being so extensive as formerly; and we have lost the real stag-hound, which, of course, robs it of much of its real character. But it is a noble sport, full of mimic war and exhilarating scenes.

ALFRED CROWQUILL'S SKETCHES.



PRINTER'S DEVIL.

To the Editors of the Illustrated London News.

SIRS,—If you please, I was a looking about in our office, after the men had gone, to see as they hadn't left nothing behind, when, all at once, quite promiscus, I fixes my eyes, accidentally, upon a small book, which was lying by itself up agin one of the legs of the press in the small room. Thinking as it was our men's book, what they checks their dinners in, I opens him, when I sees a lot of scrabbling heads and tales and lots of things, done short, which I could not understand. Werry small I see "Alfred Crowquill" writ, exactly like what I seen on some of our cuts.

I asked everybody—looked into the Directory—inquired of our postman—but no;—nobody knowed nothing of such a person's number! At last a little devil, who works below, says as how he is only a man of imagination and not real at all; so I keeps the book; and finding as there is no werry good murder this week and the Chinese men are wopped, I nibbles the editor's big scissors, and whips out a leaf or two which is at your service, as all the rest is when you wants 'em.

PRINTER'S DEVIL.

A MAN ON THE TOWN.

This genius is of an extensive, if not a great family, and of very ancient date, existing—since the days of Adam, at which early period the tenor of his life must have been incomparably smooth and easy—his greatest enemy being a tailor—an indispensable "item" in the catalogue of his necessaries now-a-days, although then unknown.

His habits are very migratory, his lodgings being continually changed, and in the most whimsical manner imaginable. The precise situation of his dormitory is generally a mystery—in fact, he is a man of manners but of "no address."

He is of no regular profession, but is supposed to have been—once in some army, somewhere, as he is called "captain," and trims his countenance à la militaire; his very gold-headed Malacca has something of the Horse Guards about it. Indeed, he states confidentially, to any intimate of the hour, that nothing, such was his love for the profession, could possibly have induced him to have "sold out" but the earnest entreaties of a timid old aunt—who is, of course, very rich, and "devilish" fond of him.

He affects greatness in everything; and, when in the company of rising young bloods, invariably acknowledges imaginary nods from coronetted carriages, which he finds an easy and a very cheap way of silently asserting his superiority over his associates.

The time when he condescends to dazzle the world by his brilliant appearance is about 4 P.M., when all the idle are busy and show-footmen rife in Regent-street.

His appearance denotes a rich man walking to overtake an appetite; but of which appetite, at that precise moment, he is in full possession, and is inwardly debating and hesitating between a hard biscuit and a cheap "French house"—ultimately deciding in favour of the latter, should he have been "lucky" at billiards the preceding night—the said real billiards being his imaginary dowager aunt, his three per cents., and his little rents, in fact an income to him; being, like most of his class, an adept in all the "coquetry" of the game; losing at double or quits with a tyro, and never winning until the last game, when his friend the "marker" must put out the lights. His manner and speech are light and facetious. "My boy!" is the acquaintance of an hour.

Full of generous sentiments over the table which his victim furnishes; for whom, when he proposes his health, he has a ready-made portrait of an "angel" poetically described—for he has talent, which, if properly directed, would provide him with what he seeks with half the trouble and without the discredit.

The young and inexperienced are his principal "game"—and to a man of his taste of course the higher they are the better. Sometimes, indeed, he stumbles over an ambitious tradesman: with such "low people" he generally adopts a short and uncerenonious course—he melts them over the quick fire of flattery—and casting them into the desired mould, gets them to "do a bill," which he, of course, allows them to retain, as a lasting memorandum of their pleasant acquaintance and an "undoubted autograph."

When he finds a victim who bleeds freely, he will remove—his carpet-bag to an hotel, which answers the double purpose of dazzling the said victim with good dinners (not paid for on the nail), and an excellent place for the reception of new suits from any unfortunate "ninth" who may have seen, arm in arm, with a highly respectable customer, with whom he has moreover once or twice manœuvred to call; and, a day or two afterwards, popping in, flatters the tailor upon his "cut," and orders a full "ornamental case" for himself.

He is frequently found at race-courses, winning enormously at roulette and other games, at so much per diem, and his victuals! But to the eye of the initiated his coolness betrays him, the money being of no more value to him than the "tin" which swells the purse of a stage-king, being merely "passed" to carry on the delusion.

A MAN ON THE TOWN.

His race is soon run, being pretty equally divided between a prison and a saloon, privations or a staunhope; and no one who sees him treading proudly down Regent-street, with his polished boots of the last cut, would recognise the same being, in déshabillé, seated in a miserable garret, and frequently supping on a short pipe!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LOUISE!

A SKETCH FROM NATURE.

If there be aught on earth that owns
Communion with the sky,
It is the sweet but sadden'd tones
Of woman's melody,
When struggling to conceal the moans
Of grief in music's sigh! ANON.

Her face is calm as a waveless sea,
And 'tis even lit with a gaiety,
That like a moonlight seemeth to be,
Flattering there most peacefully!

But a viewless thought of her soul comes on,
Like a breeze, and methinks I can hear its moan,
And it ripples her features calm—'tis gone!
She smiles again, the young lovely one!

Was it memory waken'd the peaceful sleep
That her beauty wore like a tranquil deep?
Could the wings of departed joy thus sweep
Back on her soul, and make her weep?

She's in the morning of beauty's day,
Peace should be round her lovely way—
She's yet too early for sorrow's prey!
Hark! she is singing a languid lay!

And the tears are now on her redden'd cheek,
And her tones are falt'ring—sweet and weak!
How vainly her delicate fingers seek
To bid the music more lightly speak!

See! her raven tresses uncurl their rings,
And mix with the melancholy strings
Of her sighing lute!—The song she sings
Bears other days upon Memory's wings!

She weeps for home—for her Father-land!
She trembles—the lute falls from her hand!
Poor child! so sorrowfully bland,
Would that I might thy tears command!

I'd send them—but where? such tears as those,
Born in a violet—wept on a rose—
Her eye,—her cheek,—should never repose
In a meaner dwelling! No flow'r that blows

Is like that eye, or that flushing cheek,—
There be their home then—I'll but seek
To chase her sorrow, and tell the meek
Sad soul of her beauty thus to speak:

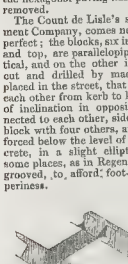
"I am not unhappy,—tho' here you see
Tear-drops like sorrow's fall from me!
They are but my heart's sweet ecstasy,
Wept in its joy—not misery!"—W.

WOOD PAVEMENT.

The "cordnroy roads" of North America are, probably, the most aboriginal wood pavement; but that which is daily changing the face of the carriage-ways of our metropolis has been, most likely, borrowed from St. Petersburg, where the streets are paved with small hexagons of wood, laid into a bed of crushed stones and sand; these are fastened laterally into each other with wooden pegs, and when the whole forms a plane surface the interstices are filled with fine sand, boiling pitch is poured over it, and sand strewed above it. Nevertheless, many years ago, a Mr. John Finlayson, of Ayr, laid down some experimental wood pavement, which he described in the London Journal of Arts and Sciences, for March, 1825, wherein he states its superiority to granite, after a lapse of 25 years, so that the experiment must have been made 42 years since. In 1835, too, Mr. Bradwell, the machinist of Covent Garden Theatre, submitted to the City Paving Commissioners a system of wood pavement, but the plan was rejected.

The first "practical" wood pavement in the metropolis was laid down by Mr. Stead, we think, in the year 1839: his blocks were hexagonal, or six-sided, like those at St. Petersburg; but they were inaccurately cut, and altogether badly laid. Mr. Stead preferred a permeable to a solid foundation for his wood paving; his theory being that the water should be permitted to percolate between the blocks, and through the substratum—that it should ebb or flow as chance might determine; but he has since been convinced of this fallacy, and now adopts a solid or concrete foundation. Still his hexagonal blocks have no principle of cohesion; each has to sustain the downward pressure thrown upon it, independently of any other, and is liable to be forced below the common level, and thus destroy the concrete. besides which, the fibre being placed vertically in Mr. Stead's blocks, they soon became convex at the surface by wear; so that nearly all the hexagonal paving has been relaid, and, in some cases, entirely removed.

The Count de Lisle's system, adopted by the Metropolitan Pavement Company, comes next in point of time. In this the cohesion is perfect; the blocks, six inches deep, and six inches square at the base and top, are parallelopipeds, which on two parallel sides are vertical, and on the other incline at a sharp angle. These blocks are cut and drilled by machinery mathematically alike; and are so placed in the street, that the blocks rest upon and are supported by each other from kerb to kerb, each alternate course having the angle of inclination in opposite directions; and these courses are connected to each other, side by side, by dowels, so as to connect every block with four others, and thus prevent the possibility of one being forced below the level of another. This pavement is laid upon concrete, in a slight elliptical curve. The surface is grooved, and in some places, as in Regent-street, and Fore-street, City, it is cross-grooved, to afford foot-hold for the horses and to prevent slipperiness.

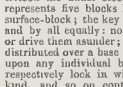


In a work of practical science, it is well observed, that "the rhomboidal blocks introduced by the Count de Lisle embrace the peculiarity of a system of wedging, dovetailing or mortising, and tenoning, which gives to the whole mass of the pavement a degree of stiffness and tenacity superior to the other forms which have been hitherto tried. The hexagonal prisms appear to require more care in accurately fitting and fixing them," which point has been much neglected.

The next system, Mr. Carey's, consists of cubical blocks, parallel at the base and surface, and alternately concave and convex at the sides. The fibre is vertical, so that the blocks soon become convex at the surface, and slippery; and the specimens in the Poultry and Lothbury, and in the Strand (near Norfolk-street), have, of necessity, been grooved; but they have not a concrete foundation.

Next is Mr. Grimmas's system of blocks, which, at the base and surface are parallelograms; at the ends and sides they incline at an angle of 77 degrees; and they are so cut as to be worked from right to left, and vice versâ, presenting a sort of herring-bone surface, such as may be seen in many old stables floored with brick. Each block leans endwise and sidewise on two others, and is similarly leant upon; still they want cohesion to counteract the effect of expansion. A specimen may be seen in Piccadilly, laid upon firm concrete. The blocks are not grooved, but chamfered (ground down) at the edges, and are already much worn.

Mr. Rankin's pavement, manufactured by Messrs. Esdailes and Margrave, at the City Saw Mills, remains to be noticed. A square-sided piece of timber is provided, each side being four inches across; and two equilateral grooves are rapidly cut by steam machinery along the whole length of the piece. It is then turned over, and on its opposite side throughout are cut two tongues. This grooving and tonguing is strictly geometrical, and the principal feature of the invention. The lengths thus prepared have now to be cut into blocks.



The two shaded parts, C and D, one at each end of the length, are cut to waste. The dotted lines indicate the direction of the saw, when the length is converted into blocks. A A A are base-blocks, and B B B the key-blocks; the former to be laid upon the ground, with their bases downward; the latter to form the surface of the pavement, with their bases upward, and are key-blocks to firmly interlock the under blocks and themselves together. The next cut represents five blocks locked together: four base-blocks and one surface-block; the key of the latter being supported by the others, and by all equally: no surface pressure can separate them laterally, or drive them asunder; so that any weight applied at the surface is distributed over a base nearly four times its area, and cannot fall upon any individual block: but these four base-blocks likewise respectively lock in with four other different series of the same kind, and so on continuously from side to side of the street, where they rest on the kerbs, and longitudinally from end to end of the pavement. It is laid upon good concrete, and all wood pavement must have this firm bed, to insure lasting. The construction of this pavement has been said to present the principle of the arch—the kerbs representing the abutting pieces, and the upper or surface-blocks the keystones, with their grooves and tongues. The third engraving shows the general character of the pavement, which provides an effectual remedy against slipperiness by offering a firm foot-hold for the horse, whilst it presents no resistance to the progress of the wheel! A specimen (with some variations) has been laid down opposite St. Giles's Church, in place of Mr. Stead's hexagonal blocks; and we have been assured by a resident on the spot, that horses very rarely fall or stumble there, notwithstanding the vast traffic of the thoroughfare.

The next cut illustrates a new wood pavement, recently patented by Mr. W. H. Mortmer, of Soho, in which each block having the two opposite sides reversed in their cut, they will go together and support each other. The annexed figure shows a block, in which the inclined surfaces, a b and d e, are combined with the tongue, c, and form, on the opposite sides of the blocks, the corresponding inclined surfaces and grooves, f, g, i, k, and h. We are not aware of this variety being yet applied to practice.

A new description of wood paving blocks has lately been introduced in Paris, and were described by Sir John Robison, at the meeting of the British Association, last summer. The Parisians use circular blocks instead of hexagons, and the blocks are supported one by another.

One sixth of the circumference of the block is cut out with a radius equal to the radius of the block; three of these grooves are made at equal distances to half the depth of the block, and then three similar grooves are cut in the lower half of the block, but so that the grooves above be vertically over the portions left uncut-touched in the lower half: thus, each end of the block shows three flutes or grooves and three projections. When the blocks are put together, it is manifest that the groove in one fits the projection in the next one, which, at the same time, receives the lower half of the other. thus each supporting and strengthening its neighbour.

Of course the above are but a portion of the varieties of wood pavement that have already been submitted to the public within the short space of four years, but they are the principal methods which have been tried in the metropolis.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Frolic, 16, Captain Willis, came into Portsmouth harbour on Tuesday morning, for the purpose of dismantling and taking out her masts, it having been ascertained in the late trial of sailing with the Narcissus, that the Frolic is considerably over masted. It is understood she will receive on board further ballast.

Rear-Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart., has been appointed to Malta Dockyard as Admiral Superintendent, vice Sir John Lewis, who returns to England, having completed his term of servitude, five years.

The Agra Ukhbar of October 20th, states that six of our Cabul prisoners prisoners no longer!—are to be tried by court-martial: they are, General Skelton, Colonel Palmer, Captains Waller, Eyre, Boyd, and Anderson. After all their sufferings we can only wish them well through this ordeal.

Death of Hylton Jolliffe, Esq.—This gentleman expired on Thursday week, the 13th inst., at his residence in Pall-mall. Mr. Jolliffe was one of the oldest members of the House of Commons, having represented the borough of Petersfield more than forty years.

Major-General Sir Thomas Downman, C.B. and K.C.H., has been appointed director-general of the Royal Artillery, in the room of the late Major-General Drummond.

Her Majesty's line-of battle ship, Howe, bearing the flag of Sir Francis Mason, is still at the Fore. s, as is also her Majesty's sloop Scout, the Hon. Captain Drummond.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE HURRICANE.

It was our painful duty last week to record a number of lamentable shipwrecks, which occurred during the dreadful hurricane on the night of the 12th inst., and which were attended with an unusually large sacrifice of property and human life; and it is now with increased regret we feel ourselves called on to add to the already too numerous list of calamities, amongst which the loss of the Conqueror, East Indiaman, off the French coast, near where the Reliance was wrecked, is not the least distressing. The gale appears to have run, with its fearful rapidity and violence, from one extreme point of the coast to the other, entailing disaster and ruin throughout the whole line of its unwelcome visitation. From the principal ports we have heard the worst, but we fear that from the secluded districts of England, and the coasts of Ireland and Scotland, similar calamities have yet to be reported.

The Conqueror was a fine vessel of 800 tons burden, and belonged to Mr. Green, of the firm of Wigram and Green, and was bound from Calcutta to London, and commanded by Captain Duggan. After beating about in the Channel during the gale on Friday night week, she was driven on shore on Lionel, a small town on the French coast, only six miles distant from Merimont (where the Reliance struck), at about half-past ten o'clock, P.M., and almost immediately went to pieces—every soul on board being lost, with the exception of a boy named Henry Abchurch, one of the cuddy servants. The crew consisted of about 45 seamen, exclusive of officers, and the vessel had no less than 16 passengers on board, including Mrs. Thompson (the wife of an East India captain) and Mrs. Jenkins, both of whom were accompanied by a family of four children, and three officers of the united services. The ship was freighted with a valuable cargo of silk and general merchandise, and it is supposed that she must have suffered severely from the late hurricanes, and become unmanageable as she neared the Channel. No authentic statement of the circumstances has yet been received from the poor boy, who is the only one saved. He is under the care of Mr. Hamilton, her Britannic Majesty's consul at Boulogne, and will remain for the melancholy purpose of identifying any bodies that may come ashore. A letter announcing the wreck was received on Monday morning by W. Dobson, Esq., secretary to Lloyd's, from Mr. Adolphe Adam, the agent at Boulogne. Of the entire cargo, only a few punchoons of rum have as yet been recovered. The ship is entirely gone to pieces. Mr. Green, the owner, despatched his agent to Lionel, for the purpose of protecting the property; and Captain Thompson, the brother-in-law of Mrs. Thompson, and other connections of the deceased passengers, accompanied him. Mr. Hamilton has been unceasingly engaged on the spot. The Conqueror was built at Newcastle, and purchased only last year by Mr. Green. Captain Duggan was an experienced officer, formerly in the Company's service, and has made several voyages to India. The first officer's name is Mr. Harvey. The following is a correct list of the passengers: Mrs. Thompson and four children, Mrs. J. Jenkins and four children, Mrs. Major Johnstone, Miss Turton, Major Johnstone, Mr. Marshall, Lieutenant Marshall, Captain Mulney, Master Blake, and Master Reeves.

About the same period a Swedish vessel was wrecked near the spot, and all hands perished; as also an English vessel, with the whole of her crew. Three other vessels were also wrecked, and the crew of one of them drowned.

Ten cases of despatches for the East India Company, two boxes and a canvass bag of letters for the Post-office, and the ship's papers, the British Consul fortunately secured, and sent them to the authorities by the Magnet on Monday evening. The bodies of the unfortunate sufferers were being momentarily washed ashore on Monday. On Friday week, a female, apparently about 46 years of age, on being picked up in the surf, was found to exhibit symptoms of animation, but life soon became extinct. The scene of the destruction is 14 miles westward of Boulogne.

There is a Swedish vessel riding off Staples, with her masts gone. The crew, after cutting them away, took to their boats; but most have since perished, as the boats have been washed ashore.

A French brig, belonging to Havre, came in on Monday morning. Her sails had been all blown away, and she arrived under a fore and mainmast.

The General Steam Company's fine vessel Magnet had a very boisterous passage to Boulogne. She left London on Saturday morning, but finding it blow so very strong from the S.S.W., she lay to off Margate. The wind, however, shifted to N.N.W., and her experienced master finding himself then on a lee-shore, he removed to the Downs, where he rode out a night of tremendously heavy weather, with 75 fathoms of cable. He arrived there at ten o'clock on Monday morning.

We now subjoin a summary of the casualties of which we have been informed by our correspondents since our last publication. From Sheerness we learn there were seven ships and four schooners on the North Sand; the Dane was on the Knock Sand, full of water. At Southwold the crew of the Katie Pickford landed, the vessel having broken up upon the Gunfleet Sand; the Hope was water-logged and abandoned. From Colchester we are informed that three vessels were lost in the Swin. From Ramsgate many vessels dismasted; the Brix on shore, throwing cargo overboard. The Ebenezer on shore at Thurlestone Sand a boy lost. Cowes—Several vessels arrived and towed in damaged. The George ashore at the back of island. master and mate drowned. The Orwell ran down the John: crew saved. Dungeness The Friends, Goodwill, boarded by the coast guard; vessel on her beam-ends, crew supposed to be washed overboard. Liverpool—Several vessels dismasted; the Venus wrecked on Burbo Bank: master and cook drowned; five men saved. The Hale wrecked on Formby Bank: one man saved; four drowned. The St. Petersburg went ashore, mast cut away; afterwards got off, full of water, and brought in. The John Cummin ashore in Bootle Bay. A schooner sunk in the quarantine ground. The Acorn on shore near Southport. Montrose—The Fortunde went on shore near Usan: knocked to pieces; crew saved. Bude—A large brig, name unknown, on shore, completely wrecked: crew drowned. Milford—The Piper drove, and got in contact with the Sydney and Jane: the former was abandoned and sunk. A brig went down off the St. Ann's lighthouse; the crew, eight men, perished. Bristol The Mermaid steamer struck by a sea, her bulwarks and 200 pigs carried overboard. The Caroline, Pomona, and a Prussian brig drove on shore, but got off. The Active went ashore. The Anne foundered: crew saved. Bridlington The Concord towed in, dismasted. The Mary ran on board by a large brig: the former dismasted; the latter was abandoned: crew saved. Tenby The Ann and Eliza broke from her moorings, and, it is feared, has sunk; the Emily Louisa a total wreck on Caldy Island: crew saved. Grimsby—The John and Susan ran on Sand Hill, fell on her beam-ends: the crew compelled to abandon her. Cardiff—Several vessels arrived much injured. Caernarvon—The Jane and Mary sunk at anchor. A schooner unknown on shore at Meltvath. Barmouth The Edwin ran on shore her beam ends, only one hat saved, the rest washed overboard. The Mary and Eliza stranded about five miles north of the port: the master saved by the life boat, the rest perished. A brig on shore between Barmouth and Aberdovey: one man drowned. Portmadoth—Many vessel arrived much damaged. The Tyro drifted on the Woolsners and went to pieces: crew and part of cargo saved. Aberystwith a schooner foundered at Sarny-Buck. A large brig came ashore at Llanrhystud. Harwich Landed the crew of the William and Ann, lost on the Gunfleet. Several vessels arrived injured. A ship, reported to be the Columbia or Columbine, between the Nesses, with loss of anchors; a smack had just gone out to her. Bideford The schooner Little Test, wrecked near Hartland Bay: crew drowned, except one boy. The John Lilly, stranded, with seven feet of water in her hold: crew saved. The Albert Edward Prince of Wales, from Galway to London, is ashore on the Burrows, and expected to become a wreck: crew saved. Caernarvon—A schooner on shore off Bodfenan: oars marked "D. V." Aberdovey—The Phœbe wrecked: crew perished. A brig gone to pieces six miles northward: all hands lost. Littlehampton—The Industry on shore west of Selsey-Bill: crew saved. Portsdown The Friends went on shore: crew saved with difficulty. Boscastle—The Sarah was boarded dismasted, and crew brought off. Inverkeithing—The Janet struck on the Oscar, and went to pieces. Mr. Ford—The Eveline stranded, and most discharge. Isle of Wight—The George has become a wreck at Atherfield: master and mate drowned. Norwinstow—The Phœnix ashore: crew drowned. Berwick—The Emma ashore at Holy Island Harbour. Four vessels reported ashore at Dunbar, and one sunk. Wexford—The Santon wrecked on the Brough of Bailyteague Bay: master and three men drowned. Llanraddock—The Ann and Elizabeth ashore on Lynn Sands: crew saved. Aldborough—The Dove went ashore in Bulsey Bay: the master and mate (his son) and a boy were drowned: two men saved. Barnstaple—The John Lilly driven on shore on the bar: crew saved. Mumbles—The Countess of Portsmouth on shore near the east pier, a wreck: crew saved. Boscastle—The Sarah, of Tynemouth, from Neath to Tynemouth, foundered off Tintagle Head: crew saved. A large barque is wrecked below Bude. crew drowned. Limerick—Several have been received here of the loss of the Florida and Lansdowne hence, on the coast of Donegal. Harwich—The Hope, from Sunderland to London, was abandoned, 14th inst., in a sinking state, in 4 fathoms L. of the Newark light: crew saved. Dunbar—The Cleveland, from Antwerp to Arbroath, and the Isabella Black, from Kirkaldy, are ashore, four miles to the eastward: crew saved. The Peterhead packet is totally wrecked eight miles to the westward. Aldborough—The Dart, of Yarmouth, is stranded in Homesby Bay: cargo and part of materials saved; master and two men drowned. Isle of Wight—The George, of Sutherland, from Shields to Grenada, is ashore on the rocks on the 12th inst., at Atherfield, and has become a wreck: master and mate drowned. Norwinstow, Cornwall The Phœnix, of St. Ives, is ashore here: crew drowned. Ilfracombe —A ship, apparently timber laden, is ashore to the northward of Barnstaple Bar: crew saved. Cork—The wreck of a barque, apparently recently sunk, was seen on the 8th of November, in the Straits of Sunda; she appeared to have been in a sinking state, as all her sails were set; some of her sails were marked "J. Peake, sailmaker, Liverpool," and "Richardson, sailmaker," by the Royal Saxon, arrived here from China. Lowestoft—The Henry Brougham, on Pakefield Flats, has become a total wreck: crew drowned.

The ship Vernon was wrecked on the North Burbo Bank, opposite to New Brighton in captain, mate, and boy drowned. The captain's name was Maclean; the mate's, Duncan Macdonald: they have each left a wife and family in Glasgow. The bodies of the captain and the cook were found on saturday, brought to town, and placed in the dead-house.

The schooner Isabella, of Belfast, bound to Runcorn, laden with pipe-clay, &c., was wrecked on West Hoyle, during the night. Whether the crew were saved or not we have not heard. They were, it is but too probable, lost.

Several pieces of wreck, painted yellow inside, apparently part of a large vessel, have been washed on shore on Hilbre Island, at the mouth of the Dee. Part of a barometer, made at Marseilles, has also been washed on shore on the island.

The Lady Mary Wood steam-packet arrived at Southampton from Gibraltar on Monday last. Her dates were: Gibraltar, the 8th instant; Cadiz, the 6th; Lisbon, the 8th; Oporto, the 10th; and Vigo, the 11th. She experienced very bad weather. Among the passengers brought home, fifteen in number, was Sir Charles Napier, besides six distressed seamen. The cargo consisted of oranges and thirteen casks of wine, two of which died on the voyage.

The Consul of Madeira, Mr. Stoddart, now in London, has received intelligence of the arrival at that island of the City of Glasgow steamer on the 21st of December.

Southampton.—The Atalanta, Captain Rabot, arrived at Southampton on Tuesday morning from the Canary Islands. Two Southampton steamers went off the Wight to tow a large roddereless vessel into Cowes Roads. she was fallen in with by a government vessel in the Channel.

Wreck of the Jessie Logan, Captain Napier, and belonging to Mr. Logan, a merchant at Liverpool, between which port and Calcutta she traded, and was homeward bound, with a general cargo, consisting of rum, sugar, coffee, hides, and other produce, and was of 800 tons burden. The spot where she struck was Boscastle, otherwise Battereaux, seventeen miles from Launceston, and within a mile of Tintagell Bay. The rocks at this part of the coast being accessible, the inhabitants proceeded to the spot for the purpose of rendering assistance to the crew and passengers, but not a human being was found on board. Subsequently the long-boat was washed ashore, and it is supposed that the whole of the crew met a watery grave. At the time the account of the wreck was despatched none of the crew had been heard of, nor had any of the bodies been found.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

PREROGATIVE COURT, Monday, Jan. 16
DAW, OTHERWISE DAWES, AGAINST DE FEUCHERES. ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

This was a business of granting administration of the effects of the late Sophy Dawes, Baroness de Feuchères, to her immediate relations in England. The suit had been in the first instance opposed by the Queen's proctor, and by the Baron de Feuchères, her husband, from whom she had been divorced by the law of France. Both had, however, withdrawn from the suit. The remarkable history of the deceased lady has been made known to the world by the proceedings in the civil tribunals of France.—Dr. Addams was about to open the case, when Sir H. Jenner Fust said he had read the allegation, the evidence, and the exhibits, and he did not see any necessity for troubling the learned counsel to enter into the details of the case. The deceased was a domiciled subject of France, and had been divorced from her husband, who, by the law of France, had therefore no control over her property. Of the fact of her having a domiciled French subject there could be no doubt; there could be as little doubt of the title of the parties before the court. It was quite clear that Richard Daw and Jane Callaway were married in the Isle of Wight in 1775, and had had several children, of whom the deceased was one, though there was no baptismal registry of her birth. The fact that they had a daughter named Sophy was, however, proved by an extract from the books of the House of Industry, into which she was introduced at the age of six years, and where she continued some time. Her identity was proved by the fact, amongst others, that she placed her mother in the Carmelite convent at Paris. Indeed, the only difficulty in the case had been created by the deceased herself, in representing her name to be Dawes, and herself to be a widow, when she married the Baron de Feuchères. She was evidently a person of very extraordinary talents, and her history was a romance of real life, more extraordinary than any he (the learned judge) had ever read. She became acquainted with the Duke of Bourbon, from whom she obtained the large property which had now to be distributed. The facts and documents were so clear, that he had no doubt that the parties were the legitimate brother and and sister had proved their relationship, though she had gone by the name of Dawes, there had been no family in the Isle of Wight of that name. He had no hesitation in presuming that the proctor for the brother and sister had proved their relationship, and that they are entitled to administration of her effects, she being a French subject legally divorced from her husband. It was to be said in favour of the deceased lady, that she never deserted her family, whom it was her great object to aggrandize.—The effect of this sentence will be to give to the family of the deceased all the property in England and France, amounting to about £200,000, except some property secured to the baron by the marriage settlement.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—Wednesday
THE QUEEN V. SIR A. M. SHEE AND OTHERS.

Lord Denman delivered the judgment of the Court in this case, which was an appeal against an assessment for the relief of the poor, duly made on the Royal Academy, in respect of a certain portion of the National Gallery used for the purpose of the Royal Society. The question arose upon the peculiar nature and character and purposes for which the property was used. No doubt existed, that if there was nothing specially to exempt them, the premises were presumably the subject of the assessment, independent of the local act, because, although that contained a larger description of property than was to be found in the statute of Elizabeth, no reliance was placed on that circumstance, because the case was considered, and properly so, as made had been defined with sufficient distinctness, the difficulty depending upon the application of those principles to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. In the case of "the King v. Tarrett," where a lieutenant-colonel in the Artillery had been rated for property belonging to the Crown, this court had been of opinion that he had been properly rated, on account of the private benefit he derived from his private occupation of the apartments. If the party rated had the use of premises as the mere servant of the Crown, and had no beneficial occupation resulting from it, then he was not rateable. Whether the commanding officer might withdraw himself from the rate by contracting his occupation, would be to be decided when the case arose. This point had come before the court in the case of "Hampton court Palace;" there the enjoyment by the residents was considered not to be in the shape of actual residence. If therefore this was the property of the Crown or of the public, and was used expressly for public purposes, the case must come within the principle of exemption. This society was instituted by George III. in 1766 for the express purpose of cultivating and improving the arts. It was formerly held in part of the Royal Palace of somerset-house. The premises now in question were stated to be the property of the Crown; the officers were selected by the Sovereign, or elected by the society, subject to the approbation of the Sovereign. The treasurer, who received the profits, was appointed by Her Majesty, and his accounts were submitted to the scrutiny of the Privy Purse; and if the profits should fail, the society must fail, unless it was sustained by the bounty of the Crown. The society had no lease, but the Crown might, at any time, resume possession, as it the appellants might well be considered as the agents of the Crown, the objects being national and public. The court was of opinion that the assessment could not be sustained, and the order of sessions must be quashed.

THE QUEEN V. HOLT.—CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd moved that the rule for a criminal information in this case should be made absolute. Their lordships would recollect that it was an application made on behalf of the Duke of Brunswick, against the publisher of the Age, for a series of libels published in that newspaper, reflecting on the character and honour of his Royal Highness. The rule for criminal information made absolute. The Duke of Brunswick sat by the side of his counsel during the argument, and appeared to take great interest in the proceedings.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY—Tuesday.
(Before Sir C. F. Williams.)
IN RE HARVEY GARNETT PHIPPS TUCKETT.

This day was fixed for the final examination of the bankrupt, who was stated to be a "wine-merchant." The gallant bankrupt's last balance sheet was objected to as only extending over a period of a few months, and Mr. Poynder (the trade assignee) thought that the creditors should have the history of the bankrupt's transactions before and during the existence of the partnership with Captain Gordon, as also his individual trading since that time. The learned chief commissioner concurred with the suggestion of Mr. Poynder; and in looking over the bankrupt's balance sheet, observed that his private expenses appeared to be at the rate of £1500, while his trade was so very limited. But that possibly might form the subject of discussion at a future period. Mr. Moore, of Cornhill, applied for the restitution of certain goods, value £60, which had been sent to him as his property, which were neither invoiced nor entered to the bankrupt. After some discussion, the restitution of the goods was ordered, and the further examination was adjourned for the bankrupt's production of an extended and amended balance sheet.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—Wednesday
(Before Mr. Walesby and a Bench of Magistrates.)

A general session of the peace for the metropolitan county was held, by adjournment, to day at Clerkenwell-green, for the purpose of hearing appeals. No less than 34 were set down in the paper. Many of them were ordered to stand adjourned by consent; some were struck out for want of appearance; while in those which were argued, no point of the slightest interest was raised.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Mr. Henry Bond, of the house of Dod, Bent, and Co., insurance-brokers, appeared before the Lord Mayor, to answer the complaint of Mr. Richard Moxon, who charged him with having received the sum of £10 to effect an insurance upon goods shipped on board the Jolly Tar, bound for Texas, and appropriated the money to his own use. The case excited a vast deal of interest among mercantile men.—It appeared that the prosecutor had validly endeavoured to procure the policy of insurance from the accused before his departure, but the latter came on board at Gravesend, and put into his hand a paper, acknowledging the receipt of the premium, and alleging as an excuse for not producing the policy, that a sufficient number of the directors could not be got together to sign it. Mr. Moxon then wrote from the Downs, by the pilot, to Mr. Slade, the insurance-broker, the following letter

"Ship Jolly Tar, 12. 9. 41, off the Downs.

"Dear Sir,—Mr. Bond (Gravesend this morning, the weather delightfully fine. I send this by the pilot, enclosing a letter, acknowledging the having insured £500 from Dod, Bent, and Co. They said the insurance company (viz., the Shipmasters' Society) could not get the policy ready for a few days. Will you be so kind as to get the policy from Dod, Bent, and Co., and hold it for me. Should we and the goods be lost, I should wish my mother, Mrs. Sarah Moxon, Westcourt-street, Brompton, Kent, to enjoy the amount; she has my letter to that effect. I also enclose a bill of lading.—I am, my dear Sir, yours most truly,

"To Mr. John Slade."

"Richard Moxon."

On the 13th of November the vessel was wrecked, off the coast of Cuba, and witness lost everything he possessed. The value of his property was upwards of £2500. He got a passage to Bermuda through the humanity of the consul in Cuba. Several other witnesses having been examined in support of the charge, the Lord Mayor said, it was manifest that Mr. Bent, after having ascertained on the 6th of September that the goods were not insured, informed Mr. Moxon on the 10th of September that they were. He thought the case came under the meaning of the act, and called upon Mr. Bent to find bail; himself to the amount of £200, and two sureties to the amount of £100 each.

GUILDHALL.—Miss Newell, the artist, who is labouring under a mental delusion that she is a chosen instrument to work out a complete change in the existing religious and political systems, endeavoured to get permission to read a political letter which the newspapers would not publish, and which she wished to make public. Some aldermen have indulged her by hearing her make a speech or read a letter, on the same principle that they grant a hearing to three or four other crazy folks, who are in the habit of visiting the police offices, because they afterwards go away quietly, with their minds greatly relieved, and no one pays any attention to their statements. Mr. Alderman Wood, however, now refused to hear Miss Newell unless she had brought to make of a specific breach of the law, of some individual wrong suffered by her, or of some criminal offence done by some person. He said a justice-room was not like an omnibus, to take in all comers who had complaints to make of any nature whatsoever. Miss Newell admitted her complaint was not within the limits laid down, and withdrew.

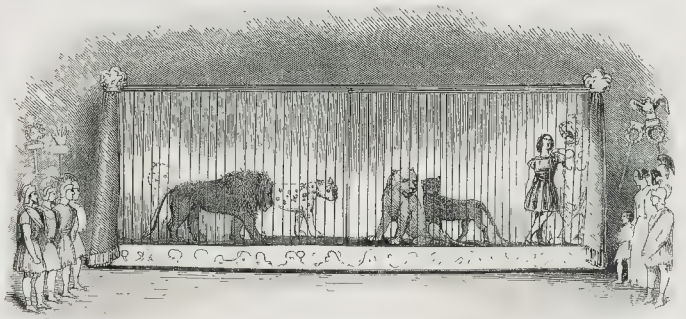
BOW STREET.—Michael Leary, apparently a stablemun, was charged with unlawfully having in his possession a Newfoundland dog, the property of his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch. Mr. Hall ordered the prisoner to pay the sum of £3, being the nominal value of the dog, and a fine of £10 for the offence, and in default to be committed to prison for four calendar months.

George Tuson, a clerk in the service of Messrs. Bate and Co., [illegible] manufacturers, of Newcastle street, Strand, was brought [illegible] charged with [illegible] of various articles of [illegible] belonging to his employers. It appeared that [illegible] property was paid to the prisoner for goods delivered, and the prisoner was committed for trial.

WESTMINSTER.—A man named William Osborne, was placed at the bar, before Mr. Rawlinson, charged on suspicion of having received a quantity of silk, the property of Mr. Shaw, of Mortimer-street, knowing it to have been stolen. It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Shaw, in consequence of information which he had received relative to his stolen property, proceeded to a house in Charlotte-street, where the prisoner lived, and he succeeded in what a man named Pritchard, who was brother to his (Mr. Shaw's) foreman, was concerned in the robbery; he searched the place, but without finding any of the stolen articles, and the prisoner, from certain facts which had come to his (Mr. S.'s) knowledge, was given into custody. The melancholy fact of the suspected man, Pritchard, having, on the morning, died before the examination, and that they were not able to bring him to, terminated his existence, was communicated to the magistrate. None of the stolen property had been met with, and the prisoner, against whom there was no proof whatever, was discharged.

LAMBETH-STREET.—Tricks of Cab Proprietors.—John Shrubsole, a Jew, was charged by Abraham Garcia, with stealing a pair of cab-plates, his property.—The complainant stated that on the 2nd he bought a cab and horse from the prisoner for ten guineas, and paid him the money. Having neither plates nor a licence as a proprietor himself, but merely those of a driver, he had agreed to allow the prisoner a shilling a day for his plates and the privilege of his licence until he could get both himself.—Mr. Henry here interfered, and cautioned the witness, observing that he was disclosing that which would render him subject to severe penalties.—The complainant, however, went on, and said he kept up his payments of the shilling a day regularly, and had even paid seven days in advance, and used, accordingly, to let the prisoner have the use of the plates for his nightcab. On the evening before the prisoner entered his premises, and stole both the side-plates from his cab. The prisoner, in reply to the charge, said that though he had only the cab and horse in the complainant, he had not disposed of his plates. The latter (he said) bore his own name in a conspicuous manner, and he thought he was perfectly justified in taking them away from the complainant.—Mr. Henry did not think the offence amounted to a felony, but the transaction was so fraught with illegality and fraud, that he should feel it to be his duty to acquaint Mr. Wedgwood, the registrar of hackney carriages, with the whole of the circumstances, in order that steps might be taken to put an end to such irregularity.—Both the complainant and the prisoner declared that such practices were quite common amongst cab masters.

MARLBOROUGH STREET.—On Wednesday, James Williams, who was stated to be one of a formidable gang of fellows who have induced the shopmen of various tradesmen to rob their employers, and by which the accused victuallers of the metropolis have sustained severe losses, was charged with having persuaded Robert Lincoln, the barman to Mr. W. M. Davis, the proprietor of the Blue Post, Bayswater Road, Oxford-street, his master, to rob Hodkin, the barrister, and Mr. Child, of the firm of Wire and Child, solicitors to the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society, appeared for the prosecution. The facts of the case are briefly these:—About a fortnight ago the prisoner



MR. VAN AMBURGH AND HIS LIONS AT THE ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

Mr. Van Amburgh, like the animals he lives by, is a lion in his way; and, having again made his bow to a London audience, in the new capacity of theatrical manager and lessee of a national theatre, we at once introduce the lion-tamer to the readers of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS, as the latest zoological novelty. Of Mr. Carter, who is the partner of Van Amburgh in the new undertaking, we have already given a sketch, but avoided indulging in any remarks upon the general tendency of such displays. The exhibition is curious, as showing the possibility—nay, as demonstrating the fact—of man's ability to tame the wildest animals; to subdue those creatures whose natural instincts would lead them to devour him, and whose physical strength and carnivorous organization give them the power, had they the will to do so. But it excites also a feeling of wonder as to the means by which the startling effect has been produced, and excitement, from the evident danger in which the chief actor is placed. That the men will eventually be injured, there can be little doubt, and whether the exhibition is justifiable under such circumstances is very questionable. In old Rome such a display might, perhaps, have gained golden opinions and reward; but advancing civilisation has lessened the taste for those sights at which excitement is obtained at the expense of peril to the exhibitor; and the ability to provoke wonder is now only rewarded by the applause of those not occupying the highest point in the scale of intelligence. The day is gone—we trust never again to revive—when the agony and blood of the Colisseum gave the zest to the exhibition, and the spectators were enraptured when the gladiator was at his last gasp. In the wake of those scenes have also passed away the minor barbarities of bull-baiting, bear-baiting, and badger-drawing; and the fate of pugilism is also sealed by the advent of a purer taste and more correct feeling in the mass of people. It would not be difficult to string together arguments against the desecration to the purposes of a menagerie of a building raised to the genius of English opera, or to institute comparisons most odious between the barbarous warrings of lions and tigers and the more humanizing sounds of English melody. We shall, however, refrain from doing so in this instance, as the English Opera is not the only stage upon which faults against good judgment or sound taste are committed, or Mr. Van Amburgh the only manager who caters to the lower rather than to the more elevated feelings and tastes of the London public. If courage and sagacity are entitled to commendation and encouragement without strict reference to the purposes for which they have been employed, then do the lion-tamers, Van Amburgh and Carter, merit the highest praise and deserve the pecuniary reward which their exhibition will probably produce.

The theatre has undergone alterations—a circus having been formed in which a variety of equestrian performances, à la Astley, take place. The piece selected for the opening night was called "Aslar and Ozines; or, the Lion Hunters of the Burning Zaara"—a title sufficiently indicative of what was to be expected. The scene is laid in Rome and Numidia, but what the plot was, or how it was intended to be wrought out, no one seemed able to discover; the only impression was one of tedium, save in those parts which gained a perilous interest from the presence of the lions. We select one of the latter scenes for illustration; and avoiding in charity any allusion to the brute-tamers as actors, apart from their peculiar vocation, we close our present notice of these lions of London.

THE FASHIONS.

[The letter of our correspondent, descriptive of our Plate of the Fashions, has not reached us in time to be inserted this week.]

CITY ANTIQUITIES.—Amongst the most important works now in progress in the City, connected with its improvement, is that of the extension of the sewerage through Lad-lane, connected with the main leading sewer in Princes-street. The excavations, which are from eighteen to twenty feet deep, have exhibited some very interesting facts relative to the early history of the City. Some few coins, principally of Antoninus, and a few interesting fragments of Roman and Samian pottery, with household utensils, have been found; but the chief objects of interest have been the discovery of some vestiges of the foundation walls of some old Roman buildings. The most extensive of these was found last week opposite Mr. Chaplin's, of the Swan-with two Necks, where the excavators arrived at a wall composed of flints, about 18 feet below the surface, which was between five and six feet in thickness, and through which they had some difficulty to penetrate. Opposite to the church walls in Catenton-street, at the depth of about eighteen feet, there was found a large quantity of human bones, showing that there existed here a place of sepulture which must have been coeval with the time of the Romans.

FLORICULTURE.

CHRYSANTHEMUM.

The Chrysanthemum is an universal favourite, and is what may be termed any body's flower who will bestow upon it the very little attention necessary to produce the splendid display it annually presents. It is, without question, the finest of our autumnal flowers, and is the more valuable from its flowering at a period when any flower is acceptable. It is quite as popular a flower in China as with us, and from thence most of our varieties were originally obtained. Without the Chrysanthemum our flower-gardens and greenhouses would have but a blank and dreary appearance during the wet and foggy months of November and December. The cultivation of this plant is of the easiest description; it is sometimes grown in the open border, but more generally in pots, and as this is the preferable method we give it first. The plants are propagated by division, by suckers, and by cuttings: the latter mode is the best, as in every case they are apt to throw up suckers, which are very detrimental to the production of fine flowers: cuttings are preferred because less liable to this objection. They should be taken off about the end of May, shortening each cutting to the length of four or five joints: after being prepared in the usual manner plant them in sandy earth, in the open ground, and cover them with a hand-glass. They require about three weeks to strike root, during which time it is necessary to shade them from the intense action of the sun. In the first potting the soil used should be a mixture of loam and old manure; they require to be placed in large pots. About the latter end of September a sheltered situation should be chosen for them to stand in, from the period of the first potting till danger is apprehended from frosts, and during the whole of this time an abundant supply of water is necessary; they are also benefited by an occasional watering with liquid manure. On the approach of cold nights let them be removed to the greenhouse or parlour windows, when the now swelling buds in a short time unfold their resplendent petals. If grown as an ornament to the parterre, it is only necessary to displace a portion of the numerous suckers annually produced, and to keep the remaining flower-stems securely fastened to stout sticks. When designed for a parlour ornament, the buds are formed earlier, and there is, consequently, a better prospect of a full crop of perfect flowers: if very finely-formed flowers are desired, it is advisable to reduce the number of buds on each stem when about half grown.

The Journal de Coutances states that a whirlwind of extraordinary violence passed over part of the town on the 11th inst., and did considerable damage, taking away stones, slates, and tiles, and stripping several houses. A letter from Bourges, of the 13th, mentions that for five days a tempest had been raging in the neighbourhood, and had committed some ravages.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

SHAP ABBEY, WESTMORELAND.

How pleasant, even in imagination, for those "in populous city pent" to turn from smoke and din and mental turmoil to some far-off quiet nook, and, in admiration of its rural beauty and sylvan quietude, forget for a brief space all surrounding annoyances. Here have we such a corner of England—a lonely vale on the bank of the river Lowther, in the primitive county of Westmoreland—no old ruin, telling at a glance in its decay the history of institutions long since gone, as the necessity for their continuance was superseded by advancing circumstances. The neighbourhood in which it stands is rich in natural beauty. Other lands can boast loftier mountains and broader lakes, mightier rivers and more noisy cataracts; yet may England claim not only fertile and richly cultured plains with harbours, rivers, and canals, bearing the wealth of every clime—but has she also spots vieing with all competitors in varied combinations of grandeur and beauty. Westmoreland and Cumberland contain valleys redolent of softness embosomed in mountains rude even to magnificence. The "English Appennines," as the mountains have been termed which, commencing in Derbyshire, stretch away north to Linlithgow, are rude and barren, with little claim to the charms of the celebrated heights whose name has been bestowed upon them; but from this chief range a branch shoots to the west, having features as picturesque as those of the parent series are dreary. The majestic and the beautiful are here blended—huge hills hit their towering heads and striking forms far above the quiet valleys lying below—gorges divide enormous masses of schist, the prevailing tints of blue and grey here and there diversified by patches of vegetation—while fells, dales, becks, and meres display themselves in a thousand varied groups. And around, scattered with no sparing hand, is the bilberry, the juniper, and the broom plant, with lichens and mosses and bright heaths, in all their splendour:—

"the gilded tuft clothing in richer green
Each speck of lawn the broken rocks between."

And far up in the hills are the quiet gems of the mountains—the Tarns—still, placid waters, reflecting the clouds by day and the stars by night—crossed now and then by the mirrored likeness of some mountain bird, as it wings its way over the tiny lake.

"There sometimes does a leaping fish
Send through the tarn a lonely cheer;
The crags repeat the raven's croak
In symphony austere."

And what, in sober prose, says Wordsworth for these valleys of his birth—these scenes of his minstrelsie?—"Yet, though clustered together, every valley has its distinct and separate character; in some instances as if they had been formed in studied contrast to each other, and in others with the united differences and resemblances of a sisterly rivalship. This concentration of interest gives to the county a decided superiority over the most attractive districts of Scotland and Wales, especially for the pedestrian traveller. In Scotland and Wales are found undoubtedly individual scenes, which, in their several kinds, cannot be excelled. But in Scotland, particularly, vast desolate and unimpressive tracts of country almost perpetually intervene; so that the traveller, when he reaches a spot deservedly of great celebrity, would find it difficult to determine how much of his pleasure is owing to excellence inherent in the landscape itself, and how much to an instantaneous recovery from an oppression left upon his spirits by the barrenness and desolation through which he has passed." And amid these valleys and mountains and streams does Wordsworth now dwell—Southey also being a dweller in the district; and together they have sung and written that which consecrates these hills and lakes to all lovers of the beautiful as a chosen spot set apart for imagination to revel in and for memory to cherish. Nor are they the only master spirits who have paid the homage of their admiration to the fells and meres of England. Mrs. Radcliffe found among them scenes congenial to her romantic though exaggerated fancy; and Gray, the profound scholar and elegant poet, lingered with pleasure amid these northern spots, after his sojourn in beautiful and classic Italy.

In Shap Abbey we have the remains of one of the ecclesiastical buildings profusely scattered over the country some four centuries since. In the old documents which recount its foundation and early history it is called Hep or Heppe, a name first given from the spot upon which it stands being once covered with brambles. The name of the fruit of the briar is in this district pronounced choup, a word which subsequently became perverted into shap; and hence, say the etymologists and county historians, the modern name of the village and of the abbey. The spot upon which the ruin stands is one well adapted for retirement and contemplation, which, doubtless, had weight with the founder of the edifice, "Thomas, the son of Cospatrick," who gave "to God and Saint Mary Magdalene a portion of his lands at Preston, that certain canons might build a mansion." The abbey rose in the reign of the first Henry, about 1119, and, once established, soon added both to its size and revenues. "John of Vetreponi" became a large benefactor—the Cliffords also, with various other pious knights, added to the funds of the establishment—and Edward Baliol, King of Scots, confirmed a grant which the monks had obtained of the church of Johnston, in Annandale. Miracles only were wanting, and these in good time came also by the transfer to the abbey, from a neighbouring grave, of the body of a saint there buried. The pious came to worship, and the abbey became renowned alike for its miracles and its wealth.

Upon the dissolution Henry VIII. gave Shap Abbey to the Wharton family, by whom it was afterwards sold to the Lowthers. At that time the buildings were very extensive; the abbey church was spacious, and built of durable freestone. Some of the offices afterwards became farm-houses, and one of these was occupied by the ancestors of Hogarth for some generations subsequent to the dissolution. Near the ruin are some remains of an old bridge; and a short distance from it is a well, which enjoys the reputation of petrifying all things subjected to its influence.

Not far from Shap are two monuments of high antiquity—remnants of manners and customs which time has left but scanty record of. The first is an area half a mile in extent, circumscribed by immense stones standing upright, and varying from eight to twelve yards asunder. It is called Karl Loirs, and is supposed by Pennant to be of Danish origin, from the fact of those invaders of our country having a custom of marking in this way the spots where their heroes who had fallen in battle were buried. The second is a circle of large stones at a spot called Gunnerkeld Bottom. They are evidently Druidical; and it requires but little effort of the imagination to see again within the sacred circle the stately crowd of British Pagans—their beards flowing over the ample folds of their white garments—and the golden sickle carried before the holy miseltoe, just severed from its parent oak.

The Gazette des Tribunaux states that great abuses having been found to exist at Constantinople from the European embassies affording protection to criminals who had sought it, and remonstrances having been made on the subject by the Turkish Government and the merchants of the city, the representatives of the European Powers have come to the resolution to deliver letters of safety to such of their countrymen as show that they have proper means of existence. All other foreigners will be liable to punishment, and to be sent out of the country.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXIV.

NEW CHURCH, WILTON PLACE, PIMLICO

The number of new churches has before supplied us with subject for remark, but we may again inform our readers that twelve months added eleven to the sum-total of ecclesiastical buildings connected with the church of England in London, and that fourteen others are in various stages of progress towards completion within and near the metropolis. One of the latter has been sketched for our present number; and as these buildings will doubtless remain for centuries the places appointed for public worship, and the scene of the most important events in the career of those settled in the various localities,—of the baptisms, the marriages, and the burials of successive generations,—we can scarcely select more appropriate subjects for occasional illustration. Another argument in favour of the delineation is the fact of these structures never having been before engraved or published,—they each are morsels of pictorial news; are illustrated novelties; and future historians of London will seek our columns for original views of churches now new, but which Time will transmute, as he transmutes all things temporal.

The neighbourhood in which this new edifice has arisen is itself most completely a creation of yesterday. A few years since and Pimlico was all fields—the "Five Fields,"—a straggling house here and there forming scattered links between London and Chelsea. Now streets, crescents, squares, and places rear their heads in all the pride of architectural proportions. Belgrave-square is unequalled in size and splendour, and the adjoining dwellings are erected in the most princely style. Indeed the district may be said to be one displaying a continued series of palazzos, such as no other capital in the world can equal in number or variety. The church in Wilton-place is one of those to which the commissioners for building new churches made a "conditional grant." It is included in their twenty-second report presented to Parliament during the last session, and ranks in a list with twenty-three others, "now (1842) in course of building." It is in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, within the parliamentary borough of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and diocese of London. The style and character of the building is Gothic, with a tower surmounted by pinnacles. It is dedicated to St. Paul, and built to accommodate 980 persons in pews, and 540 in free seats, making a total accommodation of upwards of 1500. The first stone was laid on the 4th of November, 1840, and the entire building was contracted to be finished by the 25th of the present month. The day appointed for its consecration is the 1st of May next.

JAMES WOOD'S HOUSE, GLOUCESTER.

A paragraph has been going the round of the press to the effect that the house of "old Jemmy Wood" of Gloucester was about to be pulled down. As a passing record of a curious character, whose name has frequently been before the public during the last few years, we have had it engraved for our columns, and it forms rather a picturesque specimen of an old city house. The notoriety—for it would be wrong to call it fame—of Mr. Wood arose from the immense amount of money he contrived to amass. As is usual in such cases, the most forbidding parsimony was resorted to, and many curious stories are current in the neighbourhood of the ludicrous scrapes into which "old Jemmy Wood's" miserly habits betrayed him. One may be taken as a specimen:—During one of his long walks, taken to avoid the expense of riding, he was overtaken by a heavy and obstinate storm of rain. Half wetted through, an empty hearse passed by, and "Jemmy," hailing the undertakers in charge of the funereal equipage, bargained to be taken for sixpence to a spot near Gloucester—a distance of several miles. Preliminaries arranged, the owner of nearly two millions of money introduced himself into the interior of the vehicle, and the door was closed upon the unwonted living load. Amused at the parsimony of the Gloucester banker, the men drove into the town without warning their passenger, and drew up at his door in Westgate-street. At sight of the hearse all the neighbours ran out expecting to hear that "old Jemmy" had suddenly given up the ghost, when the door was opened, and out crawled the millionaire.

Our readers will recollect the heavy law causes which arose out of the disputed will. The legal points are now, we believe, all settled, but not before one of the parties concerned in the affair had committed suicide, and an immense amount of money had been spent in costs. Sir Matthew Wood, M.P. of London, under the established will, is said to be entitled to about a third of a million sterling; while another sum, equal in amount, goes to an old clerk of the deceased banker, who recently resided, if he does not even now dwell, in the tumble-down old house above delineated. A large sum of money is to be paid to the corporation of Gloucester for the purpose of improving that ancient city.

LITERATURE.

THE WASSAIL BOWL, by ALBERT SMITH. In two volumes. Richard Bentley.

A SEASONABLE book, with a seasonable title. The "Wassail Bowl" pours forth a pleasant and exhilarating draught, not the less palatable for some of the spice of observation, and acid of good-tempered satire, which the author has mingled with it. With some of the contents the public have already been made acquainted. There may be found among them an extensive flavour of "Punch." Albert Smith is an agreeable writer, and never can be otherwise than welcome. His style is natural and easy, and there is not that straining after effects which in papers of this kind is too often perceptible. We sympathise with him in the cheerful temper in which he has looked at society, and the spirit in which he has depicted it. His acuteness has no ill-nature in it. He has thought it "better to skim over the running surface of the stream, amidst the lotus flowers and the golden-winged insects, than to dive to its earthy bed, and find nothing but sand and broken crockery in their stead." The following extracts from the "Physiology of Evening Parties" are favourable specimens of the book. The illustrations, too, are clever enough to speak for themselves:—

OOM for beauty! The belle of the evening claims our next attention: the lovely dark-eyed girl, so plainly and yet so elegantly dressed, who wears her hair in simple bands over her fair forehead, unencumbered by flower or ornament of any kind, and moves in the light of her own beauty, as the presiding goddess of the room, imparting fragrance to the enamoured air that plays around her. How many quadrilles deep she is engaged for!—how earnestly an introduction is requested!—how fortunate it is even to be her vis-à-vis!—and what a thrill of inexplicable happiness pervades our sense—what an ecstacy of admiration—what a mesmeric throb of pleasure as we take her hand in the chaine des dames! And for the waltz! these brilliant intoxicating moments, which come so rarely to brighten our dim career, are cheaply purchased by hours of unpleasantry and disappointment. And who does not associate the fairest portions of his life with the shadowy remembrance of some exquisite creature, who endowed hem, for the time, with a species of Daguerréotypic existence by the light of her presence alone, her absence forming its shadows!

We appear to be getting philosophically poetical:—we are not often taken so, and must plead in excuse the exciting cause of our present indisposition. The beauty of the ball has sometimes one uncomfortable characteristic, which her very position generates—she is an out-and-out flirt. At one party she will talk softly to you for half an hour together in the conservatory, with no other witnesses than some flower-pots, paper camellias, and a Chinese lamp; at another, she will all but cut you for a new cavalier with an imperial, which you do not wear. In the first situation, you will think evening parties the pastry of society; in the last, you will pronounce them to be very unsatisfactory amusements after all. She is, moreover, very capricious; and, having refused all invitations to waltz, on the plea of giddiness, will eventually stand up with another handsome girl, and twirl away for a quarter of an hour. Possibly this is for the express purpose of tantalizing all the young gentlemen in the room, upon the same principle that makes young ladies kiss babies so rapturously before company.

The professed flirt is not always the beauty of the room, but still sufficiently good looking to attract several pro tempore lovers. And it is remarkable what diplomatic ingenuity she puts forth in carrying on a flirtation with three or four young gentlemen at the same time. The mere shade, the very idea of a gentle pressure of the hand, as she meets you in the chain of the last figure of the Lancers, induces you to believe yourself the favoured one. But you are mistaken: she has made three or four others equally self-satisfied by the same proceeding; and just as she has half given, half allowed you to take a flower from her bouquet—which you intend to place in water when you get home to your chambers, as a romantic souvenir, and afterwards, when withered, to treasure up in your dressing-case for an indefinite period, amidst a similar collection of gages d'amour, such as old rose-leaves, old sandals, shrivelled violets, three-cornered notes (scented with that odd perfume the women are so fond of at present, which resembles a cocoa-nut oil lamp that had gone out), locks of silky and odoriferous hair, that have made the paper which envelopes them very transparent, and, perhaps, a vinaigrette or torquoise ring—you find she has offered to mark some other happy swain's handkerchief with his initials and her own hair. Wherefore you set her down as a heartless coquette, and the gentleman as a thorough muff; but you do not throw away the lily of the valley notwithstanding.

And even when she waltzes with him, and asks you to hold her delicate scarf, which resembles point lace in a consumption, you are still gratified by the honour. She is very fond of going down for refreshment; not that she stands in need of any, but it removes her from the espionnage of her chaperon; and, if there is one situation she prefers more than another, it is sitting on the staircase outside the drawing-room door, under pretence of enjoying the cool air.

The flirt has different opinions formed of her. Old mammas, with unmarriageable daughters, pronounce her "an exceedingly forward young woman." Young ladies who are a little jealous, think her "a very strange girl in her manners;" and the young gentlemen speak of her according to their temperaments and ideas of perfection as "a splendid creature," "a girl with no humbug about her," or (unfeminine yet expressive appellation), "a thorough going brick, and no mistake!"

GIOTTO AND FRANCESCA, and other Poems. By ANDREW ALEXANDER KNOX.

Although almost everybody now scribbles verses of some kind or other, there probably never was an age which gave less promise than the present of a rich harvest of poetry. The great poets who yet live cannot be said to belong to this generation; and the lyre of some, which sounded under their touch so many rich and various strains, seems mute in the degenerate hands of their successors. Wordsworth and Campbell lately struck a few notes, like the expiring echoes of some familiar melody. The new aspirants to the lays, who have of late years appeared, confine themselves to imitating the manner of those great and original writers, so many of whom sprung up in the early part of the present century, and, like all imitators, they have been more successful in copying the faults than the excellencies of their models. The age that succeeds to one of great intellectual richness is generally as much distinguished for barrenness as its predecessor for fertility; yet there have been exceptions to this rule. The times of Milton and Cowley immediately followed those of Shakspeare and Spencer; and in ancient Greece there was a permanent succession of great poets, while Greece maintained its independence. In England the voice of song has never been entirely unheard; a Cowper and a Burns were formed in what seemed to be the very deadness and rottenness of time. Perhaps, during the appointed period of a nation's greatness, the average amount of talent existing among its people is pretty nearly equal, while its peculiar direction is determined by the circumstances of the time. Should the coming age be one of stirring events, likely to rouse and animate the popular mind, and dissipate the pernicious phlegm and torpor engendered by the calm of a long peace, we may venture to anticipate that great poets will arise. Hitherto, in the number of our bards, and in the length of the period during which poetry has been successfully cultivated, no nation of Europe has at all approached us.

The volume before us gives more promise of future excellence than any we have for some time observed, and though we pretend not to be ranked among the prophets, and would not venture to predict a career of greatness from a clever beginning, we shall be disappointed if this promise is not fulfilled. Giotto and Francesca, the chief poem in the volume, in two cantos, is written in the eight-lined stanza, so great a favourite with the Italian poets, which was introduced into this country by Tennant and Frere, and employed by Byron in Don Juan, as well as several minor poems. The subject is a simple love-story of the early days of Italy, taken from Boccaccio. The incidents are few and ordinary; that which makes the turning point, and gives the tale its tragic interest, is the sudden death of Giotto in the arms of his beloved, after the lovers had by the good offices of a holy priest of Florence, who acts the part of Friar Laurence in "Romeo and Juliet," attained the summit of their happiness. The versification of the poem flows smoothly and sweetly; the chief characteristic of the style, both here and throughout the others, being a tender and reflective melancholy, relieved by the judicious and elegant employment of fancy. Mr. Knox has evidently studied our old poetry to advantage; Spencer, and among the moderns Shelley and Byron, we should be inclined to think his favourites. The following extracts will, however, convey to our readers a clearer idea of the author's manner than they could derive from any description of ours.

As when is lifted from a valley deep
The mist, in fanny vapour upwards breaking;
Or when the curtains that had veiled her sleep
Lifts some young bride from dreams of love awaking;
Or when life's fever o'er, on high we long,
One lightning glance of past existence taking;
So bursting from their dusty tombs, I see
Men, who are shadows, live once more for me.
* * * * * * *

To look out from the chamber-window where Death has been busy with the few we love,
(For of earth's millions few there are who share
The heart amongst them) and, below, above,
To see for us that earth be cold and bare,
Whilst others on their usual pleasures move;
This is, indeed, to die: they are not dead.
Am, as you see, once more amongst your mute.
Far words are not my province,—pardon me,
Though all your circle should cry—out and shame!
My notions of true pathos would, I've been told,
Had you not done with laughing, tickle you.
I could not drop the slightest apt remark
On suns and systems: my strong point is this,
I know how human mortals plague themselves.
That gadding of the earth 's of the same stamp.
As quaint as on the first day of his life.
He'll have a somewhat better time, but, sir,
You've given him that glimpse of heavenly light:—
Ha, ha! he calls it reason. Thanks to that,
He is more brutal than the brutalest beast.
Saving your highness' presence, these poor men
Appear to me like long-shanked grasshoppers,
Whose life's a flight, and in the flight a hound;
Then screak they their sharp humdrum note i' the grass.
So, lay they easy in the grass, "twere well;
But no, in every puddle goes their snout.

THE LORD.

Proceed in that, too, for as thou wilt—
Thy peers I hate not—No, of all the spirits
Who do deny my sovereign rule, by me
The waggish scoffer is the least abhorred.
The activity of man is soon relaxed,
Soon yields he to an absolute repose:
Therefore my pleasure is to send a fiend
As his companion, who, as he is a fiend,
Being ever active, spurs him to his work.
But you, ye true and innocent sons of God,
Be glad, the Beautiful is now your own
In living fulness. May the Holy Spirit
Which works and lives, and lives and works for ever,
Embrace you in affectionate bonds of love.
But fix ye with immortal thought profound,
These wavering apparitions which float round.

There are a few marks of carelessness in diction, among which is the unauthorised use of the word shivered, of which the author seems fond; ex. gr., —

Could you of him one passing glance have caught
It would have shivered your whole being through,
To see him in such majesty of youth,
High, rich in honour, and in spirit truth.

There is also a tendency to repetition, and an occasional obscurity in the expression of an idea, which is no more than might be expected from a young poet.

SIMPLE SKETCHES FROM CHURCH HISTORY FOR YOUNG PERSONS. By Mrs. TOOGOOD. 1 vol., 12mo. James Burns and Co.

This is a very useful and unpretending little volume, which we can conscientiously recommend to general use. The object is thus explained by the authoress:—"The writer of these little sketches having been for some time interested in charity-schools, has frequently during that period felt a desire to place in the hands of the senior classes some simple outline of the History of the Church, from a conviction that nothing is more likely to enforce an attachment to that church than a knowledge of the facts connected with her history; and that the instability now so prevalent among her members arises often, and particularly in the lower classes, from ignorance. The desire to supply some little information has been increased upon finding that the subject is by no means disagreeable to children, but that it is easy to interest them in it." We will only add that the subjects of the sketches are well chosen, and that the manner in which they are written is creditable to the authoress. We perceive some tincture of Puseyism, but as we avoid controversial subjects, on this head we will say nothing.

THE HISTORY AND ANTIQUITIES OF NEWBURY AND ITS ENVIRONS. Speenhamland, Hall, and Marsh. Simpkin and Marshall, London. Published in Numbers.

A work of great topographical interest, full of information on the history and antiquities of Newbury and its environs. At p. 256 will be found a detailed account of Aldermaston House, the scene of the late fire.

ON THE PRESERVATION OF THE HEALTH OF BODY AND MIND. By FORBES WINSLOW. 1 vol., 8vo., pp. 202. Henry Renshaw.

A collection of essays on medical and scientific subjects, which will be found to afford amusement to those who are fond of information conveyed in a popular and agreeable form. Why the book has been called by this title, except with the view of ensnaring the vulgar, it would be hard to say. There is much that is useful to half-informed readers, but there are several ridiculous blunders. For instance, the author gives Ac. Mag. as the abbreviation of the name of the well-known writer Olaus Magnus. (P. 75.) This cannot be a typographical error, since it occurs more than once. The author has evidently made good use of a medical student's reading, but he ought to be more careful in indicating the sources of his quotations. Thus he gives an extract at p. 79 from some medical writer, we forget whom, without indicating the name of the author or character of the work.

EXAMPLES OF RAILWAY MAKING; WHICH, ALTHOUGH NOT OF ENGLISH PRACTICE, ARE SUBMITTED, WITH PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATIONS, TO THE CIVIL ENGINEER, AND THE BRITISH AND IRISH PUBLIC. By JOHN WEALE. 1 vol., 8vo. Architectural Library, Holborn.

All persons interested in the construction of railways should have this book, which affords much information on the methods adopted in foreign countries, little if at all known in England. The portions which treat of the American and Belgian railroads are replete with matters of particular importance. It is illustrated by a number of splendid engravings.

LOVE.

Whence comes Love?
And who hath seen the dart
From his bowstring fly
To the wounded heart?
In the air, or on the earth,
Or beneath the water's foam
Where had he his birth?
Where is his home?
Like the shadow of a bird,

Passing in the air unheard—
Like reflected splendour dancing
From the wave on marble wall,
Now retreating, now advancing,
He is flitting round us all.
But if any dare to blame
Love's most sacred mighty name,
His reward be falsehood's shame.

The translation of the Prologue in Heaven, from the "Faust," is exceedingly good. In the lyrical part it is, as might be expected, far inferior to Shelley; but in the dramatic it fully sustains a comparison with him:—

MEPHISTOPHELES.

Since you, oh Lord! approach us once again
To ask us how we fare;—nor formerly
Were you displeased to see me,—therefore I Am, as you see, once more amongst your suite.
Far words are not my province,—pardon me,
Though all your circle should cry—out and shame!
My notions of true pathos would, I've been told,
Had you not done with laughing, tickle you.
I could not drop the slightest apt remark
On suns and systems: my strong point is this,
I know how human mortals plague themselves.
That gadding of the earth 's of the same stamp.
As quaint as on the first day of his life.
He'll have a somewhat better time, but, sir,
You've given him that glimpse of heavenly light:—
Ha, ha! he calls it reason. Thanks to that,
He is more brutal than the brutalest beast.

GARRICK'S HEAD AND TOWN HOTEL, Bow-street, opposite Covent-garden Theatre.—PUBLIC SPEAKING.—Those gentlemen who feel themselves overlooked in the unchanged of native modesty, and suffer embarrassment under the umbrella of fear, to attempt at public or private oratory, would do well to visit the GARRICK'S HEAD, and hear the ELOQUENCE of the far famed JUDGE and JURY SOCIETY—orators that translate through every varied theme of thought stirring eloquence and persuasive argumentation the very morals of forensic genius. Churchwardens, preachers of sirens, foresaw of juries, overseers, ecclesiastics, learned gentlemen, and all orders of men in public life, would accumulate prodigious advantages by embracing the suggestion announced. To-morrow, Monday, January 20, 1851, the Society will assemble at nine o'clock punctually, to invest into an issue of existing interest. The usual nights are on Thursday and Saturday evenings, at the same hour, to entertain cares redolent of sparkling wit and merry humour.

Our judge above upon the bench doth sit,
Blacksmith in law, and Nor ury in wit,
The counsel sage, like sparkling meteors bright,
Illume themselves, and give to us bona light!

Suppers and singing every night after the theatres. The Garrick's Head and Town Hotel is acknowledged to be the best and most economical dining-house in London, that separated from it being under the superintendence of Little Williams, formerly proprietor of the well-known Leg. Relief Beef house in the Old Bailey. In the splendid Coffee room of this establishment you may dine off cutlets, and not spend a sixpence less than One Shilling, in a style, too, equal to Long's, or even the Carendon. All the meat is supplied to this establishment by Mr G. Jeffery, of Knightsbridge, purveyor to the Queen.—Beefs, is. 6d. Vivant Regina et Principes et Reds.

PUNCH, or, THE LONDON CHARIVARI.

"The career of this little publication, from its outset till now, has been one of an ever-increasing success. Week after week it has sustained itself with astonishing constancy, and shown that its authors are inexhaustible in their resources. Ministers of Monarchs, they reign over the kingdoms of satire and burlesque with unlimited sway. There is one thing, in addition to the cleverness of 'Punch,' which has not a little contributed to its success, and that is the unerring good humour and propriety which prevail in it, and the total exclusion from its pages of all that is gross, or can be censured by even a disciplinarian as an offence of which has swung not many previous attempts of the same kind."—Times.

OUTFITS TO CHINA AND ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE.—The recent treaty with the Celestial Empire, and consequent extent of territory opened for British talent and industry, will undoubtedly tend to make a considerable increase in the demand for a speedy furnishing. Outfits will be required to no extent never before known in this country, and as much of the Emigrant's comfort depends on the style and manner in which he is provided for, a few words on that subject will not be out of place at the moment. The perpetuations are generally made in excitement, and are supplied for, which are proved more in accordance to the money the party has to expend than the value of the articles priced, and at sea leisure is afforded to peruse over articles and examine and valuations, at a time when they cannot be replaced, in fact, no article of outfit should be had or given for service, who of all stores should be supplied with for the very best. "If no reformation" has yet extensively affected this branch of business. Many flattering letters and orders continue to be received by Messrs. Moses and Son, for the outfitting of parties to Mauritius, and the Cape, and the same principle which has placed their warehouse at the head of every description at a profit not exceed ng the market interest of money, marking every article in plain figures (which they request the public to observe), making no distinction of "persons," and ensuring satisfaction by the soundness of work, quality of material, and general excellence of finish. Naval and Military Men, Merchants, Captains, and Emigrants generally, are assisted to make their selections from the Cabin Furniture, and every article of convenience and use, when they will be at once convinced "A new era" has been commenced in a saving from fifty to cent. per cent. in price, and articles supplied which will be found useful and ornamental when the voyage has terminated. Observe—E. Moses and Son, Tailors, Woollen Drapers, and General Outfitters, Wholesale and Retail, 154, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City.

IMPORTANT TO ALL.—"I can say of the Waterproof Coat I purchased of you, that I never had anything so pleasant to wear, or so safe as a protection, and therefore in every respect superior to a mackintosh, or any other waterproof that I have ever had." Such is the testimony of hundreds as to the merits of the WATERPROOF PALETOT, for moderate warmth when the weather is dry. As a medical man, and having made a study of the subject, I can fully point out what is above stated, and you are at liberty to use this as the testimony of one such and constantly exposed to the weather, as it may be useful to yourself and others." So writes Thomas Warner, surgeon, Carnarvon. The Patent PALETOT, price 21s., is BERDOE'S NEW VENTILATING WATERPROOF FROCK, and the above testimony is entirely unsolicited, nor has W. B. ever seen the party who gives it. Made only by W. Berdoe, Tailor, Waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill, right down from Birch-in-lane.

RESULT OF LITIGATION.

A Copy of a Notice served on Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., dated the 31st of December last, and signed, "White and Borrett," solicitors to the Assignees of Henry Shuttleworth, of Manchester, and circulated in a letter, signed "J. Rogers, 28, D. Terrace, Pentonville," dated the 3rd of January, 1841, having been sent to several of the customers of Kirby, Beard, and Co., by Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., in the City, by the name of "Kirby's Ne Plus Ultra Pins with perfect Solid Heads and Smooth Adamantine Points" for the purpose of intimidating them from selling such Pins, and thereby to create a belief that Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co. had no right to consummate to their customers and consumers of Pins, the result of the litigation which has taken place in the Courts of Chancery and Queen's Bench, between Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., and the said Henry Shuttleworth, and Kirby, Beard, and Co

"Manchester and Kirby, 82, Shuttleworth.

"It is mutually agreed between the assignees of Mr. Henry Shuttleworth and Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., that the assignees shall withdraw all their opposition to the application of Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., relating to 'Wright's Patent,' for making Solid Headed Pins, and that the assignees shall pay Two Hundred and Twenty five Pounds in discharge of the costs of Messrs. Kirby, Beard, and Co., dated this 15th day of December, 1841.

Kirby, Beard, and Co., Pin and Needle Makers to Her Most Excellent Majesty Queen Victoria and the Dowager Queen Adelaide, with a grateful recollection of many years' distinguished and extensive public patronage, and support, respectfully assert that the [illegible] of their customers and consumers of Pins and Needles to [illegible] have not been [illegible] by the [illegible] Any persons purchasing or vending Pins [illegible] with [illegible] Solid Heads and Smooth Adamantine Points" [illegible] as [illegible] first patent taken out for the manufacture of Solid Headed Pins. An [illegible] Engineer, on an inspection of Kirby, Beard, and Co.'s New Machinery in daily [illegible] described it—"combining the whole principal operation of the new machinery in one chosen, practically applied in its most natural construction and operations to effect uniformly the production of perfect Solid Heads to Pins with Solid Shanks." Nevertheless, the above notice to the public and true description printed on the labels and wrappers of Kirby, Beard, and Co.'s Pins, the only name by which they can be supplied and obtained, with the assurance of the words "Kirby's" and "Smooth," by a firm of Solid Headed Pin Makers, entirely calling themselves exclusive patentees, who, by such puffery and in a spirit of gross misrepresentation, have attempted to sell by such name and description, Solid Headed Pins of a second price, and consequently of a second and inferior quality.

The attention of the public and consumers being directed to this species of deception, and the previous application of the words "Ne Plus Ultra" against their obvious sense and meaning, they would readily distinguish the original and genuine article from the recent counterfeit, and London, should they wish to purchase the former, are respectfully solicited (to prevent mistakes) to ask for "Kirby's Ne Plus Ultra Pins," which, as well as Kirby, Beard, and Co.'s Pins, are [illegible] for the convenience of purchasers, in the usual manner, Kirby and Co. make up their Ne Plus Ultra Needles in a variety of Metallic Cases, each containing One Hundred of assorted metal sizes, Ass in Harness, red Morocco, red Saloon, and smooth Velvet Cases, containing Ten Papers of useful sorts and sizes, which articles One Paper of all Ass sorts and best adapted perfect Needles, express, manufactured for every description of modern and elegant Ladies' Fancy Needle work. POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXVII.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN, LL.D.

Sir Edward Sugden is one of those instances in which talents, energy, and application have lifted their possessor from the humbler ranks of life to the most exalted position. The profession of the law has furnished the most numerous examples of men who have thus "achieved greatness." The reason is evident enough; in no profession does the advantage of birth go for so little, or in which what is called influence is of so small avail. Both these may unite occasionally, and give an individual an earlier opportunity of distinguishing himself; but, if legal knowledge, and the ability to apply it, be not in him, he quickly sinks to the ordinary level. The mighty interests often intrusted to the advocate demand an entire confidence in his abilities. Hence it is that those who have inspired that confidence are overpowered with employment, while the man, perhaps, of talents scarcely inferior wears out his existence in reluctant idleness, "unknown and like esteemed." Society presents no contrast so great as the life of the briefless barrister and the popular pleader: in this branch of the profession a man must be all or nothing. And fearfully difficult are the conditions on which the envied position is obtained—a youth of unremitting study and application, and a manhood of unrelaxing labour, from which even advancing age gives no respite, till the busy scene is closed by the approach of physical infirmity. The high rank and the brilliant reputation must be purchased by soul-exhausting labour, and the princely revenue is gained by toil more grinding than that of a slave. In such a career as this is it to be wondered at that so many shrink and fail? Would it not be strange if the son of luxury and ease should persist in toiling up the rugged steep? The chances here are rather in favour of the child of poverty; he has not the enemy within himself whispering "cui bono? I have all life can give me without this drudgery;" he is steeled to endurance, and nerved to toil. Accident may assist in giving him the start, but he has prepared himself to make the utmost possible advantage out of the conjuncture of circumstances, and if he once passes a certain point success is certain and rapid. Many are the names of those who have reached the highest dignities of the law, whose lives exemplify the truth of this general sketch. To them may be added that of Sir Edward Sugden, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

Sir Edward is the son of a tradesman of the humblest class, and it may be mentioned to his honour, that he is above the weakness of seeking to conceal his origin. For some years he was employed in the office of a conveyancer, but subsequently studied for the bar, to which he was called in 1807. Among the many that are "called," he was of the few that are "chosen," for he soon distinguished himself. In the following year he published his "Treatise on Powers," a work of standard legal authority, which he subsequently enlarged. The period that followed till the year 1817 was passed in all the activity of a pleader's life; but from this year till his elevation to the bench, he devoted his intellect exclusively to practice in the Court of Chancery. His eminence in this department was most marked, and he is beyond all question the first equity lawyer of the day. In 1822 he was made King's Counsel, and in 1828 he obtained the office of Solicitor-General, which he held till 1830, when the fall of the Wellington administration deprived him of it. From this time he became almost as well known as a politician as he had been as a lawyer. He was an able and active champion of the principles of the Conservative party, and never let slip any opportunity of damaging the character of the Whigs. Brougham, then Lord Chancellor, was one of his "favourite aversions;" and the differences of the Chancery Court, there restrained by professional etiquette, broke out within the walls of Parliament. Though Brougham was in the Lords, and Sugden in the Commons, they talked at, if not to, each other, and the mutual acrimony was often rather amusing. To this era belongs the "bug" speech of Lord Brougham; for which Sugden took ample revenge in his cutting observation, that "if the Lord Chancellor only knew a little law, he would know a little of everything." On legal points it may be remarked that they were often at variance, for the depth and accuracy of Brougham's legal knowledge has been questioned; the brilliancy and extent of his intellect exclusively to practice in the Court. On Sir R. Peel's accession to power in his brief administration of 1835, Sir E. Sugden was appointed Lord Chancellor of Ireland. He had now reached one of the highest prizes of the profession; but no human advantage is unalloyed. Surgit amari aliquid. There is ever the portion of bitterness mingling in the cup of prosperity, and poisoning the relish of the draught. Some peculiar circumstances connected with the domestic life of his earlier years proved an obstacle to the reception of Lady Sugden at the Court of the Lord Lieutenant; the Chancellor resented the indignity, and threw up his office after holding it only three months. This proved of less material consequence than might have seemed probable, as the Peel ministry was shortly after broken up. The Conservatives are again in power, with a better prospect of continuance in it, and Sir Edward Sugden again fills his former office; we presume, therefore, that the matter in dispute has been arranged. His conduct as Chancellor has given the utmost satisfaction in Ireland. His sound knowledge of the law he administers ensures him the confidence of the bar; while his integrity and impartiality have gained him the respect of the people at large. He is fully alive to the abuses of the court over which he presides, and has recently issued an order for a return of the names, salaries, and duties of all the officers of the Court of Chancery. Some of them, he has not, it is said, performed any duty for upwards of twelve months, and the order, supposed to be the precursor of the abolition of some of these posts, has caused the greatest consternation.

During the time he sat in Parliament, he represented at different times Weymouth, Melcombe Regis, and St. Mawes. He was elected for Ripon in 1837. Few men have obtained eminence in the law with a more general feeling towards them on the part of the public, that their elevation is but the fit reward of the energy and ability displayed throughout their whole career.

FIRE AT GOULSTON'S MANUFACTORY, OLD KENT ROAD.

On Monday evening a most awful and destructive fire broke out in the Old Kent Road, on the extensive premises of Messrs. Rolls, floor-cloth manufacturers, near the Grand Surrey Canal-bridge. Intelligence of the conflagration was, without loss of time, sent to the engine stations for the assistance of the firemen, and in a short time a considerable number of engines and policemen had arrived. Notwithstanding the efforts of all parties, the fire continued almost uninterrupted by the comparative feeble resistance with which it met, until the whole factory, consisting of painting-rooms, drying-houses, storerooms, warehouses, and the other apartments in a floor-cloth manufactory, was consumed. Two private dwelling-houses at the side were also, despite the efforts made to prevent it, destroyed; together with property to a large amount. The fire next spread to the floor-cloth factory of Messrs. Goulston, adjoining the private houses, which, being built chiefly of wood, was soon every part in flames, and burning with great fury. In a quarter of an hour all was destroyed. The heat from the burning buildings was at this time so great that water had to be thrown on the houses opposite to prevent them from catching. The fire was at length subdued for a few moments by the falling of the roofs; but they being composed principally of beams of wood soon ignited, and were destroyed. By nine o'clock the surrounding buildings were out of danger. Messrs. Rolls were insured in the Sun, Phœnix, and several other offices. Messrs. Goulston were also insured. Mr. Rolls and Mr. Goulston were formerly in partnership, and when a dissolution took place, the latter gentleman erected a new factory near that of his former partner. The damage is roughly estimated at little short of £20,000.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Although we have to report the arrival of a very moderate supply of English wheat up to our market this week, the inquiry for even the finest qualities of that article has ruled excessively heavy, and the quotations have suffered an abatement of from 1s to 2s per quarter. In foreign wheat exceedingly little has been passing, and the rates have declined fully 1s per quarter. The value of malting barley has been maintained, and the same may be said of the best season-made malt; but all other qualities have moved a mere drug. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have had a downward tendency..

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 54s; ditto white, 54s to 59s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 40s to 97s; do. white, 54s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 22s to 28s; malting do., 28s to 31s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 26s to 28s; maize, 32s to 34s; white, 30s to 33s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 10s to 16s; beans, 26s to 26s; peas, 32s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market. Rather more business has been doing in clover seeds; but all other kinds have been in slow inquiry.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean, 45s to 48s; hemp seed, 33s to 40s per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 0d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 32l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 10c; barley, 26s 5d; oats, 16s 11d; rye, 29s 4d; beans, 27s 5d; peas, 29s 7d.

Imperial Average of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 2d; Barley, 26s 6d; Oats, 17s 2d; Rye, 29s 4d; Beans, 28s 9d; Peas, 31s 0d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 10s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Tea.—This market continues to exhibit a very buoyant appearance, and a fair demand is experienced from the trade, who mostly hold very light stocks. The lowest market price for sound common congou, cash, is is 8½d per lb.

Sugar.—We have had a decided improvement in the sugar trade this week, and, in some instances, prices have advanced fully is per cwt. Refined lumps are 74s 6d.

Coffee.—There is little doing in any kind of coffee, and the quotations are a trifle lower.

Rice.—The prices of Bengal rice are well supported, with a fair demand.

Saltpetre.—The public sales have gone off freely, at an advance of is per cwt.

Indigo.—The quarterly sales commenced on Tuesday. The catalogues contained 6310 chests. The sales have gone off slowly, yet an advance of 6d to 10d per lb. was obtained upon the quotations obtained in October last.

Tallow.—The demand for Russia tallow is dull, and prices are rather drooping. We have sellers of P. Y. C. on the spot, at 47s 3d; for forward delivery, 47s per cwt.

Provisions.—Some large sales of both Irish and foreign butter have taken place this week, and prices have advanced fully 2s per cwt. The best Friezland brings 118s to 120s per cwt. The bacon market is very dull. Prime sizeable Waterford is selling at 36s to 38s; heavy, 34s to 36s per cwt. In other kinds of provisions little is doing

Coals.—Adair's, 16s; New Tanfield, 15s; Tanfield Moor, 18s 6d; Braddyll's Hetton, 21s; Stewart's, 21s; Caradoc, 21s; Killoe, 21s per ton. Ships arrived, 34.

Oils.—This market remains firm, and full quotations are freely paid.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 2740; barley, 2220; oats, 3150; malt, 4590 quarters; flour, 3130 sacks. Irish: oats, 7950. Foreign: wheat, ——; and barley, —— quarters.

Hops.—For the best pockets we have a fair inquiry; but in other kinds little is doing. Prices are about 2s per cwt. above those noted on this day se'nnight.

Potatoes.—Owing to the large quantities of potatoes offering, the inquiry for them still rules dull, at late rates.

Smithfield.—The supplies of each kind of fat stock being more than adequate to meet the wants of the dealers, the general inquiry is slow, at the following prices:—Beef, from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 8d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The market has again ruled inactive, and prices have been with difficulty supported. Beef, from 3s 2d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 2d to 4s; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 2d; and pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d per 8lbs., by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

In commercial affairs generally the alterations which have occurred this week have attracted only in a very slight degree the attention of the public. At this season of the year trade is always without much animation, and, excepting amongst manufacturing interests, the usual fullness prevails now in all other quarters. In Manchester, and throughout the cotton manufacturing districts, it affords us the greatest satisfaction again to repeat that, in every department of industry, the labouring classes continue to be profitably employed at wages fully equal to the expenses of living, and that the demand for manufactured goods, with a view to the Chinese, Indian, and Australian markets, continues rather to increase than the contrary. This is mainly legitimate trade, and not dependent on circumstances, as in the case with our intercourse with the nations of Europe or with the United States of North America, for the returns which will be made to us by our colonies, India powers and China, in exchange for their goods, will consist of valuable articles, the produce of their climates, and not as commodities which we can produce just abundantly at home. The activity in the cotton trade is attended from necessity by a corresponding briskness in the cotton-wool markets, where large quantities continue to pass into consumption, and fortunately, in every quarter of large supplies almost daily arriving, prices of this new material do not improve in proportion to the increase, demand. At Liverpool, and throughout the woollen manufacturing towns, to describe the present condition of trade would be only to repeat what we have now said of the cotton trade, with this difference, however, that, in the raw material of wool, an appearance of active power exists; indeed, in some places this improvement has already partially taken place. Thus, the manufacturing interests are again rapidly advancing in prosperity; for even in the too long distressed town of Paisley, trade is likewise coming round, and some hundreds of workmen have been taken during the last ten or fourteen days from a state nearly bordering on starvation, and placed in a position in which they can again support themselves and their families in a certain degree of comfort, if not of actual abundance

In the value of colonial and East India produce little alteration has occurred, excepting in that of coffee, the supplies of which are large, and prices are consequently rather lower than they were last week. The sales of teas have been latterly also large, and, if there be any alteration, prices are a shade dearer. For sugar, likewise, the demand continues to be considerable, and prices have been fairly supported. The same report cannot be made of rice, indigo, opium, and of various articles the produce of the East Indies. Several vessels have been taken up by Government within these few days to proceed to the coast of Africa, and there to embark free labourers for the cultivation of our possessions in the West Indies. These immigrants must add greatly to the value of those colonies by the increase which they are likely to make in their productiveness, and, as their wages will be more than equal to their expenditure, a considerable addition to the quantity of British manufactures now consumed in them must be the necessary consequence of this increase in the number of the labourers. Under a proper system of cultivation our colonies may eventually be enabled to supply all the markets in Europe with produce, considerably cheaper than it can be drawn from any other quarter; and the experiment of inducing free labourers to reside for a time on the property of the colonists is therefore of the deepest importance, should success attend this first attempt at emigration from Africa, on the part of the British Government, to our West India possessions.

The hardware trade at Sheffield has received, in the course of this week, a rather serious check, by the unfortunate failure of an eminent banking establishment in that town. Expectations are, however, entertained that this firm may soon resume their payments; and we sincerely hope that these expectations may not be disappointed, for otherwise the trade to that neighbourhood will be put to considerable inconvenience, and the reviving activity, which has been observable latterly, more particularly in cutlery, must be in some measure interrupted, should payments ere-ain for any considerable time suspended.

Money continues very plentiful amongst all the City capitalists, and channels for its productive employment, instead of increasing with commercial improvement, appear daily to become scarcer. In the coming railroad shares this state of the money market is gradually producing favourable effects, and causing an advance in the value of several of them. The quotation for those of the London and Birmingham line has again risen, and it is now difficult to obtain scrip at a price under £21. A dividend of £6 10s. per share for the half year, however, will be paid within a fortnight hence, which, in a certain measure, no doubt, has produced the present demand for them. In the lines to Southampton, Brighton, and of the Great Western, some improvement has likewise occurred, but not to the extent of that in the Birmingham and Eastern line, already alluded to above. On the Foreign Stock Exchange, Spanish Bonds continue to be the principal object at present for speculation. The necessarily, however, still prevailing respecting the suppression in Spain of the nefarious smuggling system, through the medium of a material reduction in the rates of duty now imposed there on the introduction of British manufactures for Spanish consumption, has rather strengthened the operations of the Bears in these securities, and caused a decline in them during the week of about 5 per cent. In Mexican Bonds, also, and in those of Colombia, some speculation has occurred during the last week's prices. On the English Stock Exchange the time account was arranged in the beginning of the week, and the settlement caused no variation in prices. It was attended by only one small lame duck. On Wednesday, however, the Bears managed to frighten one of the Consols by at least ¾ per cent., founding their operations on the improbable supposition that a coolness exists between the British and French Governments respecting Spain. The King of the French, however, knows the interests of his kingdom too well to entangle himself in any difficulties with this country. The Bulls know this to be the case, and the late value of the Consols will be therefore speedily restored, and probably advanced during the progress of the market next week

THE CRIME OF ASSASSINATION.

The death of the accomplished but unfortunate secretary of the Prime Minister by the hand of an assassin has spread among the thinking ranks of the community a strong feeling of sorrow certainly, but also a shame and horror which far exceeds the expression of mere lamentation and regret. A fearful impression is beginning to prevail that the stain of assassination is fixing its indelible blackness upon the land, and that such morbid crimes as have for evermore been held as strangers to the manly spirit of our country are ulcerating society with a dreadful tendency to spread. Heaven avert from England any such calamities of wickedness as have crept in upon the more depraved periods of foreign revolutionary history, and assist us to wipe out these isolated stains which are so deep in their character, so lasting in their disgrace, and so terrible in their influences upon society and their bitter degradation of our common kind! It must not be concealed that the recurrence of brutal and infamous atrocities among a people degenerates them lost infallibly, diminishes the dread and horror with which crime is contemplated, corrupts by its familiarity, and eventually prostrates the morality and religion of the land. In France it erected deism upon its reeking altars, and laid the spirit of piety in the dust. In England, we blush to find that it has become frequent enough to excite a natural alarm among the guardians of national morals, and that public writers already seize upon it as an evil sign of the times—a calamity which they call upon the proper spirit of the people to execrate and arrest. It is with unfeigned pain that we find a fresh assassination giving cause to an English journalist for the utterance of this strong remark, "It is ours to bid the people of England remember the fearful stigma which this horrid murder has branded on the English name." This we read in the Times of Thursday, and it involves a truth which is humiliating, and will become fatal, if we do not, in the strict, severe, and honest exercise of pure and imperishable justice, punish the atrocity and wipe out the stain—look this glaring evil in the face, and wither it with the lightning-glance of unflinching retribution! We have had now, within a short period of time, five black attempts at broad-day assassination—all of the most revolting and motiveless description—all most "base, foul, and unnatural"—and three of these have been directed against the person of a beloved and virtuous Queen. The dangerous notoriety of these crimes was, in each instance, far greater than the amount of punishment inflicted; and the natural tendency of society to refuse to contemplate them in any other light than as the acts of madmen, deprived justice of the stern and dread example which she would otherwise have set up to daunt the soul of sin. We do not wish to throw the colour of a wild approval over the fearful punishment of death—God forbid!—but we do earnestly wish to check that false mercy of misconstruction which writes mad instead of bad, and is content to call that criminal a maniac who is nothing better than a fiend. It is almost putting a premium upon vice—to take from it the very colour of its wickedness, by qualifying it down into mere insanity, and insisting that the stormy gust of dark and dreadful atrocity, which ravages with murder and sweeps away the house of life, is but the wild gale of desolation which has been wakened amid the chaos of the madman's heart and brain. The recent attempts at assassination, we lament to say, seem almost traceable to the old revolutionary principle—some of them were directed at a Sovereign—and there seems little doubt that this last was intended for a Minister. It seems impossible to find a motive for attacking an amiable private gentleman who held no prominency in public affairs; but the motive against the minister would be hardly less palpable than infamous; and the murderer of Mr. Drummond has said in his examination that he was driven to it by "the Tories." This is a sort of feeling which justice demands should not be hastily set down as madness, or we shall never be able to crush the horrible advances of morbid crime. The public will look with absorbing interest to the approaching trial; and, whatever may be its results, they should be weighed with reflective gravity by the community.

We are content that the wretched man should abide the ordeal of his country's laws, and mercy forfend that we should demand vengeance instead of justice when he is tried! If he be really mad—if reason is shut out from his brain—if his heart is blind—his mind sadly and hopelessly incoherent, irresponsible, and void of thought—his soul darkened and prostrate under an Almighty affliction—it is not for man to dole forth retribution unto such as him. Pity, more than punishment, may be laid at his door. But if he prove a gloomy-hearted criminal, and has done this murder as a foul and black assassin—although endued with sense and reason like other men—shall we get up the false cry of insanity to stay the arm of Justice—the sword of God? Shall we set up another landmark of crime, and let this morbid spirit of unnatural wickedness creep into the heart of the community, and sully the pure and manly character of the English name? We trust this bitterness of degradation may never pass; we hope to find the proper spirits of reason and virtue exercising their legitimate influences upon the people—the monstrosity of assassination for ever expunged from the catalogue of English crimes.

With regard to the fact of death having enshed to Mr. Drummond, we cannot close this paper without expressing, in common with all who knew him, the most sincere and sorrowful regret. The respected gentlemen had the reputation of living without an enemy, an useful public servant, an exemplary private friend, and, in paying tribute to his memory, we have a melancholy pleasure in quoting from a contemporary a brief epitome of his career:—

"His career, thus prematurely and lamentably closed, has not been a useless or unhonoured one. Having entered into the service of the State as a clerk of the Treasury at an early age, his assiduity, fidelity, and good-humour introduced him to the more immediate patronage of the minister of the day. As private secretary to the present Earl of Ripon when Chancellor of the Exchequer, he displayed those qualifications which recommended him successively to the notice of Mr Canning, the Duke of Wellington, and Sir R. Peel. Under these statesmen it was his lot to discharge, for nearly twenty years, duties which are only inferior to those of a Cabinet Minister, because they are less conspicuous, but the faithful discharge of which can alone alleviate the anxieties and mitigate the asperities of official station. As there is no connexion so close as that which binds the English statesman to his secretary—a connexion unknown and unappreciated in foreign courts—so, perhaps, there is no grief so profound as that which an English statesman feels for the loss of him in whose person the qualities of friend and partisan have been harmoniously blended—who has been the associate of his public counsels, the confidant of his public cares, and the cheerful companion of his private life.

"Happen, therefore, when it might, the death of Mr. Drummond could not but be widely lamented. The man whose qualifications for public duties were prized by Canning and Wellington, whilst the charm of his personal intercourse was no less valued in private circles, could not have passed away for ever, without the deep and earnest regret of those to whom he was known, either as an intimate friend or as a public servant. But how bitter is the sting added to the poignancy of ordinary sorrow by a death so sudden and so awful."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Letters and journals from the Cape of Good Hope of the 20th of November have reached us, the contents of which are important, and afford satisfactory proof of the propriety of the measure recently adopted by government, of adding another Queen's regiment to the British force in that colony. The contents disclose the rebellious intentions of the Boers, and exhibit the designs they entertain of enlisting the native tribes in their cause. Several chiefs have, it appears, consented, either covertly or openly, to join them.

"In this condition of the colony we think we cannot better consult the entertainment of our readers than by presenting them with the above view of Cape Town.

"In consequence of intelligence which had been received on the 28th of October, at Allman's Drift, on the east bank of the Orange River, that 600 armed Boers had collected for the purpose of erecting a beacon, and declaring the territory from that spot to Port Natal the property of the Volksraad and the emigrant Boers, and driving from the land all who would not sign an oath of allegiance to their cause, Mr. Justice Menzies repaired to the spot accompanied by several clergymen, Dutch and English, where her Majesty's flag having been planted he explained to them the responsibility they would incur by the conduct they were pursuing. In the course of his address, which was of the most pacific character, he explained to them the fallacy of the supposition that the King of Holland would countenance their rebellion, and expostulated with them mildly but firmly on their breach of faith, in thus repudiating the treaty which had been entered into with them by Col. Cloete, threatening them with the most calamitous consequences if they persisted in their rebellious demands. Nothing could exceed the courage, temper, and discretion exhibited by Judge Menzies in the emergency. Such qualities are rarely thrown away, and proved importantly useful on this occasion; the Boers were induced to disperse for the present, and the necessity for bloodshed averted. It is clear, however, that nothing short of a considerable addition to our military strength at the Cape, and a conciliatory course towards the native tribes, can preserve the colony from the horrors of a civil war, which it will require a larger body of troops than we can afford for its service to suppress.

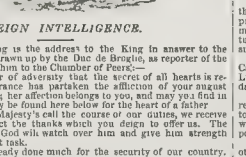
Cape Town, the capital of Southern Africa, and the most important European settlement on the continent, is built on Table Bay, at the foot of the majestic Table Mountain, rising 3582 feet above the sea, and flanked with the Devil's Hill, 3515 feet high, and the Lion's Head, 2160 feet; the triple summit forming a most conspicuous object from the sea. Table Bay affords an abundant supply of excellent water, and will contain any number of vessels; but from May to September they are subject to severe gales. A pier, 600 feet long, has been built in the Bay; and a break-water, like that at Plymouth, is proposed.

Cape Town being the only good place of refreshment for vessels between Europe and America on one side, the East Indies, China, and Australia on the other, must always be a great commercial thoroughfare. The town extends about a mile and a quarter along the shore of the bay, and contains about 20,000 inhabitants. The streets are straight and broad, and the roads macadamised. The houses are flat-roofed and low, in consequence of the violent winds; many are fronted by terraces shaded by fir-trees; the oldest houses are Dutch-built; there are very few chimneys, so that the town has a most un-English appearance. There were lately four Protestant churches and a Roman Catholic chapel. Among the other public buildings are the castle, a pentagonal building, occupied by troops; the barracks; Exchange-room and public library on the Grand Parade; the Governor's house, and a small range of buildings; the Bank, Post-office, and Courts of Justice, the latter under the presidency of a chief justice and two puisne judges; there are besides a magistrates' court and police-office, a gaol, and house of correction. But the finest building is the observatory, about three miles from town, lately erected at an expense of £30,000. Here Sir John Herschel has executed a minute astronomical survey of the southern hemisphere; his return from which, in 1839, was celebrated in London by the presentation of a magnificent silver vase to the distinguished astronomer.

Cape Town presents an animated appearance: the variety of nations, and the numerous complexions of the people, are very striking; the fat-faced Dutchman, the tall Caffre, the Hottentots, and Malays, and Negroes, with half-castes of every intermediate tint between black and white; with the fair English settler and the troops of the garrison. There are two newspapers printed in the town, in English and Dutch, and two almanacks. The population of Cape Town is about 20,000.

The other places in the colony are mostly villages. Of these Graaf Reynet, with a multi-coloured population of 2000, and about 300 neat and even elegant brick houses, in streets planted with orange and lemon trees; Graaf Reynet, on the Great Fish River, are the village of Cradock, with new Scotch locations or settlements, on the Caffree frontier—a good country. Lower down towards the coast, and between the Fish River and Algoa Bay, is Graham's Town, the capital of the Albany district, with about 2500 inhabitants, chiefly English: it is the chief place in the east part of the colony, and the head-quarters of the military on the Caffree frontier. It is described by Mr. Rose as "a large, ugly, ill-bu lt, straggling place, containing a strange admixture of lounging officers, idle tradesmen, drunken soldiers, and still more drunken settlers." It is most romantically situated in a deep valley, surrounded by hills and glens. Batuweet is another settlement near the mouth of the Kowie River.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The following is the address to the King in answer to the speech from the throne, drawn up by the Duc de Broglie, as reporter of the commission, and read by him to the Chamber of Peers:—

"Sire—It is in the hour of adversity that the majesty of all hearts is revealed. The whole of France has partaken the affliction of your august house; your grief is hers; her affection belongs to you, and may you find in it such consolation as may be found here below for the heart of a father

"In resuming at your Majesty's call the course or our duties, we receive with gratitude and respect the thanks which you deign to offer us. The King may rely upon us; God will watch over him and give him strength and time to fulfil his great task.

"Yes, Sire, we have already done much for the security of our country. The monarchy has received new strength by the blow that it sustained; the Conservative principle of hereditary succession rules and governs the chances of the future, and confidence is in every heart.

"The increase of the public revenue follows upon the progress of the nations. wealth. Thanks to the vigilance of the Government, the ascendancy which the law has obtained dispenses with the necessity for a frequent appeal to its severity. This is your work, Sire; it has been for us to concur in it; and we beg to congratulate your Majesty and ourselves.

"Your Majesty is satisfied with your relations with foreign powers. In concert with your allies you watch over the tranquility of the East. The Ottoman Empire has always a right to your solicitude; they never claimed in vain the protection of France. We rejoice to learn what has been done for their last and holy cause; they will long retain the recollection of this new benefit.

"We have not seen without grief the disorders of which Spain has just been the theatre. A stranger to the strife of parties in that kingdom, the French Government has always respected the independence of the Spanish people; in offering an available asylum for misfortune it has fulfilled the duties of humanity. To continue to the Queen Isabella a faithful friendship, to reconciliate the preservation of her own dignity, of our legitimate interests, with the regard due to an allied nation—such is the policy of your Majesty, and it is worthy of your wisdom.

"Sire—You have just seen the progress of our agriculture, our industry, of our commerce; you seek for them in every quarter new openings. It is to secure to the French flag a fixed station, a harbour of refuge in those seas hitherto too little frequented by our marine, that you have taken possession of the Marquesas Islands. This establishment offers advantages of which time will prove the importance. If the negotiation opened by your Majesty, with the same views, meet with the success which we hope for—if there result therefrom treaties and commercial negotiations we will attentively examine the influence which these conventions may exercise upon the employment and direction of national labour. In the measures for the modification of the Legislature under which our industry has hitherto prospered, we recommend to the prudence of your Government the respect which is due to existing interests. We rejoice at the success of our arms in Algiers, and at the bravery of our soldiers. When the rule of France shall be completely established in that country, civilisation will gradually be developed, and order and justice will consolidate our empire. The Chamber of Peers will attentively study the law of finance and the several projects of law which may be communicated to it. The Chamber sees with regret that it has not been possible to re-establish the equilibrium between the receipts and expenditure. This state of things should become the object of serious attention

"Sire—The world is at peace. France is free and our country is in a state of prosperity. It only remains for us to guarantee, by wisdom and perseverance, the repose which we enjoy. We will undertake this work with you; we will assist you in its completion. It is a happiness which futurity has still in reserve for you."

In the discussion which ensued on the reading of this document (and with which the Paris journals of Sunday and Monday are entirely occupied) MM. Segur Lamoighon and Camille Perier expressed themselves most opposed to the treaties of 1831 and 1833, but admitted at the same time that these treaties were binding on the French Government. Notice had been given of three amendments, each of which would of course involve an ovation by its proposer, besides those that must be made by his political partisans. The amendment announced by the Prince de la Moskwa is as follows:—"We hope that your Majesty's wisdom will take into consideration the opinion that has been manifested in relation to the right of search established by the treaties of 1831 and 1833;" and the Marquis de Turgot will move to this effect:—"These satisfactory relations (with foreign powers) would have been still more firmly secured if a new examination of the treaties of 1831 and 1833 could have led to the removal of the inconveniences that the execution of them has appeared to involve."

It will be observed that in none of these amendments is there a distinct suggestion to annul the treaties, though an obscure allusion to such a course may possibly be just traceable in that of the Prince de la Moskwa. We are induced to think it not improbable that all may be negatived, and, in that case, nothing more remain but that the address drawn up by the Duc de Broglie should be adopted, which would be a clear triumph to the French Cabinet.

M. Guizot delivered an able speech in the Chamber of Peers on Saturday, notwithstanding that he was suffering severely from cold.

The commission on the address in the Chamber of Deputies had requested the reporter to draw up a paragraph on the right of search, and submit it to them for discussion. It was generally expected that this paragraph would be of a violent character, and that it would be met by a decided amendment

Count De Ratti-Menton, says the Constitutionnel, has been named consul at Canton. He is to set out in a short time, charged to draw up a work on the commercial relations that France may have in future with the Chinese empire.

The debate on the address in the Chamber of Peers was resumed on Monday. Several peers having spoken, M. Guizot at length entered the tribune, and delivered an explanative and equent speech, which was not concluded when the post left Paris. The last words heard by the reporter were:—"I wish particularly to impress upon the house that these violent clamours not unfrequently lead to insurmountable difficulties. Let us not, then, hurry into the negotiations that have been spoken of; because, in the present excitement of the public mind, negotiation must either terminate in weakness or in folly. For my own part I will assist myself to the utmost of my power to the other."

The adjourned debate in the Chamber of Peers was resumed on Tuesday on the third paragraph of the address, in reply to the speech from the throne, when after an eloquent speech from the Duc de Broglie, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 31, there being only 67 for, and 118 against. Another amendment was subsequently negatived without a division, and when the reporter left the remaining paragraph of the address were under discussion.

SPAIN.—We learn by Madrid papers and correspondence to the 15th inst. that the Government had strengthened the garrison of Madrid. As no immediate cause for this step is mentioned, the presumption is that it is thought advisable by the ministry in case of tumult at the elections.

The contribution at Barcelona proceeded so slowly that the Captain-General had ordered the Ayuntamiento to asse a stringent proclamation on the subject. In the two days preceding the 14th only seven persons had paid their quota, and the aggregate amount among the seven was no more than 11,420 reals, eight maravedis. General Seoane had threatened to quicken the payments by quartering 2000 men on those who continued in arrear.

The trial of the editor of the Heraldo had terminated in his acquittal by a large majority; the only fact, it seems, that of the Sol a few days ago. It was considered very doubtful if a jury could be found to convict the conductor of a public journal.

The Sol states positively that the commercial treaty was signed on the 12th, at the inspection of the National Militia, by Mr. Aston and Count Almadovar, after a number of conferences between M. Gonzales Infantes, an English officer, the particular friend of Mr. Aston, and various other select subjects; but the Patriota denies the truth of the Sol's article, as well as the conversations of foreign diplomatists, and the breaking up of the Rodil cabinet. On the eve of the election such a change is scarcely possible; but the fear of the treaty of commerce is so great as to make the Opposition imagine all sorts of strong combinations, well knowing the Government cannot go on without an extraordinary supply of money, which cannot be secured from any other source

LEVANT MAIL.—SYRIA.—Our advices are from Beyrout, the 12th Dec., on which day the Sardinian steamer Trigio left for Alexandria, and to the 8th, by her Majesty's steam-frigate Devastation.

Omar Pacha has succeeded finally in getting down from the mountains, after two hard-won fights with the Druses. He had not, however, got beyond Sidon ere he was compelled to fight again, and this, which took place on the 5th of December, and lasted some two hours only, terminated in his favour, with a loss of about 300 men on both sides.

The Pacha of St. Jean d'Acre, Reschid Pacha, had gone to the assistance of Omar Pacha at Sidon. Our correspondent says that there the two chief's quarrelled, and that Reschid named Omar to St. Jean d'Acre. We give this as we had it, but doubt its correctness, inasmuch as we think that the Pacha of St. Jean d'Acre has no power to exile Omar Pacha, who was also about to proceed to Constantinople.

A Pacha had reached Arfa, on his way to Damascus.

The mountain is now quiet, in consequence of the news brought by the Devastation of the new relations of the Sultan. It is not known who will be appointed. Reschid Pacha (of Acre) is spoken of, in which case there will (and in any case there must) be quarrels and dissensions.

There has been a large concourse of Druses at Beyrout, in which the subject of discussion was whether or not an amnesty should be granted to the Christians, and which the different consuls were, of course, anxious to obtain. The discussions ended in the council sending to Omar Pacha a resolution not to grant the said amnesty. The news, politically speaking, is nothing. The principal officers of the different Pachas are quite ignorant of what is going on. All is kept closely secret from the world.

CORFU, Dec. 21.—Mr. Stuart M'Kenzie reached Corfu on the morning of the 18th inst, after a voyage of ten days from Malta. He anded quite proudly, announcing that he had resigned his post of Lord High Commissioner, but he had obtained permission of the secretary of State to return to Corfu and assume the functions of L. H. C. provisionally until his successor should arrive."

UNITED STATES AND CANADA.—The Cambridge New York packet-ship, Captain Barstow, which sailed on the 3rd inst. from that city, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday morning. We have received by her papers to the day of her sailing, but their contents are not important.

The President had sent a communication to the House of Representatives, recommending negotiations to be entered into with the Chinese government, to secure for the commerce of the United States the same advantages as would be enjoyed by Great Britain by the ceding of the four ports and the possession of Hong-Kong. It was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The inquiry into the mutiny and execution of Midshipman Spencer and others on board the brig Somers was proceeded with on the 31st of Dec., and then adjourned to the 3rd of January, the 2nd being a holiday. No new facts of importance were elicited.

The reports of the health of Sir C. Bagot are, we are glad to learn, more favourable, and hopes of his recovery are entertained.

Business at New York was improving, chiefly owing to the season employing most of the mercantile firms and banks in balancing the last year's transactions.

SOUTH AMERICA. Letters from San Juan Baptista, in Tobasco, speak in lamentable terms of a disastrous inundation which has overspread nearly the whole country, carrying off immense quantities of live stock, and producing a famine in the district. The inhabitants of Tobasco have petitioned Government for relief. By the way of Mazatlan, news has been again received from the Marquesas Islands, to the effect that a fresco had arisen between the people of the island of Nukahiva, French property, and the governor, an officer, and several soldiers were killed. The English barque Charles Hyde, 63 days from Liverpool, bound to Vera Cruz, with a cargo valued at 100,000 dollars, went ashore on the bar of that port, and became a total loss. 15,000 dollars' worth of the cargo was saved in a damaged state, but the vessel remains a total loss, though fully covered to the owners by insurance. The officers and crew were rescued.

THE INDIA MAIL.—The Victoria steamer left Bombay Dec. 7, arrived at Suez Dec. 20, SIX P.M.; mails reached Alexandria Dec. 21, TEN A.M. Great Liverpool left Alexandria Dec. 21, TEN A.M., and arrived at Malta Dec 26, seven A.M. The Great Liverpool, which left Malta on the 15th, did not reach Alexandria till the 20th, at ten A.M., having encountered bad weather the whole of the way. The mails were despatched on the same day to Suez, at five P.M.

WEST INDIES.—The West India steam-ship Trent, Captain Boxer, arrived at Falmouth on Sunday afternoon from St. Thomas, Dec. 26; Bermuda, Jan. 3; from Fayal, on the 18th. Freight estimated at 50 000 dollars, and about 180 serons of cochineal and indigo. Passengers—Lieut. Long, R. N.; major Hay, 92nd Highlanders; Mr. Tetley, from Porto Rico; Mr. and Mrs. Williams, Mr. West, and Mr. Kermonde, from Jamaica; Messrs. Mitchell, Morrison, M'Donald, and Page, from Havanna; and Mr. Groves, from Fayal.

Admiral Sir Charles Adam, in the Illustrious, with the Orestes and Hornet, were at Bermuda.

All expectations of the safety of the Victor had vanished, which adds to the poignant feeling of the relatives of the crew, until another steamer arrives bringing letters from Vera Cruz.

The following is a summary of Jamaica news from our advices and files of papers:

A vice-admiralty court had been held in Spanish Town for the trial of an individual who had kidnapped a boy in that island, and sold him into slavery in Cuba, where he remained suffering all the ills attendant upon that condition for ten years. The accused was found guilty, and adjudged to two years' imprisonment.

The House of Assembly had voted the sum of 3000 guineas towards the erection of a marble statue of Sir Charles Metcalfe, to be placed in the square in Spanish Town.

We regret to say that the arrangements in respect to the Royal Mail Steam Company's vessels are by no means regular, a circumstance much to be lamented, as it would appear, from Mr. M'Queen's letter, that the rules and regulations were good, but abused by those who had to carry them out.

The island is tolerably healthy. It had been visited during the past month with severe storms of thunder and lightning, accompanied with heavy rain, a circumstance of very unusual occurrence at this time of the year.

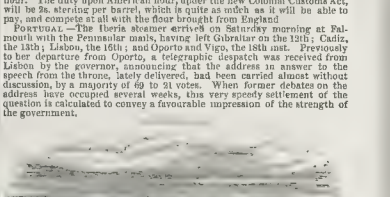
It is understood that the House of Assembly was to have been prorogued on the 16th December, in consequence of the Stamp Act having been (in effect) thrown out by their honours of the council.

We have before us "a sketch of the island revenue for the year 1843, with the estimated contingencies for the same year." The island expenditure is put down at £108,297; and in this amount we observe is included "the tax on hereditaments," estimated annual value, £21,000

ANTIGUA.—We regret to state that yellow fever still raged at Antigua to a melancholy extent. Oswald Wood, Esq., provost-marshal general, his wife, and mother-in-law (who had not returned from England more than seven months), were taken off in the short space of twenty days

DEMERARA. Among the acts passed at the late session of Parliament there is one which will have the effect to defeat the tax now imposed upon flour. The duty upon American flour, under the new Colonial Customs Act, will be 2s. sterling per barrel, which is quite as much as it will be able to pay, and compete at all with the flour brought from England

PORTUGAL.—The Iberia steamer arrived on Saturday morning at Falmouth with the Peninsular mails, having left Gibraltar on the 12th; Cadiz, the 13th; Lisbon, the 16th; and Oporto and Vigo, the 18th inst. Previously to her departure from Oporto, a telegraphic despatch was received from Lisbon by the governor, announcing that the address in answer to the speech from the throne, lately delivered, had been carried almost without discussion, by a majority of 69 to 21 votes. When former debates on the address have occupied several weeks, this very speedy settlement of the question is calculated to convey a favourable impression of the strength of the government.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SATURDAY.—Colonel Drummond, groom in waiting on her Majesty, left the castle for town late on Friday night, immediately the intelligence was conveyed to him of the attempted assassination of his brother

SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the whole of the court, attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle. The Rev. Isaac Gossett officiated. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the whole of their suite, walked out on the terrace and in the royal grounds. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the parish church. The Rev. S. Hawtrey officiated

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their accustomed walking exercise; and his Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Colonel Bouverie. Colonel Drummond left in the morning for town, with the intention of returning to the castle to dinner; but at six o'clock a messenger arrived at the castle with the intelligence that his brother, Mr. E. Drummond, was much worse (the symptoms having taken an unfavourable change), and that the gallant Colonel, in consequence, would not return to the castle that night. The following personages arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty:—The Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, the Marquis of Douglas, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, and Lady Clementina Villiers. The royal dinner party included the following personages. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, Lady C. Villiers, the Viscountess Canning, Lady C. Howard, the Earl of Morton, the Marquis of Douglas, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, Colonel Bouverie, Major-General Wemyss, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.

TUESDAY.—The same routine was observed by her Majesty and his Royal Highness as on the previous day. The Duchess of Norfolk returned to the castle by rail to resume her duties as lady in waiting on her Majesty, his Grace the Duke of Norfolk having in a great measure recovered from a severe attack of catarrh. Intelligence was received at the castle that Mr. Drummond was no better. The report in the afternoon was equally unfavourable. The royal dinner-party included the following personages: The Duchess of Norfolk, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Lister, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, Lady Clementina Villiers, Lord Morton, Colonel Bouverie, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius. It being now understood that her Majesty will not open Parliament in person, the chapel-royal of the court from Wednesday next consequently be deferred for several weeks beyond the time previously spoken of.

WEDNESDAY.—This morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took exercise on horseback—the usual afternoon ride. The intelligence of the death of Mr. E. Drummond arrived at the castle at noon. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady F. Howard, Lord Wrothesley Russel, Lord Anson, and Mr. J. Wortley, and the Hon. Mr. Anson joined the royal dinner party.

The following excellent observations from the Morning Post, on a subject deeply interesting to the nation at large, will be found well worthy the perusal of those to whom the whole people is entrusted, as leaders of ton, the ruin or prosperity of the metropolitan tradesmen:—"The approach of that event which is destined to add to the happiness of her Majesty, and in which we so deeply sympathise, unfortunately will for a time deprive more and more her loyal subjects of the openness of beholding our beloved Sovereign. We have now to announce that, up to the present time, her Majesty's opening Parliament in person is deemed in the highest degree improbable by the great official and court functionaries, and none of the usual preparations are made for this solemnity. The greatest anxiety still prevails amongst the many thousand industrious men whose livelihood depends on the vending of articles of luxury during the busy three months of the season, which forms the sole harvest time of West-end tradesmen in this great metropolis. We were too happy on a former occasion to accredit the rumour prevailing in the fashionable circles, that a Parliament would be dissolved, at a future period, to dispense, in concert with the Royal Consort, the hospitalities of the court, and to hold those drawing-rooms which are the chief attraction of the metropolis. Although this rumour, which has been contradicted as regards the illustrious lady, we cannot for a moment doubt that the Sovereign will delegate this onerous duty to some fit representative. Her Majesty, during the past season, testified the sincerity of her benefit our industrious and hard-working subjects in a manner which excited in the hearts of her people unbounded admiration and gratitude. The sufferings of trade since then have increased; the coming season has been the chief hope; and the privation of the habitual stimulus to its commercial movements would be consequently injurious in a tenfold degree. We, therefore, once more repeat that we are full of confidence that the duty which many of our ever-gracious Sovereign towards those whose heart-felt wishes and constant prayers will attend her Majesty during the interesting period of her secession from public life."

Lord Courtenay, the eldest son of the Earl of Devon, will, it is reported, move the address in the House of Commons.

The Brussels Gazette states that Duke Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg will come to Paris in February with his son Augustus, the bridegroom elect of the Princess Clementine, and his younger son Leopold. The Prince and Princess Frederick of Prussia will visit Paris also in 1843, when the palace, which is to be erected for them in Vienna, will be ready for their reception.

Lord Lyndoch, although in his 95th year, is remarkably hale and vigorous. His bitter friend bell, which rung on the 18th inst. his campaigning time, still accompanies him in his visits wherever he goes.

The Marquis of Abercorn is making vast improvements at his Irish residence, Brown's Court, near Strabane. Five hundred workmen are now employed in the edifice and the grounds, where they will be occupied for six months. All these preparations are making for the reception of her Majesty, who is expected early in the summer.

ENGLISH MOVEMENTS IN PARIS.—The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby were to leave Meurice's on Saturday last, for Italy. The Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury purpose staying at Hôtel Bristol, Place Vendôme, until March, when they depart, on their return to this country. Lady Elizabeth Fielding and Miss Fielding have arrived, and are staying with the Earl and Countess of Mount Edgcumbe. The Dowager Countess of Sandwich, Lady W. Bentinck, Earl and Countess of Tankerville, Lord and Lady Ernest Bruce, Sir R. and Lady Palmer, Lord Foley and Hon. Miss Foley, Sir Massey Stanley, Lord and Lady James Hay and the Hon. Miss Hay, Colonel and Lady Alice Peel, Lady Trotter and Miss Coutts, Sir P. Ryall, Lady Tyrwhitt, &c. Lord Brougham was to leave Meurice's on Monday last. Lord Foley and the Hon. Miss Foley will not prolong their sojourn in the capital beyond a fortnight.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager continues in excellent health and spirits, and most frequently enjoyed carriage airings. The benevolence and regard of her Majesty for the interests of religion are so well known that the insertion of the following donations will not create any surprise:—The illustrious Queen Dowager has recently given £50 for the erection of a new church at Halstead; £25 for ditto at Oldham, and schools connected; £25 for ditto of Trap-ton church; £25 for ditto at St. Andrew's, Newcastle; £25 for ditto at Falmouth; £20 for the restoration of Bukewell Church; £20 for the restoration of the Round Church, Cambridge; £20 towards building a new church at Radipole, Dorset; £10 to the fund for the erection of Trinity Chapel, Knackersknowle. It is the general expectation that the Queen Dowager and court will leave for Marlborough House at the close of the ensuing month, or early in March, and will remain in town two or three months, and then pass the summer at Bushy.

Sir George Cockburn.—It is with deep regret that we learn, at the moment of going to press, that the condition of Sir George Cockburn has undergone no improvement. He still lies in a very precarious state, it being impossible to stop the hemorrhage from the lungs altogether. But slender hopes are, we are sorry to say, entertained of his recovery. The bulletin published on Thursday morning by Sir George's medical attendants was as follows:—"Sir George Cockburn has passed a good night, has less cough, with a manifest improvement of all the symptoms. Alexander Nesbit, M.D., Reynolds Jackson, M.R.C.S. Admiralty, 26th of Jan., 1848."

COVENT GARDEN.

Mothers and Daughters. A Comedy in Five Acts. By Robert Bell, Esq.

Two characters are frequently seen in the domestic circle, deserving of our warmest sympathies. The "Governess" and the "Companion" are of the oppressed in the social system—often the most oppressed; but of these two positions that of the dependant is the most to be pitied, for she is of gentle blood, and has not been prepared, perhaps, like the brought-up governess, to bear with the cool and studied contempt of "Mothers and Daughters." Mabel Trevor, admitted as the dependant in the Manifold family, has to submit to the insolence of Lady Manifold, a widow of rank and fortune, and to the caprices of her only daughter, Emily Manifold. The mother is an indefatigable intriguer, and a first-rate matrimonial "manœuvrer." Having made a runaway match herself, her anxiety is to accomplish the marriage of her child without the slightest regard to her feelings and wishes. It is perfectly immaterial whether the intended be young or old; his claims to her favour are rank and fortune—actual or prospective. Lady Manifold, whilst thus engaged as the match-making mother, has also an eye to re-enter the matrimonial state herself. With this double object, she fixes on four of her acquaintances to carry out her plan. Lord Merlin is her principal game. His lordship, for the short period of his life, had been a staid, sedate, studious commoner, and a bachelor withal. By an unexpected mortality in his family he acquires a peerage, with a large fortune, and suddenly changes his comparatively hermit's cell for the brilliant career of a man of fashion: not from any affection for a life of frivolity and luxurious ease, but from his natural anxiety to superintend the future prospects of his nephew, Mr. Sandford, whom he proposes to leave the heir of his vast estates. Lord Merlin is a shrewd observer, and has a keen perception of all that is passing around him. If he permits himself to be robbed by his rascally valet Loop, his lordship trusts to the sterling honesty of his old servant Blount, to prevent the mischief from going too far. He is desirous that Sandford, or Bob, as he calls his nephew, should see life in all its phases, but he is peculiarly sensitive as to the alliance which Bob may form; and the latter, having a strong impression that this is a sore point with his uncle, is frank on all subjects save the essential one. Sandford, therefore, is the secondary game to be brought down by the ambitious Lady Manifold. Her third bird is Sir Gregory Plump, a hearty old cock, an old and tried friend of Lord Merlin, and an admirer both of Lady Manifold and her fortune. The fourth instrument of the artful and specious mother is a half-pay captain—half adventurer, as well—living on 3s. 4d. per day, named Swinford Hastings Montague. He, however, is considered by the worldly mamma as a mere useful hanger on, whom she can play off against the peer, just as she sets off the dependant against the daughter. And here is the melancholy illustration of a domestic drama. The daughter is drilled to have the air of an ingénue. Her language is naïve, and she seems to be totally innocent of worldly wiles. In point of fact, however, she is artful as well as silly; heartless, except for self; and thoroughly disposed to act against her mother's schemes, and choose a cara sposo for herself. She has for Abigail the worthless and novel-reading Rose, who aids and abets her weak and inconsistent young mistress in the thwarting of the mother. By a curious coincidence, Lady Manifold selects the captain, who is the lover of her daughter, to entrap the peer; and the dependant, whom she had engaged as the foil for her daughter, defeats her plans—Sandford, despite of her quiet, unobtrusive manner, having fallen desperately in love with the neglected Mabel. The orphan dependant glides into the drawing-room unseen and unobserved; the most obscure seat is chosen; and, if a wandering eye recognises, in the pale visage and wasted form, some object to claim the heart, quickly is the sympathetic inquirer checked by the cold and calculating mother, that she, the dependant, is only a companion to her daughter—that she has been picked up, poor thing, from mere charity—that Emily was so kind-hearted that she would have the orphan as her friend, although she (the orphan) had little mind and less accomplishments, and was always moping. Is it then to be wondered that Mabel listens to the first kind word that catches her ear, and, when that kind word emanates from a young, frank, and generous man, that she quickly responds affirmatively to the ardent assurances of eternal affection from Sandford? Her dream is of brief duration. A scene with his uncle makes Sandford believe that he will be disinherited if he prosecutes his suit with Mabel. Madly he communicates to her the impossibility of the marriage, coupling it with some indirect allusion to the dishonourable alternative of existing with Mabel. Here the pure and beautiful sentiments of the dependant break forth with admirable truth and force. Her proud spirit, confined as it had been by long persecution, comes out with electrifying effect. She spurns the proposal and the proposer, and more than this, when she receives a letter from Sandford after she had rejected him for ever, she seeks an interview with the peer, and she tells her touching tale. She begins by describing the unfortunate career of her mother, who had made a stolen and bad match, who died in poverty and obscurity. She depicts her situation in the Manifold family; having no menial offices to perform it is true, she is treated worse than a menial. She dilates on the first expressions of sympathy which she receives. She admits her credulity in believing declarations of fidelity. She burns with shame in mentioning the dishonourable proposal, and with overwhelming indignation she boldly interrogates the peer, and asks him whether family considerations justified her lover, first in abandoning his honourable professions for fear of a relation's wrath, and next in daring to insult misfortune by an infamous proffer. Lord Merlin unsatisfactingly responds to Mabel's appeal by siding with the destitute orphan, and then is dumbfounded by the appalling communication that the false and treacherous lover was his own nephew. The peer is as noble-minded as he is titled. He resolves that reparation shall be made, and his inflexibility becomes the more stern when he recognises in Mabel the child of his early love. It was the mother of the dependant who had jilted the peer, and it was the nephew of the peer who wished to dishonour the daughter of his first and only attachment. Mabel, to prove Sandford's scoundrelism, had placed the unsealed letter addressed to her by him the morning after his dishonourable conduct in the peer's hands, but the letter establishes the innocence of Sandford, for it was one of repentance and not of insult; one of reparation in fact, offering his hand and heart even at the risk of his uncle's displeasure. The denouement may be imagined. The peer is overjoyed at the union of Mabel and Bob, as he again calls his nephew, and the kind-hearted nobleman is moreover instrumental in reconciling Lady Manifold to the marriage that had taken place between the Captain and Emily, the mother having, the same day that her daughter had eloped, been united to Sir Gregory Plump.

Such is the outline of the story of Mr. Bell's new comedy, produced on Tuesday night, with unequivocal and, as we consider, with deserved success. Mr. Bell is already known as a dramatic author by his comedy of Marriage, and has long been recognised as a powerful political writer, as well as an acute critic. Mr. Bell has varied powers. His "History of Russia" and his "Lives of the Poets" exemplify this; whilst his natural talents were manifested in a memorable action for libel when he was editor of the Atlas, defending the case in person with such tact, elegance, and good taste as rendered the cause one of the most celebrated in legal annals. It may not be considered too much to add that he is, at the same time, a generous and kind-hearted man, who has secured for himself the respect and esteem of men of all shades of opinion. The present production bears the impress of his kindly feelings. There is nothing dark, depraved, nor thoroughly vicious in his "Mothers and Daughters." He sketches society as he finds it constituted, but he is anxious to find a redeeming point in every character. Thus he makes the match-making mother, with all her worldly notions, feel a maternal touch at the conclusion; and, although the daughter has, by her false and hollow system, disappointed her dearest expectations, still the mother cannot throw her off, despite of the marriage with the captain without a shilling—living only in the season, and laid up, like a ship in ordinary (to borrow the author's simile) during the off months. Nay, the captain, adventurer as he is, writing his "Life and Times," albeit confined in his career to a merely skimming of the surface of fashionable society, has his good parts, for he never runs in debt. The comedy was thus cast:—

Lady Manifold	Mrs. Orger.
Emily Manifold	Mrs. W. Lacy.
Mabel Trevor	Miss Vandenhoff.
Rose	Mrs. Humby.
Lord Merlin	Mr. Vandenhoff.
Sir Gregory Plump	Mr. Bartley.
Mr. Sandford	Mr. Cooper.
Capt. Swinford Hastings Montague	Mr. Harley.
Blount	Mr. Meadows.
Loop	Mr. Wigan.

The author, we are pained to state frankly, was most cruelly used by his artists. We should presume that this comedy was intended for the Haymarket, and that Mr. Bell took measure of Mr. W. Farren for the part of Lord Merlin. Not that we mean to insinuate that Mr. Vandenhoff was a totally inadequate representative of the peer, but he was much too slow. He dragged the dialogue terribly; and it was partly his fault, with his brother performers, that three hours and a half were consumed in getting through the play—which not the less requires pruning, in the third as well as in the last act. Vandenhoff made one great hit in the dénouement, nevertheless, in his exclamation of Bob, which he gave with Downton's Sir Anthony Absolute gusto. Nothing could be more unfortunate than Mr. Cooper's experience of at least half a century as the juvenile lover. If the comedy had been intended as a burlesque, Cooper's first entrance, with a short blue jacket, white hat, and tight unmentionables, would have been unique; but, if we are to have genteel comedy, pray, Mr. Cooper, give us skirts for the future. Harley was Harley, and—wild to*ut*. The captain, we think, might have been created a part -as it was, he was a bore. Mrs. Orger gave a coarse sketch of the intriguing mother, but there was no deficiency of vigour and vivacity in her performance; and the daughter found an artistical representative in Mrs. W. Lacy, although a shade too vulgar. The same remarks will apply to Mrs. Humby's Rose, whose reading of a love-letter dictated by a fortune-telling at cards, "about a dark man, and something about a child, that she could'nt make out," was rich and racy enough. But the author had ample justice done to him by the exquisite creation of the dependant's part by Miss Vandenhoff, who, in the two scenes where she discards her lover, and tells her history to the peer, commanded the earnest attention of the auditory, and drew mingled tears and applause from all sides. The patient and subdued attitude of her early scenes, as the companion, and her fire, energy, and touching feeling in the latter portions of the play, contributed mainly to its eventual success. We need scarcely add that the mise en scène was appropriate and complete—the Bradwell and Grieves are always guarantees for such a result.

To resume our opinion of Mr. Bell's comedy, we should say that its title is certainly a misnomer. There is but one mother and one daughter. It is true they represent a class, and, as we think, a numerous one, but a better class might have been placed in juxtaposition. It should have been called, properly speaking, "The Dependant," for she is a really original creation of Mr. Bell, and a perfect picture she makes: but relief is certainly wanted, and much as the author has suffered from the performers, we question whether the greatest skill could have rendered eminently effective some of the sketches which Mr. Bell has called into life. The objection found to this comedy by some persons, that all the parts may be lawfully cast, would have been called, properly speaking, "The Dependant," for she is a really original creation of Mr. Bell, and a perfect picture she makes: but relief is certainly wanted, and much as the author has suffered from the performers, we question whether the greatest skill could have rendered eminently effective some of the sketches which Mr. Bell has called into life. The objection found to this comedy by some persons, that all the parts may be lawfully cast, would have been called, properly speaking, "The Dependant," for she is a really original creation of Mr. Bell, and a perfect picture she makes: but relief is certainly wanted, and much as the author has suffered from the performers, we question whether the greatest skill could have rendered eminently effective some of the sketches which Mr. Bell has called into life. The objection found to this comedy by some persons, that all the parts may be cast to those who would cavil at the talent in the market try their own hand. En attendant, if we cannot find a Sheridan or a Farquhar, let us have, if you will, Mortons or Inchbalds; but keep us from "Perdrix—tonjours perdrix," at all events; and if one beautiful creation emanates out of half-a-dozen old acquaintances with new faces, we are disposed to hail it with enthusiasm, and therefore say we, a long life to the fair Dependant, until Mr. Bell, out of his fertile resources, makes a fresh discovery. It appeared to us that the audience of Tuesday night shared our opinion, for the comedy was announced by Mr. Vandenhoff for repetition; and the author was compelled to bow from his box amidst unanimous approbation; and when a few excrescences are lopped off, mothers and daughters, we trust, may take a good lesson out of the last new comedy.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Drury Lane.—A new "getting up" of "Der Freyschutz" is, we learn, in active preparation at this house, where, if the music may not be better performed than ever it was heretofore, we are led to expect, inter alia, an incantation scene that is to bewitch us out of our memory of even the gorgeous "King Arthur" himself. What next, we wonder, in the way of scenic splendour? Or shall we, when its resources are exhausted, return again to the enjoyment of other senses than that of vision?

Covent Garden.—Mr. Bunn has just returned from the Continent with abundance of fresh supplies for our dramatic (in the novel acceptation of the word) entertainment in the course of the season, not the least amongst which will be the far-famed, universally-talked-of Fanny Elssler, who, with a worthy assistant ballet company, will appear at Covent Garden after Easter.

National Minstrelsy.—This week has been most prolific in the eloquent advocacy of the respective ancient melody of different localities forming Great Britain. England, Ireland, and Scotland have each had their zealous champion for supremacy; but while it would be invidious to give a preference to any one of them, as far as their own individual exertions have been concerned, perhaps a short inquiry into the merits of each cause may not be here obtrusive. That Ireland has boasted of the possession of national song in a peculiar and idiomatic character long anterior to the pretensions of her Sister Countries has been allowed on all hands. English, Scotch, and Cambrian writers (by the way, where is the Gallic champion?) all concur in granting that she was to them the motherland of not only the music, but of most of the musical instruments, which they first imported, and afterwards adopted so fondly as to lay claim to their invention. A royal writer of Scotland has declared it as his opinion that there was not a Scotch melody of greater antiquity than two centuries; and it is well known that many beautiful airs claimed by our friends north of Tweed (witness "Auld Robin Gray" and "Within a mile") have been the productions of Englishmen. Let it not be imagined for a moment that any slight is here cast upon the national music of Scotland; for she decidedly does now possess one—and one of a most captivating and poetical character. All that is asserted is, that she borrowed her music, in the first instance, from Erin, however she may have remodelled or disguised it, and that, on the score of antiquity, she must yield to the bards of the insula sacra, not insula sanctorum, as its ancient appellative has been modernized into erroneously. Giraldus Cambrensis, on the part of the Welsh, admits of the introduction of the harp into Wales from Ireland; while hosts of English historians, also, bear witness of the superiority of the ancient Irish in the "ars divinior musicæ." But we are insensibly falling into a national controversy, when it is more properly our business to record our testimony of the delightful manner in which the subject has been, to use a pet phrase of our own, illustrated by Messrs. Wilson, White, Crouch, and Horncastle, by their respective musical, critical, and historical lectures with which they have been lately delighting the public. We will begin with Mr. Wilson; because in a great degree, if not wholly, the mode of such instruction and gratification originated with him, however successfully he has been followed and rivalled. This gentlemen possesses many rare and opposite requisites to a popular and pleasing lecturer, but seldom united in one individual. He is well acquainted with that part of anecdotical history which throws an air of romance about his entertainment, and imparts a chivalrous interest to some of his details which the dry chronicler would either overlook or affect to despise, and exhibits in others of more familiar and domestic nature a verisimilitude which convinces us that haud inexpertus loquitur. Added to this he possesses a most agreeable delivery, and a voice that breathes forth most touchingly, and occasionally with great energy, whatever subject he undertakes to illustrate by its descriptive and versatile power. Somewhat his inferiors in this latter particular, Messrs. White, Crouch, and Horncastle evince some other perfections which eminently qualify them for this novel and delightful species of entertainment. Mr. White sings in his native language (the Gaelic) several traditional Irish songs and ancient bardic melodies, which, although unintelligible to most of the natives of this country, he contrives to make "discourse most eloquent music." Moreover, his portions of the lecture are of the highest interest to the philologist and antiquarian. Mr. Crouch's "Echoes of the Lakes," if he be not an Irishman, show how deeply he is imbued with Irish feeling, some of his melodies being worthy of a Conallan or Carolan; for instance, his "Kathleen ma vourneen," which is the very soul of "sweet but mournful song." In addition to their own powers, these Arcades ambo have gallantly called to their aid the assistance of Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, the Misses Lyon, and other artistes, whose charming powers seem to luxuriate in this new field of minstrelsy.

As we are on an Irish subject, we must claim Mr. Horncastle's indulgence for the present, and plead our inability, like Sir Boyle, to be in two places at once. We will devote a future notice to that gentleman's lecture on the like increasingly-popular subject—

National Minstrelsy.

National Music Hall.—We perceive by an advertisement in the Times that the much-talked-of National Music Hall has at length been determined upon, under the immediate patronage of Prince Albert, and the most distinguished noblesse of the land. It it is to be hoped that this edifice will be the exclusive temple of harmony, and that it will not be desecrated by aught tending to interrupt "glee and good humour," but that it may prove to be "such a structure" as "Glorious Apollo" might commission Polyhymnia to superintend.

Mr. Sterndale Bennett's Concert.—The second concert of this gentleman's classical series took place at his own residence in Charlotte-street, on Monday evening last, which, like the former, gave the highest possible satisfaction and delight to an élite of professional and amateur musicians.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Carmarthen.—Further Particulars of Rebecca and her Daughters.—The lawless mob in the neighbourhood of St. Clear's have again committed a daring outrage. A few days since, the magistrates for the county met at the Shire Hall, Carmarthen, to deliberate respecting the riotous transactions at St. Clear's, during the past month, and to take measures for the apprehension of the ringleaders. The result has been that a troop of the Royal Marines from Milford, commanded by Captain Wilson, was stationed at St. Clear's, and a great number of the old pensioners from Carmarthen received orders to proceed to the same place; the reward for the apprehension of the offenders was also increased from £50 to £100. Notwithstanding these precautions, on Monday night last the rioters sent a message to the marines, to the effect that they were about to pay a visit to the gates, and that they should be glad to meet them. Between three and four o'clock in the morning a detachment of 20 marines, accompanied by four officers, set out for the gates, to ascertain if the men intended carrying their threat into execution. When they arrived at Trevaughan gate, it was found to have been levelled to the ground, and part of the toll-house destroyed. Not one of the rioters was, however, to be seen, they having dispersed in different directions after they had levelled the gates. On each of these excursions the mob, consisting of a large number of men and boys, all of them well mounted, and most of them dressed in women's clothes, and nearly all armed with guns, pistols, bayonets, hay-knives, reaping-hooks, crow-bars, or some other weapon, are invariably headed by Rebecca, who is described as being a remarkably strong tall man, well disguised, and who appears to have unlimited authority over the lawless crew, who term themselves her children. The toll-keepers are dreadfully afraid of them, and the mob altogether is the terror of the surrounding country. (Next week we shall give a portrait of the amiable "Rebecca," with a group of her hopeful family.)

Denbigh.—Bishoprics of St. Asaph and Bangor.—A large and influential meeting of the freeholders of the county of Denbigh, convened and presided over by the High Sheriff, was held at the Shire Hall, Ruthin, on the 21st inst., to petition Parliament for the repeal of an Act passed in the late reign, which proposes to unite in one Bishopric the present sees of St. Asaph and Bangor. Resolutions were moved and seconded by Viscount Dungannon, Mr. W. Bagot, M.P., Sir W.W. Wynn, M.P., T. Mainwaring, Esq., M.P., and a petition to both Houses of Parliament against the proposed union of the two dioceses and the alienation of their revenues to Manchester, was carried by acclamation. All ranks and parties seem unanimous upon this most important subject.

Durham.—The Income-tax.—In Durham and Northumberland the income-tax is pressing most heavily upon the working classes, in consequence of it the masters are, in almost every instance, reducing the number of their servants, that they may be enabled to make up thereby for the sum which the tax detracts from their income. It is also complained that woodlands which produce 20s. 25s. and 30s. an acre, as they grow oak, hazel, or ash, are exempt from the tax, which the children, it is alleged, was effected by the landowners who made the law.

Edinburgh.—The Scotch Church.—The Stewarton case came on for judgment on Thursday week in the Court of Session, when the Lord President and Lord Mackenzie delivered their opinions against the legality of the quoad sacra parishes, and the admission of their ministers to the General Assembly. On Wednesday Lord Jeffrey and Lord Fullarton gave their judgments in favour of the Church. Their lordships delivered themselves at great length. The whole of the judges have now given their opinions, eight being against, and five in favour of the Church.

Lanarkshire.—We are much concerned to state that a large portion of the colliers in the mining districts of Lanarkshire are again out on strike, and the numbers are likely to be increased during the present week. The dispute has reference to the question of wages, but we are not fully informed as to particulars. With very trifling exceptions, the men have been peaceable and orderly.

CURLING MATCH.

Our northern brethren have a fine athletic game peculiar to the country, called curling—a word strange to southron ear, at least in connection with a manly sport. Winter is the season for enjoying the exercise, and when the Scottish lakes are frozen over, curling becomes the order of the day. Ever alive to give pictorial evidence of what may be the passing feature of the moment, a recent grand curling match which the Scottish papers have reported affords us favourable opportunity for familiarizing our English readers with one source of healthful and amusing relaxation to the denizens of a cold country at a cold season. Our engraving will at once explain the character of the game; but although the means are simple—requiring no expensive horses, well-kept hounds, valuable yachts, preserved manors, or other costly adjuncts—yet for sturdy exercise and high excitement curling is not excelled by any of the more exclusive enjoyments. Whilst the skill and dexterity of the player are tested to the utmost, the very progress of the sport tends to increase the sum of that strength and activity which it calls into play, and health and pleasant recreation go hand in hand together in sisterly companionship.

Now turn we to the notice of the late affair to which our remarks and illustration alike have reference. We quote from the Perth Courier—

MEETING OF THE GRAND CALEDONIAN CURLING CLUB.

On Thursday fortnight the first meeting for competition of the different clubs composing the united association, took place here. The day selected was the first on which the ice was sufficiently strong for the purpose, and from the break of the weather the following night, it is likely to prove the only one, within a considerable period, on which the object of the meeting could have been attained. The day, in addition, was unquestionably the finest of the winter; the frost was moderate, and the sun shone throughout with unclouded brilliance.

The scene of competition was a pond upon Mr. Murie's farm of Windyedge. At an early hour the carriages with county families and intending competitors began to arrive. There were deputations from no fewer than eighteen clubs present, including several gentlemen from Edinburgh, and the adjoining counties of Fife, Forfar, and Stirling. The scene upon the ice exceeded in brilliance and animation any previous similar occasion in this, or perhaps any other district in Scotland. Altogether, there could not have been less than a thousand individuals present, comprising the greater part of the county families of the district, and many strangers. Among the company we observed several noble lords, the Right Hon. Fox Maule, M.P., the officers of the 68th, and various other parties of rank, wealth, and respectability.

The Earl of Kinnoull had caused a liberal lunch to be provided; and never, certainly, was the hospitality of the noble earl exhibited on such a scale before. His lordship himself, his amiable countess, and Lord Dupplin, were unremitting in their attentions to the comfort of all present; and a more pleasing sight could not have been witnessed than the cordial manner in which landed proprietors and tenants were associated on this occasion.

By twelve o'clock 18 rinks had been arranged, each consisting of four players a-side: and as the match agreed upon was the right bank of the Tay against the left, which made a nearly equal division of the clubs represented on this occasion, a fair competition was secured. At the hour mentioned, a gun was fired as a signal, and the roaring play commenced with great spirit. At three o'clock a similar signal was again given, to cease playing, when, on taking the results of the different rinks, the east side of the Tay were found to be the victors by 25 shots. Among the victors were the Right Hon. Fox Maule, M.P., the Earl of Mansfield, and Drs. Wyllie and Halket. The number of shots gained was—Left bank, 382; Right bank, 304; majority, 25.

By four o'clock the ice was cleared, and the great body of the players had adjourned to the County Hall, Perth, where, at five o'clock, about 200 gentlemen were assembled to partake of curler's fare. The Earl of Mansfield, President of the Grand Club, was in the chair, and presided over the festivities in the true spirit of the meeting. The noble chairman was supported on the right by Fox Maule, M.P., Captain Houston Stewart, Mr. Grant of Kilgraston, Captain Osborne, &c.; and on the left by the Master of Strathallan, Hon. Captain David Murray, Sir John S. Richardson, Rev. Dr. Esdaile, &c. Dr. Renton of Edinburgh, and Mr. Hogarth, Cupar-Fife, were the croupiers. The bugle band of the 68th were in attendance, and added much to the pleasure and effect of the occasion.

Long may athletic games meet encouragement say we, and long may the noblemen and gentlemen of the Caledonian Club find relish for the old national game which they have so recently been enjoying.

THE ETHERON VIADUCT ON THE SHEFFIELD AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.

It may be truly said in after times that the nineteenth century was a bright era in the history of science in this country. the rapid progress of [illegible], to which it owes its greatness, has produced this result. Were we to enumerate the turnpike-roads, canals, docks, manufactories, and last, and greatest, the railroads, which the trade of this country has called into existence, it would far outstretch even the proudest record of the power and energy of civilized man which any age or country can produce. The illustration which stands at the head of this article is but another added to the many proofs of the attainments of English science. Never, perhaps, since the great Telford stretched the arm of his powerful genius across the Menai Straits, and reared in mid air an iron chain to curb and restrain, as it were, the hitherto undisputed sway of the great ocean, has the world of science seen a work more worthy of regard than the one under notice, for its boldness, grandeur, and simplicity; showing as it does perfect command over the resources at hand, and beautiful economy in their disposal. It crosses the river Etheron at an altitude of 136 feet; and in order that the reader may better understand the locality of this stupendous work, we may describe it as a natural outlet or gorge for the water collected in the mountain dales of Glossop and Longden, which unite a short distance higher up, and form the Etheron, a tributary of the Mersey. The valley gradually contracts, so as to bear, at the place we are describing, a strong resemblance to the Matlock-dale, near the High Tor. It is impossible to conceive the panoramic effect of the grand scenery from the bridge on passing over—on one side the view opens to the plains of Cheshire, whilst on the other is seen the picturesque vale of Longden, terminated by the great range of hills known as the backbone of England.

We have been favoured with the following description of the dimensions and construction of the bridge by Mr. Alfred Jee, the resident engineer:—The line of the Sheffield and Manchester Railway is carried over the river Etheron by a viaduct of three arches. The extreme height, from the foundations to the top of the viaduct, is 136 feet. The arches are composed of three timber ribs to each arch, formed of 3-inch planks put together on the laminating principle, with tar and strong brown paper between each layer of planks. The centre arch is 150 feet span, and 40 feet versed sine. The western arch is 135 feet, and the eastern 120 feet span, the radius of each being the same as the centre arch, so that the thrust upon the piers is rendered as equal as possible. The whole of the ribs are 5 feet in depth; those in the centre of each arch are 2 feet 4 inches wide, and those at the outside 1 foot 10 inches. The spandrils are composed of timber framing, upon which are placed the main longitudinal beams, which carry the cross joisting and the half bulks upon which the rails and chairs are fastened. The cross joists are 5 feet apart from centre to centre.

The three ribs in each arch are firmly braced together by diagonal and cross stays of timber and wrought-iron rods. The foundations of the piers and abutments are laid upon solid rock. The piers at the base, above the forkings, are 43 feet 6 inches by 22 feet 6 inches, and at the springing of the arches, 35 feet by 15 feet. The width of the roadway, on the top, is 22 feet 6 inches. The whole of the stonework is of solid ashlar (the millstone grit), and was brought from the neighbourhood of Tintwistle, a distance of five miles: it is of excellent quality. The timber is from the Baltic, all dressed with the plane, and has been immersed in a solution of the sulphate of copper, to render it impervious to the dry rot or the attacks of insects. The quantity of stone is about 200,000 cubic feet; and of Memel timber, 31,700 cubic feet; weight of cast iron work, 41 tons, and of wrought iron, 43 tons.

The total cost of the viaduct is about £25,000; and it has been executed throughout in a very satisfactory manner, by Mr. Richard Hattersley, the contractor, in the short space of fifteen months—having been commenced in October, 1841, and finished in December, 1842.

Mr. Locke, whose name stands deservedly high amongst the eminent engineers of the day, may with truth be satisfied with this bold effort of his genius. Its strength and beautiful simplicity are at once apparent; whilst the cheapness of its construction forms one, and not the least, of its recommendations as a study for imitation.

The old bridge, which is seen in the foreground, crosses the Etheron at a single span, and was formerly considered one of the wonders of the neighbourhood. The point whence the view is taken shows the general effect of the scene, but fully to feel the gigantic size of the structure the observer should stand on the old bridge.

The viaduct is situated ten miles from Manchester, near the extensive mills of Messrs. Sidebottom, whose wealth and spirit have materially assisted the progress of this railway from its commencement. There is a station near the viaduct, and trains every hour, so that there is great facility for inspecting this extraordinary work; of which, we understand, numbers daily avail themselves.

We are indebted for the above sketch to Mr. Wightman, of Sheffield, the eminent architect.

ALFRED CROWQUILL'S SKETCHES.

LONG COACHMEN.

Alas! for the days that are gone! Shorn are the glories of the "whip;" long coachmen are no more; the last guard has wound his farewell notes upon his horn as a doleful dirge to the departed spirits of the jolly band; and along with them every delight of travelling has passed away for ever. No more shall we have the good fortune to "book" the "box" to the envy of all the other "outsides," or be the pleased auditor of all the good things uttered on the passing or rather passed occurrences. No more shall we share that throne where the long coachman reigned a king, beloved by all his subjects; no, the reins of these monarchs are at an end. Joy ever accompanied him on his "progress," all, from the shepherd to the squire, greeted him with a smile of welcome or a short nod of recognition, for he was the link between them and the great world; a gleam of sunshine glancing across the shady way, a pleasant note of music breaking through the rural monotony.

The village Crispin unstrapped his lapstone, the barber left some carrotty poll half-cropped, to join the gaping group and admire the "change" of the four spirited animals.

But above all was the admiration bestowed upon the "great" man himself and his "appointments," his unexceptionable "tops," the folds of the companion shawl, the magical twist of the long lash around the spiral handle as he threw it to the "helper," who had caught it with such practised dexterity for many years, and which "trick" still continued to excite the applause of the by-standers. Then, again, with what inimitable importance would he lounge into the inn and condescend to "trifle" with the ever-ready and tempting lunch; with what a racy Falstaffian humour did he joke, and how would the smart and rosy hostess and her daughter, the barmaid, giggle and blush; for your genuine coachman is invariably a lady's man.

His dash forward after the warning "hold bard," and the rejoinder of "all right" was truly magnificent, as he rattled over the village stones; while his perfect command of the "fresh" and apparently unmanageable "four," the crack of the "whip" as he acknowledged the friendly nods of his acquaintance, all tended to express the tacit boast of "You see how I tool the tits,—Lor' bless yer, its nothin' to me!" And where is the wayfarer would not turn to gaze after the enlivening apparition as long as it remained in sight. It was perfection! but it has departed and left a void in the very heart of the rural districts never to be filled; the weeds encroach upon the once frequented ways; long rows of once commodious "stabling" are dark, still, and untenanted; the neglected doors fall from their hinges; the grand old inn, the heart and vitality of the place, stands a cheerless ruin, and the moss grows upon its never-trodden steps. Where are the many cheerful voices, where the throng of servants who were playmates in childhood and in manhood clustered round their pleasant hearths? The tenantless cottages, the cold, dark, and useless "smithy" answer gone! all gone! sad wanderers from their deserted village!

A few "desperate" men have indeed attempted to drive a pair-horse coach through the scenes of their former glory, but failed; their sceptres had fallen from their hands; two horses! the idea was ridiculous; and they deeply experienced all the bitterness of their fallen state.

I accidentally discovered one melancholy man, sulking away the fag-end of his existence in the privileged parlour of a little sporting house. To mistake him for anything but a coachman was impossible. The same voluminous garb, the "knowing" tie of the shawl, the memorable "tops," thrust forward in a straight line from the hips (for who ever knew a coachman—a real coachman—cross his legs?), glossy as when the soles pressed the foot-board, and, although rather the worse for wear, their very appearance produced a pleasant reminiscence of days gone by.

The professional nod welcomed me: by the way, a coachman's nod is not easy of attainment, and the difficulty lies in the rapidity and shortness of it; a novice—nay, any one but a coachman attempting it must inevitably leave his hat on the road.

A glass of brandy and water stood at his elbow; and he sighed as he observed my eyes directed towards the highly-varnished representations of departed "fours" which adorned the walls.

"Ah! sir," said he, venting a profound sigh with the smoke of his pipe, "they'll be never seen again, 'cept in effigy! 'twas a cruel consarn, sir, just as ve'd come to perfection, and beat the world, as I may say. Vy, ve changed on my 'line' the whole 'four,' sir, in three minutes! Think o' that, sir; jist time to wipe the dust out o' my eyes, and off again. A wonderful thing, sir; vy, I take it, as our babbies' babbies, ven they sees them ere pictures, will never be persuaded as they vos real, but on'y allegories!" He here took a long pull at his grog, and continued—"That ere vun vith the four bays vos poor Bob Pointer's drag. He vos the man, to be sure, the best o' the werry best; but he's dead and gone, and lucky for him! for vot's the use of a man's living ven he hasn't got vun? He vos rather a fast un, 'cos he got among the nobs and the champayne, for he vos a first-rate. But, Lor' bless you! on'y to see that chap handle the lot; it vos a'most a miracle! No flourishing, but altogether; not a flake o' sweat on vun horse more nor another; no firing o' minit guns out of his thong, for he never used his vip vithout a cause; but, by jingo! ven he did hit, he'd lift a hoss bang off his four legs! To see him handle the ribbins vos vat I call slap up, and no mistake. No pulling here nor pulling there; but, Lor', he played 'em like a pianner; so dellikit yet firm, that I do verily believe as he vould hn' driv four ladies vithout hurting a mouth of ere a vun on 'em?"

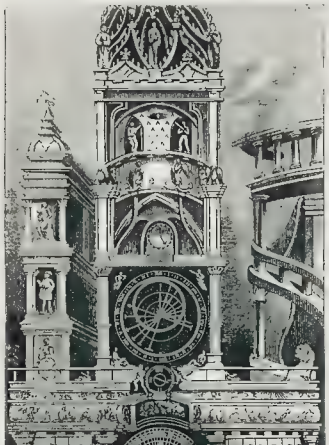
"That ere red Taliator vos my brother Ben's—ve vos werry fond of each other.—He druv the 'up' as I druv the 'down.' Day a'ter day ve lifted our ribs as ve passed, and werry seldom more, 'cept ven a strap or a buckle, may be, vould come undone at the place vhere ve meet, ven ve could cabbage a moment to speak about the 'old man' (who druv the heavy blue on the Dover line), if so be either vun had h'ard anythink about him, vich vos werry seldom, for he couldn't come to us and ve couldn't go to him for a matter o' nine year, vich happened ven death vipped him off the road and ve vent to his burying ——— here's to you, Sir!

"Them ere two, sir, on t'other side, in the same picture, vith thin veels, looking like Cat'un veels, and all the cattle down to their vork, vith a devil take the hindmost sort o' look—that's me, sir, on the off drag. Ah! that vas the time o' day, sir, ven nobody vouldn't go by us 'cept convicts, paupers, and game, and ve tipped the 'pike-men to keep palls o' vater ready to put the fire out in the boxes o' the veels! People as had large families a'ays sent 'em out to play in the roads, for there vos no pulling up, and the mutton and pork as ve killed beat the whole tote o' the butchers on the line; but in a case vere your honour like is consarned proprietors don't stick at trifles. The hopposition vos gratis as ve vos, and our pride vos who'd have the most, in course! Venture-some people is scarce, and sometimes I've bin hard dru to vop t'other, but needs must ven the devil drives, and many and many an old 'oman and idler have I grabbed agin their vill, and who warn't agoing nowhere, and actilly taken 'em 'right through' at the proprietors' expense."

As he spoke the jolly face of the old coachman loomed large and red; his blue eyes twinkled, his arms were extended, and his feet pressed firmly against the fender.—Animated by his darling theme, he imagined himself again on the box—when a shrill whistle burst upon our ears, the signal of some railway train in the neighbourhood—the effect was truly magical—the capacious man shrunk within himself—he struck his low-crowned, broad-brimmed hat over his eyes with a groan (it might have been a smothered oath!), and rushed from the room.

THE GREAT CLOCK AT STRASBURG.

The interest of this master-piece of mechanism (sometimes called the "Monster Clock") has "taken a new turn" by its having been recently repaired, and exhibited to the Scientific Congress, held a short time since at Strasburg. By some of our contemporaries this repair has been described as a new construction, whereas the clock itself has been celebrated for the great variety and complication of its movements for nearly five centuries. It was begun in 1352, and it was placed in the spire of the cathedral at Strasburg in 1370. On the dial-plate was then shown a celestial globe with the motions of the sun, moon, earth, and planets, and the phases of the moon; also a sort of perpetual almanack; on which the day of the month was pointed out by a statue: it had also the golden figure of a cock, which, at each hour, flapped its wings and crowed twice:—the hour being struck on a bell by the figure of an angel, who opened the door and saluted the Virgin; and near him stood another angel who held an hour-glass, which he turned as soon as the striking was finished; the first quarter being struck by a child with an apple, the second by a youth with an arrow, the third by a man with a staff, and the fourth and last quarter by an aged man with his crutch.



THE GREAT CLOCK AT STRASBURG.

This clock was, however, much altered from the original, by Conradus Dasypodius, Professor of Mathematics at Strasburg, who began his labours in 1571, and replaced the clock, complete, in the spire of the cathedral, in 1574. The basement of the clock shows three dial-plates, one of which, in the centre, is round, and made up of several concentric circles, the two interior ones performing their revolutions in a year, and thus serving as a calendar. The two lateral dial-plates are squares, and indicate the eclipses of the sun and moon. Above the middle dial-plate the days of the week are represented by different divinities, supposed to preside over the planets, from which they are named. The divinity of the current day appears in a car, rolling over the clouds, and at night gives place to the succeeding one. Before the basement is displayed a globe, borne on the wings of a pelican, round which revolve the sun and moon, the mechanism being in the body of the bird.

Above the central dial is a smaller dial for the minutes of the hour, with a child on the north and south sides, with the sceptre and hour-glass as before described. Above this minute-dial, in the first stage of the central turret, is a dial-plate with an hour-circle, and within it an astrolabe, showing the motion of every planet, his aspect, and in what sign, degree, and hour, every one is in at each hour of the day; the opposition likewise of the sun and moon, and the head and tail of the dragon. Above this circle is a smaller one, with the two signs of the moon's rising and falling, and index of her state and age. Over this dial are the four figures to strike the quarters on bells, as in the old clock; these figures are followed by Death, who is expelled by our Saviour rising from the grave, who, however, permits Death to sound the hour; one angel also strikes a bell with a sceptre, and the other turns an hour-glass at the expiration of each hour. In the top of the tower is a chime, which plays three airs and a thanksgiving; after which the golden cock on the north tower flaps his wings and crows as before. In the years 1625 and 1630, it was struck by lightning, after which it remained for a long time "quite dumb and dead."

The recent repair of this clock has occupied the mechanician, M. Schilgue, four years. The cock-crow, which had been mute since 1789, has been reproduced; and mechanism added by which at midnight, on December 31, the moveable feasts and fasts range themselves in the calendar, and the succession they will appear in during the next year. The entire work excited considerable interest among the savans forming the congress recently held at Strasburg, and will add to the attractions of the famed cathedral. It is, unquestionably, one of the most marvellous curiosities of clockwork in existence.

It is related that the original artisan of this clock became blind before he had completed his work, but that he finished it, blind as he was; thus affording a curious illustration of the power of habit, as well as the acuteness communicated to one sense by the deprivation of another.

PORTRAIT OF FATHER MATHEW.

We here place before our readers the portrait of Father Mathew, one of the most remarkable men of our time, who has won for himself honourable fame, and a high place in the esteem of the wise and good. He takes his place among the men who have been powerful in their day, for good or evil, by influence acquired over the minds of their fellow-men, who have swayed the current of popular thought and feeling, who have effected revolutions in the habits, manners, and opinions of nations. Although he may not possess the splendid endowments of men of the very first order of mind, he has given proof that he is gifted with all the qualities adapted to gain and retain ascendancy over the multitude—strength of will, fixity of purpose, energy, perseverance, knowledge of the human heart, the talent of winning the affections, guiding the resolutions, and ruling the convictions of mankind. To inform the ignorant, to stimulate the backward, to bend the stubborn spirit, to purify the depraved heart, to quicken and enlighten the dull understanding—this is his province, this is his task. In the exercise of such noble functions he has shown himself not inferior to those orators of old, who

> "Wielded at will the fierce democracy," and worthy to be ranked in many respects with the master-spirits of history. From time to time circumstances arise in which the clerical order, at all times powerful, is called prominently into action with augmented authority and importance; ecclesiastics endowed with great political talents, as well as with religious zeal and proselytising ardour, appear, and play the first parts on the great theatre of public affairs. Such were Savonarola, Xavier, and Loyola—such, too, were Luther and Knox. In the list of these men Father Mathew's name may be enrolled. Compare their achievements, judge their characters and careers by their results, and which of them may boast a clearer fame or a more spotless laurel? Father Mathew's sphere of action may not have been so lofty or so splendid: his course has been rather that of the mild star which beams with modest radiance, and sheds meek influence on the troubled spirit, than that of the dazzling and eccentric meteor; he resembles the day-star rather than the comet. He has pursued his unobtrusive path of usefulness and beneficence; a reformer without selfish ambition, a priest without bigotry, a philosopher without pretension or quackery. His lessons have brought health, comfort, and happiness to many an abode of wretchedness; and have created cheerful firesides and smiling faces in the dampest and dreariest hovels of dissolute poverty. Under his auspices and by his exertions a great moral revolution has been wrought, such as for extent and importance has probably no parallel. A nation has been regenerated; casting aside old and time-cherished vices, it has entered on a new career in all the purity of innocence, in the conscious but not presumptuous pride of virtue. Happy may the future be which now opens on the people of Ireland, full of honour and greatness, crowned with the richest fruits of freedom, temperance, and piety. Late events have developed new and interesting features in their national character, the existence of which had not previously been acknowledged. No one ever doubted their bravery, which has been proved on many a bloody and hard-fought field; their devotional zeal, which has been tried by ages of suffering, and has only burned brighter amid the fires of persecution; their learning and genius, which a host of great names in all the departments of art and science avouch; nor their more elegant accomplishments of gallantry, to which every true Irishman will assert his hereditary title. Add to these self-control, and that "golden" moderation which is the favourite theme of philosophy, and what is their wanting to a perfect national character? To these elements of greatness, as well as others more brilliant, our Irish brethren have now established their claim. Honour, then, to the "isle of saints," as well as to the apostle of that popular movement which has wakened into fresh life and activity the energies of her children, and set them free from that torpid lethargy of sloth and vice, which so long hung like an incubus on society, deforming its aspect, cramping its faculties, and impeding its operations. Should they have virtue and determination to persevere, Ireland will no longer be proverbial among the nations for squalid wretchedness; comfort and opulence will take place of poverty, and contentment of disaffection; agriculture will fill to overflowing its horn of plenty; commerce, through all its thousand channels, will pour riches through the land. The great change has even now commenced, and waits but the lapse of a few years to attain its consummation.

The personal appearance of Father Mathew is remarkable. The following interesting and graphic account of it is taken from the excellent work of Mrs. Hall, on "Ireland," now in the press:—

No one who sees the Rev. Mr. Mathew will hesitate to believe that he has been stimulated by pure benevolence to the work he has undertaken. The expression of his countenance is peculiarly mild and gracious; his manner is persuasive to a degree, simple and easy, and humble without a shadow of affectation, and his voice is low and musical—"such as moves men." A man more naturally fitted to obtain influence over a people, easily led and proverbially swayed by the affections, we have never encountered. No man has borne his honours more meekly; encountered opposition with greater gentleness and forbearance; or disarmed hostility by weapons better suited to a Christian. His age is somewhat above fifty, but he looks younger; his frame is strong, evidently calculated to endure great fatigue, and his aspect is that of established health—a serviceable illustration of the practical value of his system. He is somewhat above the middle size; his features are handsome as well as expressive. Our brief interview with him confirmed the favourable impression of his character we had obtained from a knowledge of the benefits derived from his labours; and we left him with fervent thanks to God, that a man so qualified to sway a multitude had so wisely, so nobly, and so virtuously applied his powers and directed the energies of his marvellously active mind—feeling how dangerous he might have proved, if they had been exerted for evil and not for good.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—Should an Amendment on the Address in reply to her Majesty's Speech be proposed in either House of Parliament on Thursday night next, we shall present our readers with a Supplement, gratis, containing the whole of the debate.

INDIA.—Our next number will contain ten similes of the decorations presented to our Indian army, together with a number of other interesting Engravings. Amongst the rest—The Sepoys in full Costume, and a correct and admirable View of the India-House.

IN our next will be given an accurate Engraving of the tremendous explosion of nine tons of gunpowder by galvanic agency, on the Railway near Dover; together with an interesting scientific detail of the entire process. An eminent Artist has been sent from this establishment to witness the event.

WE last week gave a sketch of the Marquesas Island, which has recently been taken possession of by the French Government. We shall next week present our readers with a group of its inhabitants—facetiously christened by the Times the E. A. L. O. U's of the Marquesas.

UNDER the head of Fine Arts, next week, will be presented an elaborate engraving of the Xanthian marbles, just received at the National Gallery, accompanied by a critical notice.

THE SUPPLEMENT AND THE COLOSSEUM PRINT.—We have received more than a hundred letters upon the subject of obtaining, by future subscribers, the supplement which was published at the end of the year together with our grand print of "London at one view." The supplement contains a vast deal of information, having reference to the print—two keys to it—the song of the "City of the world," and about a dozen illustrations of the metropolis in the olden time. All these points are identified with the subject of the engraving, and many friends appear desirous of obtaining the two together. We have therefore reprinted the SUPPLEMENT in question, and have now the pleasure to inform those who purpose subscribing for six months that upon payment of ONE SHILLING it may be had with the Print.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1843.

It will be seen on reference to our Paris news that the war party have been signally defeated on the right of search question in the Chamber of Peers, and so far the French Cabinet has been triumphant in maintaining the alliance with England. It is but justice to M. Guizot to say that the cause of humanity is in more respects than one deeply indebted to his genius and firmness in vindicating as he has done on this occasion the national faith, in preference to acquiring a mob popularity by yielding to the frantic desires of those whose inveterate dislike of England takes place of all other earthly considerations. The address in answer to the speech from the throne was carried by an unexpectedly large majority (seeing the efforts that were made to increase the number of the malcontents), there being for the address 118, and only 67 against it. M. Guizot's speech on the occasion is described as a splendid oratorical display, which, taken with the principles he advocated, recommends him to the admiration of every enlightened friend of humanity in both countries. Even the National, his most uncompromising opponent, is compelled to admit the powerful effect produced by the eloquence of the speaker, and says, "his speech was expected with impatience, and in listening to his exordium, so brilliant and so happy, we feared for the moment, lest the miraculous gift of eloquence might not give a triumph to the worst of causes."

The address in the Chamber of Deputies embodies a clause unfavourable to the treaties of 1831 and 1833; but it remains to be seen whether this redoubtable body is susceptible of contagion from the moral example set it by the Peers.

We have the melancholy task of calling the attention of our readers to the dreadful disasters which during the recent hurricanes have happened at sea. We do so with a feeling of infinite sorrow; but a sense of duty makes it imperative upon us that we should not confine our narratives of the wrecks to simple detail. There are circumstances connected with the calamitous occurrences which call for strong, earnest, and especial remark—which demand the advocacy of Christian humanity—and, in the present condition of the social struggle of the civilized world for what may be called a system of brotherhood between nations, elicit reflections which to silence would be a crime. To give humanity the first place, we point attention to the fact of a meeting having been held on Wednesday in the City, for the purpose of propounding some benevolent schemes of relief for the surviving families of our shipwrecked fellow-creatures, not only on our own and neighbouring coasts, but even at so great a distance of peril as the African shores. Sir John Pirie, who at this charitable meeting took the chair, in Mr. Moxhay's Hall of Commerce, expressed his conviction that many more than five hundred human beings had perished in the recent storms. To this fearful catastrophe of human life the bounding heart of sympathy has leaped up with generous and glowing warmth—the spirit of charity has spread her wings of light, and will bear the faint but holy consolations of her sweet and anxious help into the bosoms of the grief-stricken, the suffering, and the bereaved. A concert for the benefit of the poor afflicted families who survive the blow that has made their homes desolate is one of the means devised for their relief; and from the example set by the friends of humanity in our commercial city, and the countenance given to it by persons of consideration and rank, we augur such omens of benevolent success as will do honour to the feelings of a people who are emphatically bound to succour those who defend them in their walls of wood, and work out the destinies of their country upon the stormy wave-path of the deep. Our own duty is to ask our countrymen of all ranks to respond to the call which has so properly been evoked from the heart of the mighty city whose greatness is wrought upon the sea, and to enjoin society to echo the Christian feeling which should dictate a natural generosity to every human breast. But we have even a higher purpose than that of simple charity to vindicate with reference to these disastrous wrecks. Our readers will peruse with indignant horror the account of the destruction of the Conqueror, with Captain Thompson's statement of the depositions of Abclurch (the only survivor) to the dreadful treatment bestowed upon the half-dead sufferers who were cast upon the inhospitable shores of Lornel. Our map and illustrations will indicate the position of the hapless vessel, but no language will describe the plundering brutality of those who forsook the beautiful duty of "the Life-saver" to indulge the wretched avarices of the thief. Booty was the word—brotherhood was forgotten and disgraced! Let the narrative, however, speak for itself—our present design is to make loud demand for such a police system of maritime protection on the dangerous coasts of our own and other nations as shall enforce the dictates of Christian humanity in the hour of wreck and storm. It is probable that our British Consul at Boulogne will pursue an investigation into the atrocities of the wreckers of Lornel—and to some of the criminals he may bring his retribution home—but it is not by consular agency, but between governments, and by the aid of treaties, that the principles of mutual fellowship under such contingencies are to be hallowed and carried out. Let some fine, active, benevolent spirits bestir themselves in procuring this kind of coast protection—it will do honour to their hearts, and be the future means of saving thousands of human lives. Sir John Pirie, Lord Dudley Stuart, and all who have so kindly joined in the City scheme of relief to the present sufferers, may well seize the opportunity afforded them to originate the future good, and Heaven's reward and posterity's blessing will surely crown their generous exertions in so noble and exalted a behalf. But while we have ventured upon these observation out of a sad circumstance of brutal inhospitality and robbery practised upon our shipwrecked countrymen on the coast of France, with how much more shame and humiliation do we find that upon our own shores the same crime has been committed by English wreckers upon an English vessel wrecked. Yet this was the case with the Lily, of Liverpool, stranded in the British Channel, and the only consolatory reflection evoked by the distressing narrative of treachery is that our Coast Guard, to a certain extent, arrested the work of plunder, and had efficiency to capture and bring to justice some of the desperate criminals concerned. The whole subject presents a fearful picture of abandoned human nature which philanthropy should bestir its best energies to correct.

In another page of our paper will be found a fresh gathering of Testimonials from the country journals in favour of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. We print them with mingled feelings of gratitude and pride, as affording the most unexampled and generous acknowledgments of success that ever attended the independent and impartial efforts of a public journalist.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

PARIS, Jan. 25, 1843.

It is almost hopeless to expect much attention for foreign affairs in London at a time when you are agitated by the atrocious attempt on the life of Mr. Drummond—an additional approximation to the assassination system here, which has afforded the Anglophobians unmixed delight, although the existence of a most respected and respectable man is in question. Still the gravity of affairs here is of a nature to excite the most sinister apprehensions for the eventual preservation of peace. The Chambers are rushing headlong into declarations, which will compel the Government to commence negotiations with England, and the beginning of these negotiations will be the signal of a serious collision hereafter. Not but what the Ministry will obtain its majority in the Peers on the address, but the minority will exhibit numbers never witnessed since 1830, independently of the significant character given to the debates by the Peers who have spoken against the right of search treaties. The majority will therefore be no triumph for the Cabinet, whose position is now regarded as most precarious, by the attitude assumed by the commission in drawing up the project of address in reply to the King's speech. Disguise the fact if you will, but the paragraph in this address, if carried, which it will be most unquestionably, if not a stronger amendment, pledges the French Government to call upon the English Cabinet to abrogate the treaties of 1831 and 1833; and we have already signified that we prefer war to the dishonourable proposition.

Now the question is, can the Soult-Guizot Cabinet accept the paragraph agreed upon by the commission? It is argued that the majority obtained in the Peers will induce M. Guizot to accept the address as it stands. If he takes this course he brings the two Houses into a collision, for he refused to assent to any amendment in the Luxembourg, and the address there has passed without any mention at all of the right of search treaties. Again, if M. Guizot opposes the commission's paragraph he will certainly be outvoted in the Deputies. But the mischief does not stop here. M. Guizot will be hard pushed for a formal declaration as to the mode in which he will execute the opinions expressed by the commission, and there is his risk. Union, also, no longer reigns in the Ministry. M. Lacave Laplagne, the Minister of Finance, who declared in the committee against the right of search treaties, has been severely reproved by the King; and, if M. Guizot could have found a successor ready, M. Laplagne would have been by this time out of office.

The reading of the project of address produced the greatest sensation in the Chamber of Deputies. The Ministers would not reply to the numerous questions as to their intentions, whether to accept or refuse the paragraph referring to the treaties of 1831 and 1833.

My strong opinion is, that M. Guizot will be sufficiently weak to give his assent to the paragraph; and I ground my judgment on his conduct last session, when he accepted the vote of the Chamber which ensured the non-ratification of the treaty of 1841. Had he resigned, as he ought to have done, that disgrace to France might have been saved. It is, however, not believed in the diplomatic circles that M. Guizot's continuance in office can be prolonged, even if he yields to the feeling of the Chamber. There is evidently a disposition of the majority of the Conservatives, or the Right side, to look upon his stay in power as a peril for the dynasty; and the friends and admirers of the Minister of Foreign Affairs would rather have seen him nobly perish than concede the smallest point to the anti-English spirit of the day.

We have no other topic, as you may imagine, than the right of search one, but we are on a volcano, and the forthcoming debates in the Chamber of Deputies must be followed with earnest watchfulness.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A singular incident occurred to the Duke of Wellington, a few minutes after Mr. Drummond was wounded. His grace had left the Commander-in-Chief's office, and was crossing the parade in St. James's-park, when a stout-made youth, about sixteen or seventeen years of age, ran with considerable violence against his grace. The collision caused his grace to stagger and nearly to fall. A policeman on duty witnessing the occurrence, and with the fact of the recent attempted assassination being upon his mind, ran up and secured the person, believing that some intended violence had been used towards the duke. The lad instantly made an apology, without being aware of the high rank of the person he had so unintentionally assaulted, and his grace was understood to reply—"I will take no apology," and instantly passed on. The policeman construing this into a charge, conveyed the lad to Gardner's-lane station-house, where it was deemed advisable to detain the lad until it could be ascertained whether it was the intention of the Duke of Wellington to charge him with the assault. After a detention of upwards of three hours he was given over to his friends.

Several Cabinet Councils have been held during the week, at which it is understood matters of the gravest importance have been discussed. On Monday Her Majesty's Ministers assembled at the Foreign-office, and at two hours' interval Sir James Graham arrived express from Brighton, for the purpose of attending the meeting.

On Tuesday afternoon a second Cabinet Council was held at the private residence of Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci. Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Lord Fitzgerald, and Sir Henry Hardinge, were present. The Ministers met at three o'clock, and the council broke up at half-past five o'clock.

FISHMONGERS AND POULTERERS' ASYLUM BENEFIT BALL.—On Monday night there was a grand ball at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's, for the benefit of the Society "for providing an Asylum and Relief for aged infirm Fishmongers and Poulterers, and their Wives or Widows; also occasionally Relief to their Necessitous Orphans." The arrangements were of the most delightful and liberal character, and the success was equally commensurate. Adams's band was in attendance, and played with the accustomed effect.

It is said that the Duke of Cleveland will move the Address in the House of Lords, in answer to her Majesty's Speech, on the opening of the Session.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday morning great alarm was created in Rotherhithe, in consequence of a fire of a frightful character breaking out in the premises belonging to Messrs. Price and Co., turpentine refiners, at Queen's Wharf, Rotherhithe, situate near the Globe Stairs. The premises were of great magnitude, occupying an area of ground of several thousand feet, in the centre of which stood the distillery, a large building, about 200 feet in length and 80 in width; and when the flames were first discovered they were raging with great fury in one of the retort-houses on the north side of this building. Shortly after the outbreak a strong party of police were on the spot, and in less than an hour nearly a dozen engines. Owing to the strong hold the fire had then obtained, it was found impossible to save any part of the distillery or its contents. The firemen, therefore, exerted themselves to stop the fire, which was then running along the ground (owing to the great quantity of turpentine which had escaped from the tanks), threatening devastation to the outbuildings and several stacks of turpentine barrels, piled one upon another to a considerable height in the open air. Fortunately many of the engines were got to work, from the different ditches and along the canal. Every obstacle having been at last surmounted, the firemen exerted themselves so as to confine the fire to the distillery and two small outbuildings, which were entirely consumed before ten o'clock, together with their contents, consisting of several thousand gallons of turpentine, coppers, stills, and the usual materials in a distillery, nothing remaining except a few fire-blackened walls of the building. Nothing positive could be gleaned as to the origin of the fire; but it is supposed that it must have been caused by one of the men whilst lighting one of the coppers. The amount of property destroyed cannot be correctly stated. The stock in trade and utensils were uninsured.

DEATH OF MR. DRUMMOND.

This unfortunate gentleman died on Wednesday morning, at twenty minutes before eleven o'clock. Mr. Drummond was perfectly conscious to the last moment, and, mortification having taken place, he expired, surrounded by his family and relatives, who never left him during the night, apparently without pain.

Mr. Drummond, we understand, was in his 50th year; universally respected by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance; and, in the transaction of official duties, he was courteous and obliging to every one who had occasion to apply to him on business of a public nature, however trifling it might be.

Immediately after the attack of the reckless assassin had terminated fatally, information of the death of Mr. Drummond was forwarded to Sir Robert Peel and the other Cabinet Ministers. An express was also sent to Windsor Castle to inform her Majesty of the melancholy event. Never, perhaps, was there an instance in which the life of an individual has been sacrificed by the hands of a murderer that has created so painful an interest amongst all classes of the community.

Sir J. Graham and several of the Cabinet Ministers, shortly after it was known that Mr. Drummond had breathed his last, went to the residence of Sir Robert Peel in Whitehall-gardens. Upon the Premier being informed of the fatal termination of the assassin's attack we understand he was greatly affected, and immediately directed that his condolence should be forwarded to the afflicted relatives of the late amiable gentleman, who had so faithfully and diligently acted as his private secretary.

Mr. Drummond entered the public service in 1811, and has been actively employed during a period of more than thirty years. He held the appointment of a chief clerk in the Treasury when his career was untimely checked by the hand of the assassin.

Mr. Drummond was private secretary to the Duke of Wellington during the period of his Administration; also to Sir R. Peel in the short Tory Ministry, and held the same office on his return to power in 1841.

Mr. Drummond was the son of the late Mr. Charles Drummond, one of the original partners in the bank carried on under the family name. He has three brothers—Mr. George Drummond, the present ostensible proprietor of the bank; the Rev. Arthur Drummond, rector of Charlton, near Blackheath, Kent; and Berkeley Drummond, colonel in the Fusilier Guards.

Colonel Drummond, who is at present stationed with his regiment at Windsor, arrived in town at a late hour, on receipt of the melancholy intelligence, and proceeded to his brother's residence in Grosvenor-square.

The following particulars complete the narrative of Mr. Drummond's condition up to the time of his death.

At five o'clock on Saturday the state of the patient was such that it was considered necessary to hold an immediate consultation at which it was deemed necessary to renew the bleeding, as the inflammation had very slightly subsided, but it was eventually determined to allow him to remain undisturbed until ten o'clock, when, if the symptoms did not take a favourable change, that course would be again resorted to. The difficulty of breathing which Mr. Drummond experienced was his most painful affection. This was stated to arise from the injury which one of the ribs is supposed to have sustained from the ball. A great number of leeches had been applied during the afternoon to the back, about the region of the wound.

Mr. Drummond, who is a bachelor, bore his sufferings with great fortitude. He was surrounded by the members of his family, who are plunged into the deepest distress by the melancholy calamity.

Mr. Drummond being a man of very full habit of body, the difficulty of obtaining blood from the arm was thereby much increased.

Lady Peel paid a visit of condolence to Miss Drummond, the sister of the invalid; and many members of her Majesty's Government made personal inquiries throughout the day as to Mr. Drummond's health.

In answer to inquiries on Sunday morning, the reply was, that Mr. Drummond had passed a favourable night, and that his breathing was less difficult than it had been.

During Sunday night, however, the patient experienced a relapse, and on Monday morning it was announced that an unfavourable change had taken place. Several consultations were held during Monday, which resulted in copious bleeding, but at midnight the critical appearances had not abated. On Tuesday morning another consultation of the medical gentlemen took place at half-past ten o'clock, and at its conclusion a bulletin was issued, stating that "Mr. Drummond still continued in a very precarious state."

During the whole of Tuesday no answer to all inquiries was, that the unfortunate gentleman was growing worse, and towards midnight the case assumed an entirely hopeless complexion. From this hour the pulse had entirely ceased at the wrist, and a final dissolution was momentarily expected; but he held out in the full possession of his senses until the hour above stated, when he expired.

At seven o'clock in the evening M'Naughten was removed from Bow-street to Tothill-fields Prison, where he was received by Lieut. Tracey, the governor, and placed in the cell formerly occupied by Courvoisier, the murderer of Lord William Russell, and more recently by Francis and Bean. In answer to questions put to him by the governor, the prisoner said he was much fatigued, and would like to get to bed as quickly as possible. His wishes were acceded to, and within the space of only a very few minutes he was sound asleep. Next morning the prisoner partook of breakfast, and made a hearty meal. When the hour approached for divine service he was asked if he had any objection to attend the chapel, and he replied, "No; he was of no particular creed, and he cared not where he went, or how far, provided he could hear a good sermon. The prisoner's behaviour in the chapel was decorous. At dinner-time refreshment was brought to him from a neighbouring public-house, and the prisoner consumed the whole with great gusto. In the afternoon Mr. Lavies, of King-street, the surgeon to the prison, proceeded to examine M'Naughten as to the state of mind. The answers returned convinced Mr. Lavies, as they also did Mr. Amyote, the chairman of the visiting magistrates, that the prisoner was not a lunatic.

On Monday afternoon Mr. Spalding, a carpenter, residing in the neighbourhood of Brynaston-square, went to Tothill-fields Bridewell, and stated that he knew the prisoner and his connections. He at one time resided in Stockwell-street, Glasgow, and in the same street resided Mr. M'Naughten, a wood-turner, the father of the prisoner. The father carried on a very extensive business, and was enabled, when the prisoner came of age, to start him in the same business. The prisoner, it appears, having got possession of the money requisite to establish him in business, set up in the same street as his father. Here he remained for some time and saved some money. He afterwards sold his business, deposited the money in the Glasgow Bank, and commenced what may be truly described as a life of vagabondism, and all trace of him was lost by his relatives. Mr. Spalding said that he had never witnessed any imbecility on the part of the prisoner, and he did not believe him to be mad; and further stated that he was satisfied that M'Naughten could not in the slightest manner be acquainted with any of the members of the Drummond family, still more so with his victim, nor could the attempt be made from being disappointed, as during the whole of the period he had been in the daily habit of seeing him, which extended over a period of more than twenty years, he had never been heard to express a wish to obtain a situation under Government: although exceedingly studious he was most unambitious. He was not known ever to give vent to a political opinion, his abilities being, as it were, completely confined to his own station in society. These particulars, which may be fully depended upon, tend to throw a greater mystery over the motive which has induced M'Naughten to commit so heinous an offence.

In the course of Monday several doctors of eminence connected with the various lunatic asylums of the metropolis, amongst whom were Doctors Monro and Sutherland, visited the prisoner and examined him professionally for the purpose of ascertaining whether he possessed in the slightest degree aberration of mind, and the result of the interview was a strong conviction on their minds that M'Naughten was perfectly sane, and that the statement made by him before Mr. Hall at Bow-street was a premeditated one.

The prisoner's meals are furnished at his own expense, an application having been made to Mr. Hall for a portion of the money found on him to be allotted for that purpose. To none of the turnkeys has he uttered a word further than when his dinner was conveyed to him on Monday, he observed "that it was very hard to be prevented the use of a knife and fork."

On Tuesday morning he asked to be supplied with writing materials, which having been brought, he wrote a note to a person named Gordon, who, he said, resided in Peter-street, Westminster, requesting that individual to come and see him at the prison. The note was sent to Peter-street, but Gordon was found to have left London for Glasgow some days since. In the afternoon there was a marked change in the demeanour of the prisoner. He appeared much more melancholy, and seemed to be brooding over his situation.

Nothing could be more indicative of self-possession than the prisoner's manner until he was told that Mr. Drummond had died a dying state: and when he received this information his face became flushed and red, and he broke out into incoherent exclamations as to the destruction of his mental faculties by means of Tory persecutions.

INQUEST ON THE BODY OF MR. DRUMMOND.

On Thursday, at four o'clock, a jury of highly-respectable gentlemen, inhabitants of the parish of St. George-the-martyr-square, assembled before J. H. Gell, Esq., coroner for the city and liberties of Westminster, at the Lion and Goat Tavern, Grosvenor-street, to investigate into the causes of Mr. Drummond's death.

Shortly after four o'clock the jury, having been sworn, proceeded to the late residence of the deceased, No. 19, Lower Grosvenor-street, for the purpose of viewing the body.

Mr. Maule, solicitor to the Treasury, attended to watch the proceedings on the part of the Crown, and among those present were a large number of personal friends of the deceased gentleman.

On the return of the jury to the inquest-room the first witness called was James Silver, police-constable 63 A division, who, having been sworn, repeated the evidence which he had given before the magistrates, and which will be found in our police reports of the case.

Robert Hodge sworn: I reside at No. 5, Alpha-place, Kentish-town, and am a carpenter. On Friday afternoon last, about twenty minutes before four, I was coming towards Charing-cross from the Horse Guards, and saw the accused walking about three yards behind deceased. I saw the man pull a pistol from his right-hand trousers pocket, present it at the gentleman, and fire. Mr. Drummond turned round, put his hand to his side and staggered two or three steps back. The accused also retreated two or three steps; and, as I was going up to him, he produced a second pistol, and thinking he would shoot me I ran into the road. I immediately heard a second report, and on turning round, I saw a policeman and another man get hold of the man who fired. There was no one near the deceased except this man.

Mr. Charles Guthrie, of 4, Berkeley-street, surgeon, was next sworn, and read his evidence from a written statement, which he said was signed by the other medical attendants of deceased. He said, I was first called to see deceased about 8 o'clock on Saturday evening last, and remained in attendance on him until his death. I found that Mr. Drummond had a wound in the front of the abdomen, which had been made to extract the bullet. He had also another wound in the back, near the spine. The deceased never spoke to me on the subject. He died at half past ten o'clock on Tuesday morning at his own house, 19, Grosvenor-street. I have this day made a post-mortem examination of the body in the presence of other persons. The body of the late E. Drummond, Esq., was opened by Mr. C. Jardine Guthrie, on Thursday, the 26th of January, at one o'clock, in the presence of Dr. Chambers, Dr. Hume, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Bransby Cooper, and Mr. Jackson. The ball entered behind, two inches from the spinal process or ridge of the back-bone, between the 11th and 12th rib, and three inches distant from the inferior angle of the shoulder-blade. It was extracted in front between the cartilages of the seventh and eighth rib, about ten inches distant from that part which is commonly called the pit of the stomach. The ball, after entering the cavity of the chest, slightly abrased the left lung at its lower and inferior edge, which part was covered by recent lymph, the lung being internally sound. The left side of the chest contained nearly a pint of red-coloured serum. The ball perforated the diaphragm, or muscular partition dividing the chest from the abdomen, it grazed the fat of the left kidney, and pressed through the great omentum below the stomach to the part where it was extracted, injuring no very important organ in the abdomen in its transit, but giving rise to an effusion of blood, which was found coagulated and diffused, to the amount of perhaps twelve ounces. The absence of all that shock and alarm which almost invariably followed the opening into either of the great cavities of the body, together with the great difficulty of ascertaining the spot at which the ball had entered, from its small size, gave rise, during the first twelve hours, to the anxious hope that it had not passed so directly across. We consider such a wound to be inevitably fatal. (Signed) W. F. Chambers, J. R. Hume, C. J. Guthrie, Bransby B. Cooper, Richard Jackson.

By the Coroner—The bullet was extracted from Mr. Drummond's body the same afternoon that he was shot, and died in consequence of the wound.

William Parry, footman to Miss Drummond, who resided in the same house with the deceased, identified the body viewed by the jury as that of Mr. Edward Drummond.

The coroner here inquired of the jury if they desired to have any more evidence. He considered the case now perfectly clear. The jury having acquiesced, the coroner desired them to consider their verdict, and, without a moment's hesitation, they unanimously pronounced a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Daniel M'Naughten, and the coroner at once made out a warrant for his committal to Newgate.

Mr. Maule begged to state that he was instructed to conduct the prosecution on behalf of the Crown.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

Netherby Hall, the seat of Sir James Graham, in Cumberland, took fire on Friday week, but was fortunately got under without doing any very extensive mischief.——The last census of the population of the city of Brussels makes the total amount 110,760, not including the garrison, the military school, and the patients in the hospital.——The great mercantile house of Paulin, Milan, and Son, in the city of Gothenburg, has declared itself insolvent. The debts are stated at 504,000 dollars, the assets at 789,000 dollars.——The number of horned cattle in the United Kingdom is estimated at 7,000,000, that of sheep at 32,000,000. Taking the former to be worth £10 each, the latter 25s., the total value will be £110,000,000.——Mr. Atkinson, rope-manufacturer, of Preston, has received an order from the Admiralty to manufacture 75,000 fathoms, or 85 miles 400 yards, of line for Captain Belcher, of the Samarang, going on an exploring expedition. Rather "a long yarn."——Captain Fitzroy's bill for ascertaining the qualifications of persons seeking to be masters and mates in the merchant service is meeting with great and determined opposition. A petition, signed by 94 shipmasters, against the bill has been confided to Sir J. Hanmer and Sir W. C. Jervis for presentation to the House of Commons.——A steamer between Cadiz and Algiers has been established by a French company. The first departure took place on the 31st ult.——On Monday a special general meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of Australia was held at the offices in Broad-street, when a dividend at the rate of five per cent. for the half year was declared.——On Sunday evening last the house of a baker, named Sasse, in Princes-street, Leicester-square, was entered by two well-dressed ruffians, who, finding the proprietor from home, knocked down the servant-maid, and rifled the parlour of a considerable amount of money, jewellery, and plate.——A man named Joseph Bevan, an agricultural labourer, has been committed to the county gaol of Gloucester for the wilful murder of his step-son, which he committed by stabbing him with a knife in the breast during a broil created by the boy's mother, who, it appears, is a woman of an irritable and unhappy temper.——The body of Mr. Gale, who had been missing from his residence, Wick-street, Hackney, was found in the Regent's Canal on Sunday morning, about one hundred yards from Bonner's Hall-bridge, near which spot he was last seen alive on the 28th of December.——An unusual degree of excitement prevailed in the neighbourhood on account of the deceased's absence, and a rumour that he had fallen into the hands of murderers had been circulated.——Immense flights of wild pigeons, supposed to be visitors from America, have appeared in the vicinity of the lakes and hills of Cumberland.——The master and journeymen tailors of the metropolis held a meeting at the National Association Hal. on Monday night last, for the purpose of adopting protective measures against the encroachments of the low-price shopsellers.——Rear-Admiral Henderson died last week at his residence in Aberdeenshire.—The sixth anniversary of the Buckingham Conservative Association took place on Tuesday last in the Corporation Hall of that town. Hi-Grace the Duke of Buckingham presided. Upwards of four hundred gentlemen sat down to dinner.——A Methodist preacher, named Wilkinson, was stopped on the road near Knaresborough last week by a gang of footpads, who sacrilegiously relieved him of the fruits of his missionary labours. Other highway robberies have occurred in various parts of the country, but none so flagrant as this.

Mr. Clement Wigney obtained his certificate in bankruptcy from Mr. Commissioner Holroyd on Tuesday last.——Thomas Pound, the conductor of one of Danby's Hammersmith omnibuses, was fined 20s. and the costs at the Marlborough-street police-office on Tuesday, and had his licence suspended, for deluding Captain Scott and his son with the promise of carrying them as far as Brentford, whilst his omnibus only piled as far as Hammersmith.——General Pasley has written to contradict a statement in some of the public journals, that the great mines intended to be fired near Dover were under the War-office direction and at the expense of Government. The whole of the preparations were made at the expense of the South Eastern Railway Company, and the credit of planning these mines is due to Mr. Cubitt, the engineer-in-chief of the company, who decided upon the position and quantity of powder to be used in each of the three great charges proposed.——Mr. Macdonnell, of Glengarry, is on his return from Australia. The young chief intended to fix his residence permanently in that country, but after a short experience he has abandoned the scheme, and will again betake himself to his native Highlands.——During the past week not less than one hundred and twenty-three sheep, the property of James Wickham, Esq., were stolen from Sutton farm, in the parish of Wonston, Hants.——Mrs. Mary Phillips, late of Nova Scotia, has just left behind her a large fortune, to be divided between St. George's Hospital, the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum, the Blind School, and the Welsh School in Gray's Inn-road.——The annual meeting of the Colonial Church Society was held at the Music Hall, Store-street, on Tuesday, when George Finch, Esq., was called to the chair. The report for the past year was highly favourable.——The report of two Spanish vessels having been seized by a Haytien man-of-war turns out to be correct. The vessels, however, have been since released and compensation offered, which has been for the present declined.——Her Majesty has ordered six dresses of the finest Paisley manufacture, with the benevolent view of restoring the drooping trade of that town.——The subject of gas-meters is at present occupying a good deal of public attention, which has been chiefly produced by the lectures of Mr. Jones, of the Adelaide Gallery, who has undertaken to demonstrate that, as at present constructed, those inventions impose a loss of 33 per cent. on the consumer.——The following are the official returns of the exports of the precious metals for the week ending Thursday se'nnight:—Silver coin to Hamburg 10,000 oz., to Rotterdam 5000, to Mogadore 3447; silver bars to Hamburg 42,600 oz.; gold coin to New York 112 oz.——The new Hospodar of Wallachia, George Bibesko (says a letter from Germany), is a man of 40, the richest landed proprietor in the country, and of considerable talent.——The burglars who robbed Mr. Sasse's house in Princes-street, Leicester-square, on Sunday, were arrested in the pit of the Olympic Theatre, on Tuesday night, by two police sergeants, of the detective force. It turns out that one of them, named Greyes, was a convicted thief, and the husband of Mr. Sasse's servant. The prisoners were remanded.——At a meeting of Merchants and Shipowners, held at the Hall of Commerce in Threadneedle-street, on Wednesday last, for the purpose of devising relief for the widows and children of the unfortunate seamen who perished in the late gales, it was agreed upon to hold a concert in the great room of that institution, for this charitable and benevolent purpose.——The fall of snow in Switzerland has been greater during the past winter than at any former period within the memory of man. In some places the drifts were fourteen and fifteen feet deep, and in the village of Marcote an avalanche destroyed several buildings and killed many head of cattle.——A weak-minded girl, named Emma Ranger, aged 21, committed suicide at Shoreditch, on Monday evening last, by swallowing a quantity of oxalic acid, in consequence of a man named John Wilkins, her paramour, having been arrested on a charge of robbery.——A respectable man, named Wheeler, committed suicide at Gravesend, on Sunday night last, by attaching a pig of iron to his body, and falling from a barge into the water.——Two suicides have occurred at Calais in as many days. The one was a ship broker's clerk, who having made various false speculations and got into difficulties, quietly let himself down from the jetty, refused any assistance, and was carried out by the tide and drowned. The other was an old commissioner attending hotels, somewhat of a drunkard, and whose wife carried a decent living by washing. He filled his pockets with stones, and drowned himself in the canal. They have both left wives and families to bewail their madness.——A plausible scoundrel, named David Pugh, was committed from Lambeth-street Police-office on Wednesday, to take his trial for inveigling a poor woman, named Lord, out of £10 on pretence of procuring her husband's discharge from the East India Company's service. The prisoner, it appears, is a returned transport.——On Wednesday evening two fellows perceiving a cask of white lead, weighing between six and seven cwt., at the door of Mr. Patrick, an oil and colourman, in High-street, Whitechapel, drew a truck along side the foot pavement. A servant in the employment of Mr. Cramp, butcher, and whose shop adjoins that of Mr. Patrick's, was at his master's door with one of the fellows in his cart. "Hallo, butcher, give us a hand with this," and the butcher assenting, the cask was placed on the truck, and was carried clear off by the thieves.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the vicinity of the Castle as usual. Her Majesty and her illustrious Consort again promenaded in the afternoon. His Royal Highness went out with his harriers, attended by the Earl of Morton, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Colonel Bouverie. The meet was at Mr. Mason's farm at Upton. His Royal Highness returned to the Castle before two, after an excellent run. The Duchess of Kent, Lady Fanny Howard, Sir G. Couper, and Colonel Arbuthnot joined the royal dinner circle.

Her Majesty has been deeply affected by the news of the death of Mr. Drummond, and countermanded many of the visits which were to have been paid to the Castle. Sir Robert and Lady Peel were to have been visitors to her Majesty, if it had not been for the heart-rending blow which has so suddenly afflicted them.

LINCOLN'S INN, Jan. 27.—The following gentlemen were this day called to the degree of barrister-at-law by the honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, viz.:—John Unthank, Esq., Charles Reade, Esq., Edward Marcus Attwood, Esq., Charles James Preston, Esq., Peregrine Roberts, Esq., William Browne, Esq., Edmund Banbury, Esq., and John Gorham Maitland, Esq.

GREAT BLAST AT THE DOVER RAILWAY.—The great blast at Rounddown Cliff, consisting of 18,500lbs., or eight-and-a-half tons of gunpowder, which has lately produced so great a sensation in the scientific world, was fired off on Tuesday, at two o'clock. Long before this hour every height (at a respectful distance) commanding a view of the immense cliff intended to be operated upon was studded with spectators, and excellent arrangements were made by the company to avoid accidents. A line of demarcation was marked off by signals, and police and military were stationed along this line, to keep the populace from approaching within it. The Rounddown Cliff overhangs the sea, close to the one whose fearful height is so graphically described in King Lear, and commonly known by the classic name of "Shakspere's Cliff." The original intention of the South-eastern Railway Company was to carry a tunnel through the portion of the headland which overhangs the beach here through the bowels of the Shakspere; but, from the circumstance of tremendous falls having taken place on either side during the progress of the works, and from these falls having affected the stability of the cliff, the expedient of blasting it was very judiciously resolved on. A mine, consisting of three cells, was accordingly planned and formed by Mr. Cubitt, the engineer of the company, in the base of the cliff, into which the enormous quantity of powder above named was placed, and the ignition of the charges by the voltaic battery was performed by Lieutenant Hutchinson, of the Royal Sappers, who was employed lately by Major-General Pasley in operating against the wreck of the Royal George. Punctual to their arrangement, the miners communicated the electric spark to the gunpowder by their connecting wires, on the signal being given—the earth trembled under our feet to half a mile distant—a stifled report, not loud, but deep, was heard; the base of the cliff, extending on either hand to upwards of five hundred feet, was shot, as from a cannon from under the superincumbent mass of chalk seaward, and in a few seconds, not less, we should say, than 1,000,000 tons of chalk were precipitated by the shock, and settled gently down into the sea below. Tremendous cheers followed the blast, and a royal salute was fired. The sight was indeed truly magnificent. Such was the precision of the engineers, and the calculations of Mr. Cubitt, that it would appear so much of the cliff has been removed as was wanted to make way for the sea-wall; and it is reckoned the blast will save the company £1000 worth of hand labour. Not the slightest accident occurred. On the cliffs we noticed Major-General Pasley, Sir J. Herschell, and many engineers, together with a host of scientific men.

FOREIGN.

The Paris papers of Wednesday have reached us. The debate on the address in the Chamber of Peers terminated on Wednesday with a second triumph for ministers, when the numbers were—for the address 117; against it 33; majority 84. This overwhelming defeat must have extinguished altogether the hopes of the unprincipled coalition to which M. Guizot is opposed.

ANNIVERSARIES.

EXECUTION OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

Here is another of the "anniversaries" of English history—one of the darkest, the deepest, and most impressive of any age or time. The death of Charles the First has a monumental record in our metropolis and more than a monumental record in the heart of posterity and the memories of reading men. Except those haunting themes of poetry presented in the life and death of Mary Queen of Scots, there are few subjects in English history,—isolated, by their peculiar beauty and absorbing interest, from all meaner incidents—more noble in spirit, more touching in remembrance, more forcible in impression, and more absolutely appealing by their character to the imagination and very soul of the painter, than this of the last moments of the fated monarch. The associations that crowd themselves into the memory with the characters which form the grouping of the scene—the recollection of events which immediately preceded it in the awful drama of the times—the shadows of a dark history passing in pageantry before the mind, with strange contrasted forms of rebellion and fidelity, of courage and cowardice, of virtue and treachery, of piety and blasphemy, of grace, loveliness, affection, with selfishness, ferocity, and ambition: all the bad and good elements of humanity, in short, brought strikingly into play—these thoughts and memories, blending with the full inspiring awe and interest of the scene itself, lend it a pervading fervour and a deepened charm, and invest it with a sublime poetry that wears its intense beauty not more in the grand reality of the breathing picture, than in the visions and aspirations of the gazer's mind. The subject, too, possesses an universality, for the history of the death of Charles is one familiar to the ear of the world. It was a life-sacrifice extorted by the rage of a people, and given by its victim without shame or fear. Charles was, indeed, perhaps more a king upon the scaffold than in any other contingency of his disturbed unpeaceful life. His countenance was described by the poets and historians of that and after times as wearing a look of resignation most dignified and serene:—

> No storm is in his human heart,
> No strife upon his brow,
> Where calmness, like a potent child,
> Sits almost smiling now!
> Seems the meek Monarch, as like one
> Whose gentle spirit sings
> Its song of solace to the soul
> Before it spreads its wings!
> And filling, ere it takes its flight,
> His features with a holy light!
> Yet that serenest heavenly look
> Wears well its taunt of earth;
> And mortal majesty retains
> The impress of its birth!
> The lion doth not hang his mane,
> The eagle droop his wing;
> The lofty glance, the regal mien,
> Fall only with the king;
> And Charles's calm, unquailing eye
> Shames all who thought he feared to die!

These last lines would seem to be derived from a sentence of D'Israeli's, with reference to the undignified assertions, then made by certain traitors, impugning the courage of their monarch, "These mean spirits," says the eloquent writer, "had flattered themselves that he who had been cradled in royalty—who had lived years in the fields of honour—and was now, they presumed, a recreant in imprisonment—'the grand delinquent of England,' as they called him—would start in horror at the block. This last triumph, at least, was not reserved for them; it was for the king." The triumph depicted here, however, is loftier than that of mere human exultation, which both poet and historian imply; it is the high, pure, simple, triumph of virtue—mild in the eye, bland upon the brow, gentle in the utterance; it is the triumph of the good spirit pouring forth, to a world it would console rather than rebuke, its parting consciousness of peace: "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can have place." These holy words convey the whole strength and meaning of the monarch's attitude and features.

The immediate act of the execution has been thus forcibly described:—"Men could discover in the King no indecent haste or flurry of spirits—no trembling of limbs—no disorder of speech—no start of horror. The blow was struck. An universal groan, as it were—a supernatural voice—the like never before heard, broke forth from the house and countless multitude. All near the scaffold pressed forward to gratify their opposite feelings by some memorial of his blood—the blood of a tyrant or a martyr! The troops immediately dispersed on all sides the mournful or the agitated people."

The following verse from a poem published on the subject, in the Times Newspaper, is a sort of paraphrase of Hume's account of the immediate consequences of Charles's execution.

> A few brief moments, and the martyr dies.
> Dies in that sweet serenity of soul!
> Then rush quick tears into the nation's eyes,
> Over all hearts grief's sudden waters roll,
> And sorrow raves and sobs without control.
> Now brave men's spirits are bow'd down to earth,
> Slander is hushed, and vengeance droops her wing,
> And women give their babes untimely birth,*
> Shock'd at the murder of their honoured King!
> And misery flings her mourning over earth,
> And fame (too late) is loud with the lost Monarch's worth.

CARISBROOK CASTLE,

Which stands in the Isle of Wight, was one of the prisons of the unhappy monarch. It stands about a mile from Newport, the chief town of the island, upon an eminence overlooking the village of Carisbrook, claims a Saxon origin, and dates, some antiquaries say, as early as the sixth century. After the Norman invasion the castle was greatly enlarged, and in Elizabeth's reign the buildings were enclosed by a wall, and surrounded by a moat; as they still remain. Twenty acres of ground are included in the entire fortifications, and the circuit of the walls is three fourths of a mile. The keep stands on the north side, upon the summit of an artificial mount, of nearly sixty feet in height; only the lower portion of this, however, now remains. The prospect from this point is "beautiful exceedingly." The eye takes in the varied and picturesque surface of the island, engirt all round by the sea; and traversing Spithead and busy Portsmouth, with its fleet and dockyards, extends up the Southampton-water—the horizon on the one side closing in upon the neighbouring counties, and upon the other sinking in the far-off dim outline of the Channel.

THE KEEP OF CARISBROOK CASTLE.

Like most castellated structures, Carisbrook has had its share of "battles, sieges, dangers." It has often been attacked by the French, and upon one occasion, in 1377, a band from that country, who came to attempt its capture, fell into an ambuscade, and were all slain in a narrow pass called to this day, in memory of the event, Deadman's Lane. But Carisbrook gains space in our columns from the fact of its having been the prison of Charles the First, during the year previous to his execution—the ANNIVERSARY of which event we now illustrate. On the fifth of November, 1647, the king fled from Hampton Court, with only two attendants, and without any settled place of refuge. Riding all night, morning found the party in the New Forest, and they repaired to Titchfield, the house of the Earl of Southampton, in the neighbourhood of which they were. This, however, not offering security, the King determined upon seeking a friend in the nephew of his chaplain, Colonel Hammond, Governor of the Isle of Wight. A more unhappy selection could not have been made, as the Colonel was a devoted partizan of Cromwell, and a relative of Hampden. He received the fallen monarch into Carisbrook, at first as a guest, but soon changed the King's position into that of prisoner. His attendants were dismissed, his walks curtailed, and he was ultimately given to understand that the ramparts and the castle-yard were boundaries beyond which he must not pass. Much of the King's time was now occupied in reading, and Tasso, Ariosto, and the Faery Queen were favourite companions of his solitary hours. It is not surprising that plans of escape also filled a portion of his thoughts, and an interesting account of these may be sought by the curious scholar in the "Threnodia Carolina," of Sir Thomas Herbert. The first attempt was made December the 29th, and failed, it is said, through the carelessness of a Captain Burley, who was to conduct it. This gentleman was captain of Yarmouth Castle, and lost his life at the hands of the executioner as the recompense of his loyalty and failure. Shortly after one Firebrace proposed a plan, and the King had so far succeeded as to have partially forced his way through a window still pointed out, and which our engraving represents; but perceiving a crowd of enemies watching below gave up the attempt. Hammond, having gained information of the intended attempt, had placed a guard, with orders to shoot the King had he succeeded in passing through the window. After this the unhappy monarch abandoned himself to despair—allowing his beard and hair to go untrimmed—until he at length looked "half savage and quite desolate," and in this state continued up to September, 1648, when he was removed to Newport "to confer with commissioners appointed by the Parliament." On the 29th of November he was seized by a party of troops, sent for that purpose, and six weeks later found him upon the scaffold!

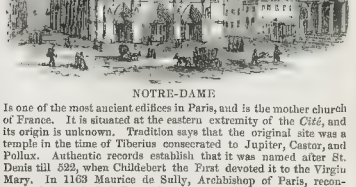
VIEWS IN PARIS.—No. III.



NOTRE-DAME

Is one of the most ancient edifices in Paris, and is the mother church of France. It is situated at the eastern extremity of the Cité, and its origin is unknown. Tradition says that the original site was a temple in the time of Tiberius consecrated to Jupiter, Castor, and Pollux. Authentic records establish that it was named after St. Denis till 522, when Childebert the First devoted it to the Virgin Mary. In 1163 Maurice de Sully, Archbishop of Paris, reconstructed the cathedral, Pope Alexander the Third laying the first stone. Henry, legate of the Papal see, constructed, in 1182, the great altar. Its chapels are of the 14th century. The above edifice is 414 feet long, 102 in height, and 144 wide. The architecture is Gothic, and the boldness and singularity of nearly 300 immense columns, with no less than 45 chapels, inspire the spectator with awe and admiration. A double colonnade of 120 enormous columns will be much admired. The façade has an imposing appearance. There are three portals of unequal elevation, that of the N.E. being remarkable for eleven signs of the Zodiac sculptured. The twelfth that of the Virgin, is in larger proportions, and is placed on the pitch, separating the two doors. The portals of the two extremities are surmounted by two large square towers, 40 feet square, and are 204 feet high, from the summit of which there is an extensive view

Paris and its fortifications. The ascent of 389 steps is easy, and it has been frequently chosen, like the column in the Place Vendôme and the Triumphal Arch, as a place for suicide,—the French not thinking it worth while to shut up their public monuments because some crazy people choose to hurl themselves from their summits. Victor Hugo's dizzy description of the hurling of the monk by Quasimodo forces itself on the mind when at the top of one of these towers. The exterior of Notre-Dame has been much improved lately by the removal of buildings which formerly disfigured it. Visitors linger most, however, in the splendid choir, with its stalls for the Archbishop, and its immense brazen eagle in the centre. The scriptural subjects of the bas-reliefs are finely developed, and the paintings, by the most distinguished French masters, fix the eye for some time. The relics left by the Revolution in the sanctuary are as authentic as most relics are. The chapels are restored in great part. Midnight mass on Christmas-eve, and the great religious festivals, attract large congregations on account of the music, which is on the most extensive scale. After the July revolution Notre Dame was shorn of many honours; but a religious reaction has made great progress lately in France, and the King of the French, to his honour, has been encouraging it. So long as the royalist archbishop was living little was done for the church in France; but the present prelate, being dynastic, has entered cordially into the King's views. The first great sign of reconciliation was at the christening of the Count of Paris, and all the gorgeous attributes of the Papal church were put in requisition on that interesting occasion; followed, alas! so speedily by the last funeral ceremonial for the father—the lamented Duke of Orleans. Still it was a remarkable fact, during the funeral of the late Prince Royal, to witness, for the first time since 1830, the clergy walking in a public procession. Notre Dame was then supreme in the celebration of the cathedral rites, St. Denis having been neglected to make way for the metropolitan see. It was a striking contrast in the two ceremonies—the christening and the funeral—following each other in such rapid succession. In the former, the head of the Orleans branch of the Bourbons saw the consolidation of his dynasty by a reconciliation with the church; in the latter, the stricken King could only see the grave of his hopes, and the prospect of convulsion from the perils of a long regency. But still the Gothic edifice remains there untouched by time, and its towers frown on the fleeting mortals whom ambition leads within its massive walls. Nineteen centuries, and there is Notre Dame still. What changes is this structure yet doomed to outlive?

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXVIII.

SIR G. MURRAY, G.C.B., G.C.H.

The name of Sir George Murray, distinguished as it is, by long and gallant service in the field, and familiar as it has been made by his political connection with the Cabinet, has recently been brought more prominently before the public, as the probable commander-in-chief of the army, should that honourable and onerous post be resigned by the Duke of Wellington, who has, it is generally believed, only for a time succeeded to it by the decease of Lord Hill. Sir George Murray is the second son of Sir W. Murray, by the youngest daughter of the Earl of Cromartie, and was born in 1772. He is, therefore, ripe both in years and honours—which, numerous as they are, have been hardly earned in full many a "well foughten field;" for, as he entered the army at an early age, he was engaged throughout the whole of the war which sprung up after the French Revolution, and devastated the Continent for nearly a quarter of a century. He has served or led in the army of England in almost every scene of its most celebrated conflicts; among the dykes of Holland, on the sands of Egypt, on the sierras of Spain, on the heights of the Pyrenees, and on the soil of France itself, when the invader of nations became in its turn the invaded, and when, exhausted by years of strife and bloodshed, it fell overpowered in the unequal contest with many nations united against one.

By the last change in the position of parties he is again in office, as Master-General of the Ordnance, the duties of which his military experience enables him to discharge with credit to himself and advantage to the country. The personal appearance of Sir George, though he is "something touched by time," is still distinguished by that bearing and carriage which speaks of the soldier as well as of the gentleman. He is above the middle height, and, notwithstanding the wear and tear of his active life, looks much younger than he really is. A stranger, on meeting him, would say, without knowing his profession, that he was a military man; no longer young, but wearing his years well, and likely to enjoy his honours for many yet to come.

Sir George Murray entered the army as an ensign in 1789, his first commission being dated the 12th of March in that year. The French revolution had then commenced; but it was not till a few years later, when France had guillotined its King, and declared war with all the monarchies and aristocracies of the world, that England entered into that war of which the long duration and the stupendous results were so little foreseen by either of the powers engaged in it. In one of the earliest movements of that war Sir G. Murray was engaged—the campaign in Holland in 1793-94. In the disastrous occupation of the same country in 1799 he was also employed, and here he was wounded. When the French invasion of Egypt called our arms into that part of the world, Sir G. Murray accompanied the force under Abercrombie, and was present in the different actions which called into exercise the tactics of modern Europe on the soil of the Pharaohs, whose pyramids re-echoed the roar of European artillery, while from their summits "forty centuries looked down" upon the combatants. The ever-changing necessities of service recalled him to Europe, and in 1807 he accompanied the expedition to Copenhagen, in which the success that attended the British arms was much more indisputable than the justice of the policy which dictated the operations. After this came that episode in the great history which became so celebrated as to be called a war in itself—"the war of the Peninsula." In all the battles that succeeded the despatching of an auxiliary army to the assistance of Spain, Sir G. Murray bore a distinguished part: he shared the disasters and the retreat on Corunna, and the triumph of the memorable battle under the walls of that town, where the English army, like a lion at bay, turned in desperation on its pursuers, and terminated a succession of defeats by a brilliant victory. He was afterwards present in all the sanguinary battles of Spain, which have given that country a renown as a scene of strife, similar to that which caused Flanders to be called the "old prize-fighting ground of Europe," in the days of Marlborough and Prince Eugene. We need only mention the names of Talavera, Busaco, Vittoria, Fuentes d'Onor, Nivelles, Orthez, the Pyrenees, and they will of themselves speak to the nature of the military career of Sir G. Murray. He was also present at the battle of Toulouse. For these distinguished services he did not go unrewarded; he was created a G.C.B. in 1816; and for the different Spanish actions in which he was engaged he received a cross and five clasps. From 1818 to 1824 he was Governor of Sandhurst College. He was also called on to fill other posts more important in a political point of view. Like his great commander the Duke of Wellington, peace left him at leisure to devote himself to the civil service of his country instead of the military. He was Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance during the years 1824 and 1825; and from the latter year till 1828 he was Commander of the Forces in Ireland. For two years, namely, from 1828 to 1830, he filled the office of Colonial Secretary, now held by Lord Stanley. On the fall of the Wellington Administration in 1830, he, of course, followed his party, and continued unemployed till 1834, when he was made Master-General of the Ordnance, a post which he did not long hold, being succeeded, in 1835, by the late Lord Vivian, to whom he was opposed in the field of politics, though they must have often been side by side in the field of battle. For eight years, from 1824 to 1832, he represented the county of Perth in Parliament; he was also again elected in 1834, but is not at present in the House of Commons.

MAP OF THE COAST OF THE LATE WRECKS.

WRECKS OF "THE RELIANCE" AND "THE CONQUEROR" INDIAMEN.

By the courtesy of Mr. Wyld, the eminent geographer, we are enabled to present the annexed chart of coast of the scene of the recent disasters on the French coast, with a view to attempt some explanation of the causes of these melancholy wrecks—or rather the cause, for both are inferred by many persons to be referable to the same fatal error, of mistaking the lighthouse of Cape Grisner for that of Dungeness. Mr. R. Green, the managing owner of the Reliance, states that "the French land recedes at Merlimont, where the Reliance struck, so as to form a small bay, into which ships are often carried by the current, which, in that part, sets constant on the coast, while the coast itself is so low and flat as not to be visible at a short distance, especially in hazy weather. Etaples is the eastern extremity of this bay, and juts out so far that it repeatedly happens in dark weather that ships standing up the Channel, and drifted into the bay, are first made aware of being so near land by seeing the light of Etaples on their larboard bow. In their own phrase, they are taken completely aback; and, judging from what they see that all previous calculations are wrong, they conclude they must have run by mistake upon the English coast. They tack, to give what they take to be Dungeness a wide berth, and go right on shore." Mr. Green adds, that the captain knowing himself to be in or near the narrowest part of the Channel, with the wind from the south-west, preferred, as a matter of prudence, to keep the French rather than the English coast, which would have been to them a lee-shore. "Some miles along the shore where they struck is a long sand-bank, on which they may have had as little as 8 fathoms. Nearer to shore the depth increases to 12, 14, 16, and 18. The distance between 10 and 6 fathoms, as the current set them still nearer to the land, was so little, that the delay in wearing the ship may have been sufficient to remove it; and in that latter depth some other sand-bank must have suddenly reduced the soundings from 6 fathoms in midships to 4 fathoms at stern."

The point at which the Conqueror struck is stated to have been six miles from Merlimont, off the Point de Lornet (not the town of Lornet, as hitherto related), at the entrance of the Canche, or river of Etaples, which is situated on the north side; and, at this entrance, are many banks, most of which are so shifting, that they cannot be exactly described. It may be mentioned, that the long sand-bank has 7½ fathoms on that part which extends S.W. by S., across the mouth of the river Canche, at five miles from it.

To prevent the recurrence of such disasters it has been proposed that another vessel should be moored in mid-channel; but a correspondent of the Times of Thursday (a captain, late E. I. M. S.) considers that such attempts fail to urge the only remedy "lead and look out." "Before the Seven Stones, Start-point, St. Catherine's, Beachy-head, and the South Sand-head lights were established, the prevailing rule was, when a westerly gale was blowing, 'to heave to,' when it was supposed the ship was off the Wight, with head to the northward, keeping the lead continually going, only bearing up when the land was distinctly seen, so as to run up with great caution to Beachy-head, thus insuring safety. All our lights are on the most improved principle, and it is, I fear, generally supposed that they must be seen; therefore, if in running up Channel St. Catherine's is not seen it is attributed to accident; the ship is continued on her course, probably with a strong flood tide, with the assurance that Beachy-head light will be seen, when, to the astonishment of all on board, the ship is found on the Boulogne coast, on a lee-shore, and destruction awaiting all on board. This arises from overrunning the distance, occasioned by smoother water than has been experienced in the Atlantic, the tides, and a mistaken confidence in seeing our lights."

We add a few notes on the coast. Two miles S. ½ E. from Ambleteuse is Wimreux, where there is a basin capable of containing several sail of vessels. S.S.W. two and three quarter miles from Wimreux, and near three leagues south from Cape Grisner, is the entrance of Boulogne harbour. Between Ambleteuse and Boulogne are several rocks under water, at the distance of two or three cables' length from the land. The harbour of Boulogne, which was dry at low water, and nearly barred by the sandbank, has been much improved of late years, but is still difficult of access, and has not water enough when the tide is out. It consists of the channel of the River Lianne, and of a semicircular basin on the left bank of the river. At low water the vessels rest in the mud, through which the stream finds its way to the ocean. From the mouth of the river two piers are carried out about 2000 feet into the sea.

In the sailing directions for the English Channel we find the distance between Boulogne and the mouth of the Canche, or harbour of Etaples, to be high land, and to have a whitish appearance from the sea; but this does not coincide with Mr. Green's statement. The only port of note between Boulogne and Dieppe is St. Valery; but the entrance to its harbour is impeded by a great bank, extending two miles out to sea, but over which the tide rises only eight or nine feet.

LITERATURE.

LETTERS ON SOUTH AMERICA, COMPRISING TRAVELS ON THE BANKS OF THE PARANA AND RIO DE LA PLATA. By J. P. and W. P. ROBERTSON, Authors of "Letters on Paraguay," and "Francia's Reign." In 3 volumes. John Murray.

As there are men who ride their hobby-horses to death, so there are authors who, having got hold of a good subject, will never give it up. They write perhaps one valuable and interesting book on it, and on the strength of the credit they have thus established with the public, they proceed to make a series of experiments on their patience, which are perhaps only brought to a close when the stock of that inestimable commodity is exhausted. The dishes of the first course are hashed up for re-entry at the second, and after a cup or two of well-flavoured tea, we are expected to swallow the sweepings of the urn and the dregs of the slop-basin.

Although the work before us is constructed in great part on these principles, it is nevertheless a readable book, to those at least to whom the subject is new, which is more than can be said for many books published now-a-days. It is written in the gossiping style which a traveller might use, in recounting his adventures to his friends, after his return home, over the social board. As might be expected, it is inferior in all respects, both in the amount of information, and in the spirit with which it is written, to the work on South America, to two or three chapters on Edinburgh and the Highlands of Scotland; yet we fear we have not seen the last of them, since in the concluding sentence, in which they speak of "this series of our Letters on South America," they seem to hint at a future three volume sequel. When this appears, we trust they will have the good sense and taste to drop the farce of the epistolary form, or rather appellation, for they treat us in a very dry manner with character but the name; no one would suppose that they ever passed, as such, from one person to another: they are plainly sketches, or recollections, and nothing else. Great part of these "letters" is occupied by a narrative of the occurrences of the revolution in Buenos Ayres, and the adjacent regions. We cannot say that this possesses much interest. Milton's remark on the history of the Anglo-Saxons may be applied with quite as much truth and force to the South Americans,—that their wars and dissensions are no more worth recording than the squabbles of so many kites and crows. We recommend the authors also not to go beyond their depth, or meddle with matters of which they are ignorant. What do they mean by saying (vol. ii. p. 265) that "the high-toned Thucydides makes a display of a Grecian navy, which might have been stowed away, men and all, in the hold of one of our seventy-fours?"

When the brothers Robertson arrived in 1815 at Corrientes, the capital town of a province on the Parana, several hundred miles from Buenos Ayres, they found the country in a state of complete disorganization, ravaged in every direction by the Gauchos, a race of men utterly uncivilized, half-pastoral, half-bandit. Southey, in his "History of Brazil," has drawn a frightful picture of the life of a similar class in that country. We will place before our readers the authors' account of one of the better kind of those personages, who, strange to say, was a Hibernian by birth, a deserter from the army which General Beresford commanded, on the expedition to the river Plate.

DON PEDRO CAMPBELL, THE IRISH GAUCHO.

Sitting one evening under the corridor of my house, there came up to my very chair, on horseback, a tall, raw-boned, ferocious-looking man, in Gaucho attire, with two cavalry pistols stuck in his girdle, a sabre in a rusty steel scabbard pending from a besmeared belt of half-tanned leather, red whiskers and mustache,—hair uncombed of the same colour, matted with perspiration, and powdered with dust. His face was not only burnt almost to blackness by the sun, but it was blistered to the eyes; while large pieces of shrivelled skin stood ready to fall from his parched lips. He wore a pair of plain ear-rings, a foraging cap, a tattered poncho, blue jacket, with tarnished red facings; a large knife in a leathern sheath; a pair of potro boots, and rusty iron spurs, with rowels an inch and a half in diameter. His horse was a noble animal, and sweated profusely. His gored sides were panting; his nostrils distended: he champed his enormous bit, tossing his head till he foamed at the mouth, and besprinkled both his own body and that of his master with froth.

Behind this Orlando Furioso there rode one whom he called his page (pronounced in Spanish gutturally pahy-e), but who was a grey-headed man. He was the counterpart of his master, except that the locks in the one case were red, and in the other jet black, coarse and tangled as the uncombed mane of a colt just taken up from the plain. The page rode with the head of his horse close upon the tail of his master's; and then, both throwing the reins over the heads of their jaded steeds, they dismounted. I took them for two of the most ferocious of Arrigo's bandits, and expected every moment would presently be followed by more of the same class, I muttered, sub silentio, "Ave Maria, ora pro nobis."

As I was ever wont to do upon occasions of such ominous visits, I rose and requested my two guests to be seated. Often had I gone through a similar ceremony with the Antiguenos, but never with two such fierce-looking troopers as those who now stood before me. I ordered some maté to be made to order porter and spirits, and to bring out some silver, when, to my great astonishment, but still greater delight, the master of the page respectfully took off his foraging cap, made an awkward obeisance, and said in bad Spanish, with an accent which soon convinced me he was no Creole Gaucho, "No se affija, Senor Robertson, estamos buen aqui." (Don't put yourself out of the way, Mr. Robertson, we are very well as we are.) The Hibernian brogue, the mangled Spanish, the countenance when closely scanned, the carroty locks, and bright grey eyes, all revealed to me a son of the Sister Isle, transformed into a more fearful-looking Gaucho than any native one I had ever beheld.

VOYAGE DOWN THE PARAGUAY.

I came down the river Paraguay in a piragua, a vessel unknown to the English reader. Although it floats on the waters, and conveyed me and all the effects of our Paraguay property safely from Assumption to Corrientes, it was a vessel propelled by neither wind nor steam. It was, as elsewhere described, a large square box, with a sort of house, or, as it was called, trough, built on the top of it; and, being only guided by huge oars or sweeps, the navigating in it was anything but plain sailing. After six days of unwearied exertion, however, my sturdy and laborious Paraguay crew brought the piragua to the mouth of the Paraguay, or to the confluence of that river and the Parana, a short way above Corrientes. As we emerged from behind an island which lay in our way, on the Paraguay, and obstructed our view, all at once the mighty expanse of the mingling waters of those two majestic rivers burst upon our ravished eyes. I know not elsewhere part of the world a grander piece of scenery is to be found. The waters, at the confluence, spread out like a great estuary, and many beautiful islands be scattered on their surface. The surrounding and more distant banks are on all sides clothed with wood, and on the Parana border the fine rising grounds which swell up behind enhance the beauty of the scene. Strong currents and eddies whirl in the various channels, and play about the islands; till, coming to a lower point, the grand and deepening body of the united streams, compressed in breadth, flows down in smooth and tranquil silence. The two rivers, after they have become one, maintain, for many miles, their respective colours, in a clearly defined line—the Paraguay having a red and muddy appearance, the Parana a clear and pellucid one; but both merging, at last, into this glassy and pellucid aspect.

We close our extracts with an account of the strange manner in which the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres amused themselves during the Carnival.

The Sunday afternoon being among all Catholics devoted to amusement and recreation, on the one which preceded Ash Wednesday the carnival commenced. It approached with insidious moderation. As you walked along the street, you found yourself suddenly besprinkled with eau de Cologne, by some fair lady sitting at her window; and presently you saw a gaily-dressed throwing rose-water in at some other casement. If you made a call, some scented water was perhaps gently discharged at you from a small ivory syringe; or two or three of the inmates might bedew you at once from their lavender bottles. Nay, a plover's egg might be thrown at you, which, breaking on your head or body, you found it to be only the shell filled with eau de mille fleurs, which immediately perfumed both yourself and the room. This would have been very agreeable, had the diversion stopped here. But on going out on Monday morning the streets gave signs here and there of being unquietly well watered. Suddenly you found yourself partially drenched, not by eau de mille fleurs, but by common well water. As you stopped somewhat angrily to dry yourself, behold a sudden discharge from the other side of the street, which fell upon you like a shower-bath. You found by degrees that you had to proceed with increased caution; for, not only from the houses, but from passengers in the street, you were liable at every turn to have a ducking. After siesta, about four o'clock in the afternoon, the skirmishing evidently increased. Jars full of water were thrown on all passers-by, and those who were on one azotea exchanged shots with their neighbours on the next: numerous syringes were used in the streets for attacking the house-tops; and egg-shells, which had been in process of collection for many previous weeks, and which were sold by the dozen for the occasion filled with water, and closed at the end, flew about like so many bombs, while the casements of the fair damsels who occupied the ramparts of the besieged citadels; that is, the azoteas of the houses, consisting generally of only the ground-floor. But Sunday and Monday sunk into utter insignificance when compared with Tuesday, the real "Derby" of the carnival week. As if the two previous days had only been a sort of trial of strength, the terrible battle was waged on the third and concluding day. It was as if Buenos Ayres was a city of mad-houses, and all the inmates of them simultaneously let loose. The highest families and the most delicate females caught the infection. One would have thought that they had unlocked the gates of the Bedlam to come down with all his stores, in order to give effect to the saturnalia of the people of his capital. Tubs, casks, slipper-baths, jars, jugs, and mugs were all arranged on the azoteas. The streets were manned by the fair damsels who occupied the ramparts of the besieged citadels; that is, the azoteas of the houses, consisting generally of only the ground-floor. Tubs, casks, slipper-baths, jars, jugs, and mugs were all arranged on the azoteas. The streets were manned by masked horsemen and by pedestrians, darting the fair ones on the housetops to battle. Family fought with family, and streams of water flowed through the streets, washed the walls, and filled the interior of the houses. Sometimes carried away by an irresistible paroxysm, the ladies would rush from the azotea to the front gate, to make quite sure of deluging some individual picked out from the crowd. Now a door was attacked by a band of young men, carried by them, and then they were seen on the azotea, engaged at close quarters in a water combat with the inmates. All of course were drenched to the skin, the robes of the ladies clinging to their forms, and the water dripping from them as if they had just come out of their baths. The encounters in the street were often of the rudest, nay, almost savage kind. Horsemen ran up against horsemen, knives sometimes gleamed, missiles went through the air, particularly ostrich eggs, which, from their immense weight, were always dangerous, and, in some cases, proved fatal; and every soul being drenched, horses and all, the irresistible fancy took on a quiet spectator's mind was, that universal insanity pervaded the town. Many accidents, of course, every year occurred: and I believe not a few females of delicate constitution died from the effects of cold, caught during their eight and forty hours continuous immersion in water.

CRITICISMS IN ART, AND SKETCHES OF THE PICTURE GALLERIES OF ENGLAND. By WILLIAM HAZLITT. With Catalogues of the Principal Galleries, now first collected. 1 vol., 12mo., pp. 335. John Templeman.

A republication of Hazlitt's "Criticisms on Art," which, as a collection of amusing essays on that inviting subject, written no doubt partly for effect, but containing much excellent matter, will be generally agreeable.

MULTUM IN PARVO; a new Work on Astronomy, the Magnet, Tides, &c., with engraved Illustrations: Longitude gained by several new Methods, and a perfect System of Nav gation, totally dispensing with Mercator's Sailing. By THOMAS HEDGCOCK, Master R.N. Second Edition. Printed and Published for the Author. 1 vol., 8vo., pp. 112.

Every navigator should have this book, the scientific attainments shown in which reflect much credit on the author.

POUNDS, SHILLINGS, AND PENCE. By T. MARTIN, Accountant. 1 vol., 12mo. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

A useful manual for commercial men, containing a great variety of monetary calculations, with several new rules which the author's experience has enabled him to furnish.

AN EFFICIENT REMEDY FOR THE DISTRESS OF NATIONS. By JOHN GRAY, author of the "Social System, a Treatise on the Principle of Exchange." Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black.

Mr. Gray states that "he is just as satisfied as if the fact had already taken place, that the principle of exchange herein advocated will one day govern the commercial transactions of every civilized nation." And again, "The remedy I now propose inevitably must and will be adopted at some period or other; it might as well be so within the next five years as within the next five hundred; and it would be far better to adopt it now than even a century hence, so far as the prosperity of mankind is concerned."—(Preface, p. v.)

Our readers will be curious to know what the panacea is in which the author expresses such over-weening confidence. This consists in transferring the operations of manufactures, by which the innumerable wants of society are supplied, from the hands of private traders to those of commissioners appointed by Government, and in erecting a standard bank and mint, which is to supply the money necessary for the business of the nation, under the commissioners. It is not very evident whether Mr. Gray would suppress all attempts from individuals to interfere with this monopoly by penal enactments or not. This plan, which we have explained in three lines, Mr. Gray takes sixty pages to detail.

It would be a mere waste of words to enter into his proposal at any length; but we shall at once show the absurdity of the principles on which he proceeds. He says, "The fault of our present monetary system is this: money of the existing character cannot, by any possibility, be made to increase as fast as the aggregate of other commodities is capable of being increased" (p. 2)—and this in the face of the outcry which has been raised against the superabundance of money caused by the proceedings of the joint-stock banks, share-brokers, speculators, and others, within the last three years! All the world, but Mr. Gray, is of opinion that the supply of money is excessive. Again, he says, "The persons intrusted with this duty (that of superintending in Government manufactories) are to make all such goods as there is a constant want of among the various classes of society," &c. (P. 6.) But how are they to ascertain the amount of these wants? And, if they should, what security have we that they will supply them properly? These are questions which he does not attempt to answer.

The crowning merit of Mr. Gray's plan, as the lightly-taxed public of this country will no doubt consider it, is, that Government is to advance a sum of £50,000,000 sterling to carry his object into effect. We presume this will be enough for our readers; but those who are not satisfied can purchase the book, and judge for themselves whether or not we have given a fair account of it.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

MALTA, JAN. 8.—DISTRIBUTION OF THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.—At Malta, the Queen, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. R. Owen, Commander-in-Chief; Ceylon, receiving ship, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, superintendent of Malta dockyard; Impregnable, 104; Monarch, 84: and Geyser, Hecate, and Devastation, war steamers; Prometheus and Polyphemus steam-packets, and Bonetta and Magpie, surveying vessels. At Lisbon, the Rodney, 92. At Gibraltar, the Savage, 10, and Owen Glendower convict-ship. On her way to Gibraltar from Malta, the Belvidera, 38. At Barcelona, the Inconstant, 36, and Cyclops steam-frigate. At Mahon, the Formidable, 84, and Vanguard, 80. At Corfu, L'Aigle, 24, and Snake, 16, and the Lizard steam-tender, on her way to the Ionian Islands and Patras, from Malta. At the Piræus of Athens, the Howe, 120, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir Francis Mason, second in command in the Mediterranean; and the Scout, 18. At Smyrna, the Magicienne, 24. At Tourin, the Indus, 76. At Constantinople, the Stromboli war steamer. At Alexandria, the Medea war-steamer. At Beyrout, the Vernon, 50, and Vesuvius war steamer. At Marseilles, the Electo steam-packet.

COURT-MARTIAL. At a court-martial held on board the Impregnable, in Malta harbour, on the 3rd and 4th of January, of which Vice-Admiral Sir John Louis, Bart., was president, and Captain Forrest, of her Majesty's ship Impregnable, Captain Chambers, of her Majesty's ship Monarch, Commanders R. Barton, of her Majesty's ship Monarch, and W. Kitchen, of her Majesty's ship Queen, were members, to try Mr. J. W. Saunders, Acting Master of the Geyser, on charges preferred by Commander Carpenter, first, as relates to the vessel's lately getting on shore on the Guadiana Reef, off Castalonia; and secondly, for disobedience of orders, in (respectfully, as we understand) giving up his charge on the subsequent voyage, when ordered to steer a course directly opposite to that which he considered the right, safe, and proper one. The court, after a most patient investigation, came to a decision to reprimand the Master on the first charge, and cautioned him to be more careful in future, though it declared that it did not result that he was entirely in charge of the vessel, which sentence, as a matter of course, carries with it a reproof to the Commander. On the second charge, of disobedience, Mr. Saunders, the prisoner, was fully

Mr. O. W. Lang, eldest son of Mr. Oliver Lang, master shipwright of the Woolwich dockyard, has been appointed acting-master shipwright's assistant at Woolwich, for service at Deptford, to superintend the work in that dockyard, and the Deptford dockyard. The circumstance of the Government vessels will be accompanied under the cognisance of Government, and that Deptford dockyard will be selected for that purpose. The Worcester, 50-gun frigate, building at Deptford dockyard, will be launched early in the summer of the year.

It is a gratification to know that the colours of the 44th Regiment were preserved by Captain Souter in the retreat, who wrapped them round his waist when made prisoner in the attack and carried safely past Guadamuck.

THE ARMY IN IRELAND.—Colonel Mansel will continue in charge of the Limerick garrison and district until the arrival of Major-General Lord Downes next month. Colonel M. Brereton, assistant-adjutant-general, Cork, Colonel Sir C. O'Donnell, late 15th Hussars, and Lieut.-Colonel F. Fuller, 93rd, late assistant-adjutant general at Barbadoes, are severally mentioned to succeed Colonel Mansel in the Limerick district.

COURT-MARTIAL AT SHEERNESS.—On Tuesday Lieutenant Commander H. Winthorp and Officers, late of her Majesty's steam-packet Spitfire, were tried on board of her Majesty's ship Camperdown, for the loss of the said steam vessel, on the West Indian station, and honourably acquitted. Her Majesty's brigantine Charybdis is to be paid off at Sheerness on Friday.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

THE LOSS OF THE CONQUEROR.

IMPORTANT STATEMENT OF CAPT. THOMPSON.

The following extraordinary narrative of the circumstances of the above calamity has been gained from Captain Thompson, who returned from Boulogne on Saturday evening last:

It appears that on reaching that place on Tuesday week, Captain Thompson waited on Mr. Hamilton, the British Consul, who sent his son with that gentleman to the residence of Mr. Solly, the undertaker, in whose care those bodies already recovered from the wreck had been placed. Captain Thompson immediately recognised his sister-in-law, Mrs. Thompson, and Miss Turton. He also suspected that two of the bodies of the children were his own nephew and niece. Anchoret, from his debilitated state, had not at this time been able to identify the bodies; but on a subsequent occasion he confirmed Captain Thompson's impression. On inquiring whether any articles had been found on Mrs. Thompson, Mrs. Solly, the undertaker's wife, produced two rings which had been taken from the finger of the unfortunate lady; one of them was the guard to her wedding-ring, and bore her initials, "E. W. E. T.," and the date of her marriage, "15th Sept. 1832." The wedding ring itself was not forthcoming, and the finger from which the rings had been taken was broken. Two silver bangles were also found belonging to Miss Turton, Anchoret having frequently seen her wear them during the voyage. The undertaker's wife also produced a pair of stockings, which she said belonged to Miss Turton. Captain Thompson then inquired what other articles of dress that lady had on at the time her body was discovered. Mrs. Solly replied that her pair of stockings were, she understood, all that Miss Turton had on when her body came ashore. This account was subsequently confirmed by Monsieur Dupont, a highly respectable merchant of Boulogne, who, having received intelligence of the wreck on Friday night, the 13th inst., reached Lornel before five on the following Saturday morning, and discovered Miss Turton's body on the beach. A statement so extraordinary excited much surprise in the minds of Captain Thompson, and he sent to Ambcurch to know how the body was dressed when Miss Turton left the ship. The answer was that when she was handed into the boat she was completely dressed, with stays, gown, and everything. With assumption, therefore, could only be, that the body had been found by some inhuman wreckers, stripped of everything, and then thrown into the sea again. Miss Turton, when discovered by M. Dupont, opened her eyes, sighed, and expired. This gentleman also states that Mrs. Thompson's daughter, Ellen, was still alive when thrown upon the shore; that he immediately rubbed her with flannels and handkerchiefs, took off a fine cambric which she had on, and used every means for her recovery, but without effect. Out of the number of bodies which have come on shore, the only one which had any article of dress upon it was that of Mrs. Johnson. Finding the initials "E. J." marked upon some portion of her linen, the fishermen's wives supposed her to be Mrs. Jenkins, and laid her out accordingly under that name. The body of Captain Duggan has not yet been recovered, and there is reason to fear that he, like Miss Turton, met with some foul treatment, and that his body was afterwards buried in the sand. This surmise appears to be strengthened by the fact that some articles which are known to have belonged to that unfortunate gentleman have been recovered from different parties. It is generally stated that very little assistance was rendered to any of the unfortunate individuals who reached the shore, with the exception of the boy Abchurch; he was taken to the lighthouse and properly attended to.

Captain Thompson had a long interview with Abchurch on Thursday week, and learned from him the following particulars of the wreck:—it appears that they saw the French coast on Thursday night, the 12th inst., having made the Lizard light on the previous Monday. The sea was very boisterous on the Wednesday and Thursday, and the captain did not appear to have much faith in the skill of the fisherman who had been taken on board off Torbay, to steer the ship through the Channel. Abchurch says the ship struck about 10 at night. The captain went into the cabin, and informed the ladies and the other passengers that they were on the French coast, where no boats were likely to put off to their relief, or any other assistance could be afforded, and that they must trust to Providence for protection. During the night the men behaved remarkably well, and obeyed every order given by the officers with great fortitude. It does not appear that the masts were cut away, but probably this may have arisen from the tremendous breaches which the sea made over the vessel rendering such a task impossible. The ship held together very nearly until noon of Saturday, the 14th inst., when her bottom timbers began to give way. Captain Duggan now went down into the cabin and told the ladies that it was all over, and that he would do the best he could for them, and perhaps they might reach the shore. At this time Mrs. Thompson was dressed, and sitting by the side of her children's cot. Miss Turton and the other ladies were also dressed. About noon the vessel broke up, and Abchurch recollects nothing more after this period, except being again washed into the sea, and again reaching the boat. When found, the "painter" was twisted round one of his legs, and on the shore, for the purpose of preventing himself in. M. Dupont, above alluded to, states that he saw the boat coming towards the shore, and observed that it was thrown over and over by the fury of the waves. When it came on the beach, Mr. Hamilton, the British Consul, and several other gentlemen, as well as Captain Thompson and his brother, paid the last tribute of respect to the deceased by attending the mournful ceremony. The graves have since been enclosed by iron railings, and monuments will be erected to the memory of the unfortunate ladies. Two other bodies from the wreck were also buried in the cemetery on the same day.

Of the ninety-six individuals known to have been on board the Conqueror when she struck, the bodies of twenty-five only have been recovered. This may be partly accounted for by the nature of the sands on the beach, which are continually shifting during the prevalence of a heavy sea. Mr. Ham bert (a gentleman who is remaining on the spot for the purpose of performing the last and offices to any of the bodies which may hereafter be found) states that a small stick, two feet long, thrust into the beach, will frequently be almost hidden in the course of a few hours. There is, however, too much reason to fear that many of the bodies which have been washed on property about them, and then buried in the sand by the inhuman wretches who infest the coast.

The light at Lorme! is small and exceedingly defective. Abchurch says that it was distinctly seen before the vessel struck. The ships in the harbour were dashed together, and were deserted by their crews. The most serious disasters were apprehended from the accounts from the south and west of France state generally that the inundations were subsiding, without having inflicted so much danger as was apprehended. A great deal of property appears, however, to have been destroyed in many places. This was particularly the case in the neighbourhood of Perigueux, and on the road to Teste the village of Mestras was almost laid under water."

DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE ON THE DONEGAL COAST.

The storm of Friday night, the 18th inst., produced results on the coast of Donegal almost as calamitous as those in the Bay of Dundrum. As the boats belonged to each harbour were all engaged in hauling their nets on the north side of the Isle of Arran, a violent gale of wind suddenly sprung up from the north, and in a very short space of time it increased to a perfect hurricane. Every effort was made by the fishermen to reach the shore, but, alas! twelve poor fellows were doomed to a premature and watery grave, ten of whom formed the crew of one of Mr. F. Forster's large fishing yawls—the other two men were lost out of separate boats. A few days previous to this lamentable occurrence, as a boat was returning from Burton Port to Arran, she was capsized, and six persons out of nine were unfortunately drowned.

At Tubberkrum, a boat's crew, consisting of ten men, were all swallowed up in the deep by a heavy sea upsetting their boat.—Another melancholy accident happened a few days previous to the loss above-mentioned. A boat from Arconmore was returning home, when a storm arose, upset the boat, and six brave men were thrown out, three of whom escaped a watery grave.

During the dreadful storm, a Galway wherry, with fishing tackle for Killybegs, when entering that harbour, the night being dark, and they not being acquainted with the port, struck on the Rotten Island, and went to pieces, throwing the crew (seven persons) on the mercy of the waves. Seven of the men sunk to rise no more; the other four were driven on a rock, where they remained all night, from which they escaped a watery grave, but they were washed off by another wave, and one of them, an old man, was drowned. The remaining three were once more left on the rock by the waves; and the sea falling, they were able to remain in their perilous situation until next morning, when some fishermen seeing them, went to their assistance, got them into their boat, and conveyed them to shore. Andrew Cassidy, Esq., of Bruckless, on hearing of their misfortune, brought a doctor to see them, and we are happy to learn they are doing well. One of them (the captain) is brother to the owner. The only article saved was about two hundred sovereigns, which the captain had sewed up in a purse and tied round his body, with which he intended to purchase salt and herrings.

TOTAL LOSS OF THE NEW TIMES OFF THE COAST OF AFRICA.

The following letter, addressed to Messrs. Hatton and Co., of Watlingstreet, is the copy of the New Times, detailing the destruction of that vessel, with the whole of her cargo, by an explosion of gunpowder, on the 18th of October last, was received on Monday afternoon, from their agent at Ahguay, who went out as supercargo in the above ship:—

"Badagry, October 14, 1842.

"My dear Sir,—When I left Cape Coast on board the New Times, with her valuable cargo, I calculated on a successful trading expedition down the coast, and of returning to Cape Town in due time to perform the pleasing duty of acquainting you with the result of my exertions; and little did I expect that all my hopes and prospects would, in a sudden and most unnecessary manner, be cut off by a painful dispensation of Providence, which has at one stroke deprived us of the vessel and her cargo.

"We anchored at Ahguay on the 9th instant. We had landed no cargo from and after Wednesday, the 12th, and had no communication with the New Times; but, as Captain Rowe was on board, we of course calculated on all being well with the vessel and the crew. At one o'clock, P.M., on the following day (Thursday, the 13th) we heard a report of a tremendous explosion in the direction of the beach, and saw an immense volume of black smoke rising immediately over the spot where the vessel was anchored. I need not, as I knew we had a large quantity of gunpowder on board, I instantly suspected the destruction of the vessel.

"Although the town of Badagry is situated about two and a half miles from the sea, and the ground on which it is built so low that the hull of a vessel in the roads cannot be seen from the town, yet the masts could be distinctly seen from the spot we usually landed at. We hastened to the beach, and found that the New Times had disappeared. We immediately crossed the river, which was between Badagry and the sea, and proceeded with all possible haste to the beach, and, on reaching there, I regret to say that not we could see no vestige of the vessel, or any person to give us the least information about her.

"I can form some idea of the distress which you will feel, and deeply do I sympathise with you in the heavy loss you have sustained. I wish I could add some information relative to the safety of the captain and the crew, as a means of alleviating the grief which you must feel; but I fear the worst, and must add to the foregoing sad record my conviction that every soul on board has perished.

"The form in which as to the cause of this sad disaster is impossible, and none being spared to give information, it must for ever remain a mystery. At the time of the explosion I was engaged taking stock with Captain Parsons, from whom we could hear nothing; the smoke had the whole vessel on fire previous to the explosion; and, moreover, had such been the case, the crew would certainly have had sufficient time to get into the boat, or to a large canoe which was attached to the stern of the vessel. This proves that the explosion was instantaneous. Half an hour at least elapsed after we heard the explosion before we reached the beach, at which time, I have already stated, not a vestige of the New Times could be seen. I nevertheless got a canoe, and sufficient hands to man the two boats above-mentioned, which were floating away to leeward. These three canoes then steered in different directions in search of the poor sufferers, pulling down the coast five or six miles; but I regret to say, after an unsuccessful cruise, they returned at dusk. Shortly after we reached the beach something was perceived in the water, which, on examination, proved to be the job-boom, windlass, and spritsail yard. As it is still stationary, and a little above water, and not having seen any portion of the hull, with the exception of a piece of copper'd plank about a foot square, which was found in one of the canoes, we conclude the stern of the vessel was blown out, and that she had sunk at her anchor. Whether her decks or masts were blown out we cannot say, but it is evident that the principal part of her crew must have been blown away from her; for, in two hours after the accident, the sea was covered with the tattered remnants of cloth, puncheon packs, butt-ends of muskets, &c.; but there was not a vestige of human being to be seen.

"Besides the original crew the New Times shipped three others at Cape Coast—viz., William Calthorpe and two Kroomen.

"I have kept a look-out along the coast for several miles, but as yet none of the bodies have been washed on shore.—I remain, sir, your most obedient servant, "J. H. ARTHUR."

The New Times was engaged in the African trade, and left Liverpool in the end of June, 1842, under the command of Captain Alexander Rowe. The crew consisted of the following persons:—Henry Hall, first mate; Samuel Whitmarsh, second ditto; Wm. Johnson, Matthew Lyner, Thomas Holland, John Macdowall, seamen; Thomas Guy and John Sherlock, apprentices; and, in addition, William Calthorpe (late of the Medora) was shipped as Cape Coast, as well as two black Kroomen.

From the fact of the New Times being at anchor off the coast, and not engaged in disembarking her cargo at the period of the explosion, considerable mystery exists as to the cause of the accident. It is well known that gunpowder forms an important article of trade with all ships on this coast, but it is invariably stowed away in a portion of the vessel termed the magazine, and separated by a thick partition from the rest of the cargo. So far as we have ever taken near the magazine, and it is feared that a quarrel must have originated among the crew, and thus caused the melancholy result. Captain Rowe was a man of considerable experience, but the present was his first voyage in the New Times.

About six years since Messrs. Hatton and Co. lost another ship, the Rolla, near the same spot, by a somewhat similar catastrophe. On that occasion caught fire, and the crew, being unable to stay its progress, abandoned the vessel just before the flames communicated to the magazine, when she blew up, and was entirely destroyed.

The New Times was built for the African trade, and was 200 tons burden. She is stated to be underwritten at Lloyd's, though not to the full amount of her loss.

The Semaphore of Marseilles states that accounts have been brought by the Corsair, which returned from Algiers on the 19th, of a violent earthquake in the island of Italy. At Genoa the wind raged with such fury that the inhabitants of the houses at the Mole abandoned them, in a dread of their being blown down. Several vessels had not yet reached the port. A Bayonne letter, of the 16th instant, gives the following particulars of the effects of the late storm in the Bay of Biscay:—"At three in the afternoon of the 15th the sea became so rough that it washed down a considerable portion of the principal quay, and made its way into the town, creating a general alarm, and causing the tocsin to be sounded. The ships in the harbour were dashed together, and were deserted by their crews. The most serious disasters were apprehended. The accounts from the south and west of France, by yesterday's post, state generally that the inundations were subsiding, without having inflicted so much injury as was apprehended. A great deal of property appears, however, to have been destroyed in many places. This was particularly the case in the neighbourhood of Perigueux, and on the road to Teste the village of Mestras was almost laid under water."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BAIL COURT, TUESDAY, JAN. 24.
(Before Mr. Justice Williams.)

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.—THE QUEEN v. ARROWSMITH.

Mr. Hill applied to his lordship for a rule calling upon Dr. Arrowsmith, one of the justices of the peace for the town of Coventry, to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for assaulting Mr. Lee, a solicitor of that town. It appeared from the affidavits on which the learned gentleman founded his motion, that on the 17th inst. Mr. Lee was employed in his professional capacity, to prefer a charge of assault against Dr. Arrowsmith for having, while in attendance on one of his patients, behaved with great rudeness towards an apothecary, also attending the party, and wantonly and forcibly taking a bolus out of his hand. Mr. Lee stated, that he conducted himself in a courteous and proper manner towards Dr. Arrowsmith while the proceedings above-mentioned were pending, and had the case been undertaken by him, making an apology to the apothecary, it was supported by Mr. Lee that nothing further would be heard of the matter. But, on a subsequent day, while he was sitting in the reading-room of the Literary Institution at Coventry, engaged in reading, Dr. Arrowsmith entered, and sudden.y and without provocation struck him a violent blow on the face. Mr. Justice Williams said, that the conduct of Dr. Arrowsmith had not any connection with that of a magistrate as a justice of the peace, and that, in his opinion, there was nothing in the case that called for the interference of the Court. The party complaining had his remedy by either action or indictment.—Rule refused.

SHERIFFS' COURT.—TUESDAY
(Before Mr. Under-Sheriff Jannaway Burchell.)

FAILURE OF THE SHEFFIELD BANK.

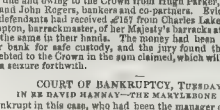
This was crown extent directed to James Burchell, Esq., and Robert Henry Foreman, Esq., two of her Majesty's Commissioners, to inquire what sum was due and owing to the Crown from Hugh Parker, Clyne Shore, John Brewin, and John Rogers, bankers and co-partners. Evidence was adduced that the defendants had received £167 from Charles Lake, Esq., of Weedon Northampton, barrister-at-law, her Majesty's barrack-master at Weedon, and still retained the same in their hands. The money had been paid by Mr. Lake into their bank for safe custody, and the jury found that the defendants were indebted to the Crown in the sum claimed, which will enable the sheriff to make a seizure forthwith.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, TUESDAY.
IN RE DAVID HANNAY—THE MARYLEBONE BANK.

The bankrupt in this case, who had been the manager of the Marylebone Joint Stock Bank, appeared in court to pass his final examination, which had been adjourned from time to time, in consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of his cash accounts. During his examination he stated that much of the intricacy which occurred in these accounts arose from loans which he had raised in the City, with the cognizance of several of the directors, amongst whom were members of the House of Commons. Several creditors having objected against the bankrupt being allowed to pass, as his cash account was very unsatisfactory to them, Sir Charles Williams said he did not wish to defer a bankrupt's final examination, owing to any frivolous objection on the part of creditors.—Mr. Graham, on the bankrupt had only given him his cash account on Friday week, and owing to the intricacy of the time, he was unable to look it over.—The final examination was then ordered to stand for Tuesday the ensuing, the official assignee would be able to sift the cash account, which was very voluminous, and embraced many of the transactions of the Marylebone Bank.

PREROGATIVE COURT, WEDNESDAY.
IN THE GOODS OF WILLIAM TUCKER.

Captain Tucker, R.N., was one of the unfortunate passengers on board the Reliance, wrecked near Boulogne in November last, and perished, with all his papers, and many of his effects. It appears that whilst employed in her Majesty's ships Wolverine and Iris, on the coast of Africa, he transmitted to his executors copies of his testamentary papers; of these copies the court was moved to decree probate, limited till the original or authentic copies were produced.—The court, doubting at first whether some parts of the letter inclosing one of the papers were not testamentary, but being afterwards satisfied that they were directory only, granted probate of the papers.



POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—On Tuesday Sergeant Teague, of the City police, who had, on a previous day, been desired to make a minute of the accidents which occur on the wood pavement in the Poultry, in order that a statement of the weather, &c., might be made his report to Sir Peter Laurie, who presided at the Mansion-house, made his report to Sir Peter Laurie, who presided at the Mansion-house. From this report it appeared that between Friday evening week and Monday evening, there being no frost in the interval, as many as nineteen horses had fallen down on that short piece of wood pavement.—A gentleman referred to the danger of crossing from Cheapside to St. Paul's Churchyard since the east end of the yard had been paved with wood. Light vehicles now came without noise, and, in the dark, upon persons crossing.—Sir Peter Laurie said the wood pavement could not be used at all on declivities such as Holborn-bridge or Blackfriars. He had no greater pecuniary interest in promoting the use of granite pavement than of wooden pavement. He had no interest in either, and if any accident were to happen to a valuable horse belonging to him from travelling over the wood pavement, he would bring an action against the parish authorities who caused it to be laid down, for he would maintain that nobody had a right to make the public highway impassable. He was a shopkeeper, he thought, and could sustain an action for the damage he sustained by rendering his premises unapproachable with safety by customers who rode on horseback, or who kept valuable carriage horses. He directed Sergeant Teague to continue to register the accidents.

BOW-STREET.—A young man, who gave the name of Angelo Guiche, was placed at the bar before Mr. Hall for final examination, charged with forging a cheque for the sum of £10, upon Messrs. Roberts, Curtis, and Co., bankers.—Mr. H. Ellis, a jeweller, &c., residing in King-street, Covent-garden, stated that on the evening of the 14th instant, the prisoner called at his shop for a watch and chain, for which he had previously agreed to give the sum of £5 10s. He then tendered in payment the cheque produced for £10, purporting to be drawn by "Charles Tailor," upon Messrs. Roberts and Co. Witness, not feeling inclined to part with his property without first ascertaining the genuineness of the cheque, desired the prisoner to go and make some inquiries about it. Upon hearing him give those instructions the prisoner bolted out of the shop, but an alarm being given he was stopped and taken into custody.—Witnesses were called who proved the cheque to be a forgery, and a similar case was established against the prisoner as having occurred with Messrs Twining, the bankers and tea dealers in the Strand.—The prisoner was remanded.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—BUTLERS' PERQUISITES.—William Lane, under butler to J. Gladstone, Esq., No. 6, Carlton gardens, was brought before Mr. Hardwick, charged with having plundered the master of a quantity of wax candles. The prisoner, it appeared, had been in Mr. Gladstone's service about two years, and it was his duty to take charge of the candles and light apartments. For some time past Mr. Gladstone had entertained a suspicion that his consumption of wax candles was greater than needful, but nothing occurred to induce him to believe that he was robbed by his servants until yesterday. A day or two since he sent for Mr. Davies, a pastry cook, and asked him if it was the custom for servants to dispose of wax candle pieces, and was answered in the affirmative; and on further examination it appeared that a few days previously the prisoner had taken part of 2 lbs. for a parcel weighing 44 lbs. Mr. Davies mentioned that it was the regular practice throughout the trade to buy wax ends and scrapings from gentlemen's servants. From the highest to the lowest families in the trade the custom was adopted. In fact, in some cases it was almost a recognised system of plunder; for if a number of pounds of wax candles were sent in by some tradesman, the servants regularly sent back a quantity untouched, and were paid for it. In oil the same practice was adopted. Indeed, he had known that where 70 gallons were sent in, no less than 25 gallons were returned and allowed to the servants. The fault arose from the neglect of gentlemen in looking after their servants and tradesmen. If gentlemen took the trouble to attend to their household affairs, they would find a wonderful diminution in the amount of their quarterly bills.—The prisoner, having declined to say anything, was fu.ly committed.

LAMBETH-STREET.—Joseph Smith, alias Sands, and Mary Anne Smith, were brought before Mr. Henry, for final examination, on a charge of coining. From the evidence adduced, it appeared that on Saturday last the prisoners, who were known to be notorious "smashers," were followed to their lodgings in Castle-alley, Whitechapel, by three constables belonging to the H division of police, and while they stood on the stairs, they heard a jerking noise, and the male prisoner exclaimed, "how hard it sticks." They then forced in the door, and saw the male prisoner with a mould in his hands, which he instantly dashed into the fire-place, and both him and his companion exclaimed, "Oh! what shall we do." The officers instantly secured Sands and handcuffed him, and while they were searching the place, he rushed to the fire-place, and, with extraordinary dexterity, laid hold of a piece of plaster of Paris mould with a sixpence that had just been coined, and popped them into his mouth. The constable True caught him by the throat, while Marland held his jaw, to prevent his swallowing the counterfeit, but the prisoner told them "it was useless, as it was gone, and that he had a right to do the best he could for himself." On searching the fire-place, the officers found on the fire an iron spoon, the hollow part of which was about half-full of a white metal, in a fluid state, and mixed with the ashes half a mould for casting sixpences of the present reign, as well as other materials to show that coining had been carried on to a considerable extent.—In reply to the questions of Mr. Henry, the officer said that, after swallowing the sixpence, the sufferings of the male prisoner were very intense, as his tongue and lips were so severely hurt, and both became so much swollen and inflamed, that he could not articulate for some time.—Mr. Powell, the solicitor for the Mint, said the prisoners were well known as practised "smashers," and they were fully committed to Newgate for trial.

UNION-HALL.—DARING ROBBERY.—Thomas Woolley and James Vickery were brought before Mr. Cottingham, at Union-hall, charged with plundering a public-house, called the Duke's Head, in the Minories, of a considerable quantity of property. The prisoners were suspected of belonging to a gang of thieves who have committed great depredations on the property of licensed victuallers of the metropolis. On the preceding afternoon the prisoners and three other men called at the Duke's Head, and were for some time drinking in the tap-room. In the course of a short time Woolley got up, and going over to a young man named Kelly, who was sitting in another part of the room, spoke to him, saying, "We are going to do some work up stairs; don't you notice us, else it will be the worse for you." Kelly, from what was said, thought they were going to rob the house, and in reply said that it was no business of his, and that he should not interfere either one way or the other. The prisoners shortly after left the room, and left the room, and soon after their departure Kelly went into the bar and communicated his suspicion to the landlady, who, unwilling to leave the bar, sent her daughter up-stairs to examine the bedroom and see that all was right. The daughter, upon entering the apartment, found the place in a state of confusion—the drawers, boxes, and cupboards open, and a portion of their contents lying strewn about the floor. The girl was so alarmed that she fell down in a fainting fit; and her long absence creating surprise her mother and some other persons went upstairs, and found her in the situation above described, and the room in a state of utter disorder. It was then discovered that the whole of the property of any value was gone, and that the thieves had obtained access to the apartment by means of a ladder, which they placed against the window at the rear of the premises, and that they had broken two panes of glass to get in. It further appeared that in order to convey away the property they had a cart waiting in a by-street at the back of the house; and, having filled it, they drove off, and so made their escape. Two witnesses were called who had seen the cart waiting in the place described, and they also identified the two prisoners as being engaged in loading it. Owing to information having been given to the police the prisoners were shortly afterwards taken into custody, but as yet none of the property has been found. As others of the gang are likely to be taken into custody, the prisoners, who asserted their innocence of the offence, were remanded.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

FARRINGDON AT KENSAL-GREEN.—On Tuesday last a long investigation was proceeded with before Mr. T. Wakley, M.P., in the Portobello Arms, at Kensal-green, into the circumstances attendant upon the death of Henry Richards, aged 43 years, a tailor and chandler, living in that place, whose death was occasioned by the effects of a severe stab inflicted upon him by William Henry Richards, his own son, on Monday, the 2nd inst. It appeared from the evidence that a scuffle had arisen between the parties on the occasion of the son demanding half a pound of cheese, which the deceased refused to give. Both were intoxicated at the time of the occurrence. A police-constable's wife witnessed the after part of the affray, but took no active part in stabbing. A large bacon knife was found on the floor with which it was supposed the fatal deed was perpetrated. The deceased had lingered for 18 days before he died, and his wretched son was in the meantime sent to prison on the surgeon's certificate. The prisoner was not present in attendance, the committing magistrate having no authority to give him up, which drew from Mr. Coroner Wakley some lengthened strictures on the inconvenience of the present system, and announcing his intention to centralize the prerogative of the Coroner's Court. Ultimately the jury found a verdict of "Manslaughter," as they did not think themselves justified in returning "Wilful Murder" on evidence of confessions alleged to have been made by the prisoner in his absence.

On Monday last an investigation took place before Mr. Wakley, M.P., and a respectable jury, in the royalty lecture-room, Jew Mead, at the Middlesex Hospital, on view of the body of Dr. [illegible], aged twenty-four, assistant-surgeon of the 13th Regiment of Foot, who died at Malta, and was interred in the Protestant burying-ground there. [illegible] Mr. Wakley, in addressing the jury, said that [illegible] the case was one of a most extraordinary and painful character. He had to investigate the circumstances attending the death of a young man, who, after having been [illegible] and left to bleed to death on the pavement. He had to investigate, and [illegible] apparently dying; others had been injured, and he was anxiously enquired [illegible] but that, but on his arrival was pronounced [illegible]. Witness picked up the fragments of the bottle, which was broken, and [illegible] and was pronounced by the surgeon to be dead. [illegible] Mr. Alexander Arch, the well known druggists, of Plough-court, Lombard-street, and had on it the words "Prussic acid—poison."—Mr. James Young said he resided at No. 3, Norfolk-street, Strand, and was staff-surgeon of the 19th Regiment. He was well acquainted with the deceased, but had not, before Friday week, seen him for twelve months, as he resided in England during that period. Deceased had arrived in town on Thursday night week from Malta, having, it was understood, been ordered home in consequence of improper proceedings which had come under the notice of the commanding officer of the regiment. Witness and in which Dr. Cogblan was alleged to have taken a prominent part. The deceased attended before Sir James M'Gregor and the medical board of the Horse Guards on Friday week, where he (Dr. Young) met him, and shook hands with him. He went before the medical board, but as witness was not aware of what transpired. They walked together as far as Regent-street, when he (Dr. Young) left deceased, who he believed was about to go to his temporary lodgings, which he had taken on his arrival, at No. 1, Northumberland-court, Strand. He did not see him afterwards, until he heard of this melancholy occurrence. In answer to the coroner, Dr. Young stated, he observed a great despondency in deceased's manner, and after he left the medical board he appeared much excited.—Mr. Corfe, the house-surgeon at the Middlesex hospital, deposed to the admission of the deceased. He was quite dead. He had made a post-mortem examination, and, from an analysis of the contents of the stomach, had no doubt that the deceased had died from the effects of prussic acid.—It was stated, although not in evidence, that a letter was found on deceased's person, unopened, addressed from the Governor of Malta to Sir James M'Gregor; and that deceased had failed to present it, being fearful that its contents were against him. The letter, however, turned out to be highly in his favour.—Dr. Young stated that he had understood from Sir James M'Gregor that the deceased would have only been punished by a reprimand. The deceased was highly respected. His father is staff-surgeon, and his brother assistant-surgeon, to the 86th Regiment, now in India.—The jury, after considerable deliberation, returned a verdict, "That deceased took prussic acid in a state of temporary insanity."

AFFECTING CASE OF DESTITUTION. The subjoined harrowing details are extracted from the daily papers, and were elicited at a coroner's inquest held on Monday last, on the body of a poor man named Edward Cowling, who languished and died in consequence of the wretched tenement in which he and his family resided having been dismantled by the agent of the landlord, by which he was exposed to the inclemency of the season. The first witness called and examined by the coroner (Mr. Baker, an exceedingly humane and benevolent man) was Margaret Cowling, the widow of the deceased. She said that her husband had been formerly groom to the late Earl of Egremont, but latterly his circumstances became so bad that he was obliged to sell watercresses in the streets. They lived in a house no better than a shed, in Newton's-rents, for which they were to pay 1s. 6d. per week, rent to a Mr. Cameron, agent to Messrs. Winter and Williams, solicitors, of Bedford-row, Holborn. Not being able to keep up their payments, about a month ago a man named Darling, ordered, he said, to do so by Cameron came and took away the shutters and door of the tenement. She begged him to wait not to do so, saying the exposure to cold, from which deceased always suffered, would kill him. The roof was in such a state that the rain came in and inundated the floor. They had no bed, and the only article of furniture was a small table. She never had applied for parochial relief, having a repugnance do so, and found that the parochial relief would not mend. Deceased and she for a long time past had not tasted animal food, their sustenance being bread, potatoes, and sometimes a little cocoa that was given to them. On Sunday morning deceased went out to procure water-cresses for sale, and as he was going along he fell down from weakness. He was removed to his miserable home, and drank some cocoa a kind neighbour had brought him, but could not eat. At half-past seven the same evening a visible change took place in deceased's condition, and he died almost directly afterwards.—Mr. Cameron, who was present, and the amount of rent due by deceased was £1 17s., and that the measure he had adopted towards him were not authorised by Messrs. Winter and Williams. He alone was responsible for them.—Mr. Daniel Ross, surgeon, said he was called to see deceased on Sunday evening, and found a man dead. The probable cause of death was apoplexy, which would be brought on by exposure to cold. He could not tell the positive cause of death unless he examined the body internally. The inquiry was then adjourned to Monday, in order that a post mortem examination might be made.

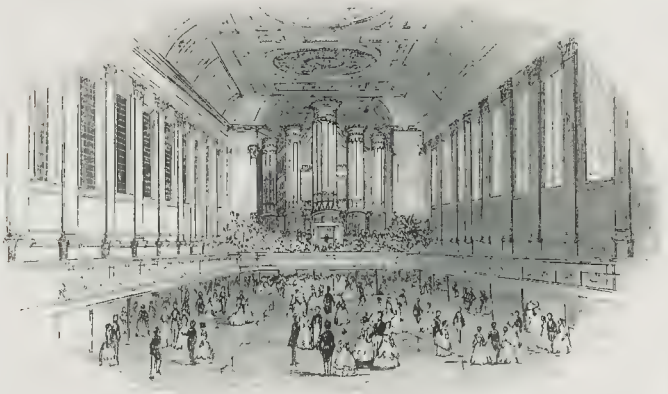
Since the above was written, we have received the verdict returned by the jury at the adjourned inquest, which, as we anticipated, was "Natural death," with an unanimous expression of their indignation at the conduct of Mr. Cameron, in removing the outer doors and window-shutters of the deceased's dwelling, and thus exposing him to the inclemency of the weather.

THE TOWN-HALL OF BIRMINGHAM.

We take the opportunity of the occurrence of the festivities at Birmingham to present our readers with illustrations of the scenes which they display, and of the edifice in which they are held. The patriotic and charitable citizens of that good town have resolved upon a course which will at once evince their love of country, and their disposition to promote the cause of humanity. The grand ball, of Wednesday evening, was held to commemorate the conclusion of the late triumphant peace with the empire of China, and reflects infinite credit on the spirit and munificence of the people of Birmingham.

The Town-hall of Birmingham is a magnificent structure, modelled upon one of the ancient temples of Greece. A rustic basement supports a series of noble Corinthian columns, which extend round the front and two sides of the building. The interior, said to be the most spacious room in the kingdom, is ornamented with several pillars, rising to an elaborately-worked roof, and in a recess at the end has been erected a magnificent organ, at an expense of no less than £3000. It is said that the hall will hold 9000 persons, but this means, I take it, that they must be all standing, and of some political party that will stick remarkably close together. For myself, I do not think it is so large as Exeter-hall, or that it will contain more than 3000 or 3500 persons. The estimate of the cost of the building was £24,000, raised by a rate upon the inhabitants of the town; but the actual cost was about £30,000. The organ appears to be of ungainly build, although, if size be grandeur, it is grand beyond dispute. Its frontage of brass pipes is an eye-sore. It has, however, a fine tone, which I have heard most beautifully developed; and when surrounded by the imposing array of 500 performers and their instruments, rears itself proudly enough, and looks like the lion of the orchestra.

In connection with the ball which has just been held within the building it may not be uninteresting to our readers to be reminded of the circumstances under which the Queen's Hospital—the charity for which it has been given—was established. The foundation-stone was laid by the Right Hon. the Earl Howe, on the 18th of June, 1840. On the 18th of June, 1841, the building was finished, and the dispensary and home-visiting departments commenced. Seventy beds and bedding, complete, were presented by the nobility and friends of the charity, and on the 24th of October, of the same year, the wards were formally opened by the Lord Bishop of the diocese. To meet the regulations of the Royal College of Surgeons, it was rendered imperative that the wards should contain never less than one hundred patients. The necessary expenses incurred by the outfit, and the heavy demand made at once upon the funds of the charity by the regulations of the medical authorities, induce the committee earnestly to appeal on the present festive occasion to their friends and noble patrons for support, an appeal which will be responded to the more promptly and liberally when it is known that, in accordance with the fundamental laws, the medical and surgical officers voluntarily surrender all the fees from students towards the support of the charity, and that the sum of £729 has been paid over by them to the treasurer within the period of eight months. During the last half-year 509 patients have been admitted, of which number 284 have been discharged cured; relieved, 80; irregularity, 5; own request, 3; made out-patients, 11; dead, 19; remaining in the hospital, 107; 165 severe casualty cases have occurred, of which number 54 have been admitted without recommendation; 247 have been regularly attended at their own homes; and the average number of out-patients in attendance has varied weekly from 150 to 180.



INTERIOR OF THE TOWN HALL OF BIRMINGHAM.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS—No. XXV.

ST. CATHERINE CREE.

Another old London Church! One of those which stand in the heart of the City in narrow streets surrounded by high warehouses, busy offices, and rich shops; and hemmed so closely in that the passing passenger, who threads his tortuous way through the bustling throng, scarce notices—or if he chance to notice, has no care to examine. No architectural display here arrests attention—no tall columns, lofty portico, or taper spire. A low square tower, the remnant of an older building, surmounted by an absurd circular turret in the pepper-box style, is its only external ecclesiastic feature.

The interior is striking and peculiar, displaying a strange admixture of Gothic with Grecian—of pointed architecture with Corinthian columns. The tout ensemble however is rather pleasing, the groined ceiling, and chief window of richly stained glass, giving a picturesque character to that which, if strictly judged, could claim but little praise. The arms of the City and of different Companies decorate various panels; and here and there are inscriptions to the memory of citizens long since gathered to their fathers. Among the less distinguished lies an ambassador, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, the representative of "Queen Bess" at the court of France.

The legend of St. Catherine, to whom the church is dedicated, is not the least marvellous of the calendar. A Christian virgin of great fortitude and courage, the bitterest persecution was insufficient to induce a change in her faith, and torture was resorted to. Placed between two wheels thickly studded with knife-blades, her young frame was about to be subjected to fearful laceration, preparatory to being crushed to death, "when the wheels broke miraculously, and the knives, scattering themselves about, wounded the enemies of the true faith gathered round about to witness her sufferings." The form of wheel upon which she is said to have been stretched received her name, and hence also the title of the "pyrotechnic toy," the school-boy's "cat-and-wheel." The history of the church is soon told. Matilda, the wife of the first Henry, seven centuries since, founded the priory of the Holy Trinity, Christ Church, near this spot, when several neighbouring small parishes were joined, and a portion of the convent church set apart for the use of the parishioners. Afterwards a distinct chapel was built in the churchyard of the priory, and called St. Catherine Christ Church, since corruptly abbreviated Cree Church. At the dissolution of religious houses, Henry VIII. gave it to Lord Audley, who bequeathed it to "Maudlyn College, Cambridge," the master of which leased it to the parishes, taking a composition in money in lieu of tithes. In Stowe's days the old church was standing, but was afterwards, with the exception of the tower, taken down, the present building being raised in its stead in 1628. It was consecrated by the celebrated Bishop Laud, who upon this occasion acted in so noticeable a manner as to lead to serious charges against him.

But St. Catherine Cree has its cherished memory. Here lie the remains of a painter who left works, unique in their way, and whose hard, dry, yet exquisitely finished and truthful portraitures have rendered familiar to succeeding generations the faces of those who were his contemporaries. Here moulder the bones of Holbein, Hans Holbein, the friend and protégé of Erasmus and of Sir Thomas More, and the favourite painter of Henry VIII. Like Homer, several towns claim honour as his birth-place, and the Germans rank him second in their list of painters—Albert Durer occupying the first place. Versant in all branches of his art, he painted well in oil, in water-colours, and in distemper; in historical paintings and in miniatures he displayed equal skill, while to the artist he added a practical knowledge of architecture. In his youth a chance journey to Basle gained him the acquaintance of Erasmus, who gave him a letter of introduction to Sir Thomas More, in whose house at Chelsea he passed some of his happiest years—painting the pictures which afterwards attracted the attention and secured the patronage of Henry. Royal favour and his own skill conspired to keep him in active employment, and he executed several important pictures, one of which, representing Henry VIII. presenting a charter to the barber-chirurgeons, may be seen at the college in Lincoln's Inn. The King's munificence was great, and Holbein's consideration at court is well conveyed in an anecdote which places Henry in a better light than history sometimes shows him. A courtier complained of the artist for an alleged insult. "Begone, and remember that I shall look upon any injury offered to the painter as done to myself. I tell you I can make seven lords of seven peasants, but not one Holbein!" He fell a victim to the plague in 1554, leaving some characteristic pictures to adorn the galleries of the country which had so munificently encouraged him—the land of his adoption. His bones were laid in a church hard by his death-place, and, although their exact depository is not now known, they form the relics whence comes the interest attached to St. Catherine Cree.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE GRAVE OF ROBIN HOOD.

When Newstead was a subject of illustration in our pages, from the surrounding Forest of Sherwood arose a thousand associations of England's boldest outlaw—the ballad hero, Robin Hood. And here again comes a memento of him to claim a nook and corner, not undeservedly—the grave place of Robin Hood—the spot under the forest turf, sufficient for him who trod so blithely upon its surface; calling to the mind's eye the picture drawn in the old ballad of the outlaw, overtaken by sickness, seeking the aid of a leech in the Abbey of Kirkstall—and there, resigning himself to the hands of the faithless friend—his blood ebbing away untended and unchecked. Detecting, too late, the perfidy, he strives to wake the echoes as he had been wont to do when his bugle summoned his "merrie men all." Little John catches the faltering tone, suspects at once the sad truth, hies away to the abbey, makes forcible entry to the small apartment whence the sounds had come, and there—sad sight to forester—lies Robin Hood bloodless, faint, and dying, before an open casement, from which he seeks once more to gaze upon the oaks he loved. Let the ballad tell the rest:—

"Give me my bent bow in my hand
And an arrow I'll let free,
And where that arrow is taken up
There let my grave digged be."

And for this—to mark his grave—the grave we now delineate, did Robin Hood speed his last shaft.

From a correspondent we received the sketch we have engraved, and with it some notes as to the inscription, which we give:—"A plain slab fills the space within the railings, and inserted in the low wall is a square stone with the following inscription:—

"Here underneath this little stean
Lais robert earl of huntingtun
Neer archer ver as hi as gud
An pipl kauld im robin heud
Sic utlaws as hi an iz men
Will england nivir si agen.
Obnt 24 Kalend: Decembris 1247.

"Its locality is the boldest and most picturesque in that neighbourhood. Situated on the extreme edge of Kirklees Park, near Huddersfield, its elevation is such as to present a most extensive view of what once formed a portion of the Forest of Sherwood, and which even now displays clumps of gnarled oaks scattered here and there, and, spite of the inroads of inclosures, interspersed with furze and brushwood."

Castle Hill, on the left, stands out proudly above the minor eminences around; beyond stretch a range of hills towards Blackmoor Top, until "beautifully less" they seem to mingle with the sky.

Time works great changes. Instead of scudding deer, the hissing train shoots through the valley now buried between the hills, then darting forth, dashing over rivers, towns, through dales, parks, and villages, until its incessant "sobs" become less and less audible, and you discern a little speck and smoke in the distance; look again—'tis gone!—and narrow pass no wider than the hand is all the eager eye can distinguish. The once lonely forest or dreary covert now resounds with the hum of machinery and busy life—Shirewood oaks are usurped by factory chimneys. The laugh and clatter of children in their "cloggen shoin" fill the vale below, where once the burst of mirth from Little John and his jovial followers made echo join in their wild glee; and between the hills, where, a few centuries since, all was desolate and drear, scarcely anything betokening life or living to be found, now, beneath a hanging cloud of smoke, which seems partially sustained by the eminences on either side—under that canopy is the bustle, industry, idleness, splendour, and poverty of the grand fancy market of the kingdom Huddersfield.

MDLLE. CAMILLE LEROUX.

As a graphic pendant to our theatrical notices, we give another lion from the English Opera House, but one far more graceful and engaging than the "four-legged carnivora," which form its more prominent features. Mdlle. Camille Leroux is a young Frenchwoman, of great personal attractions, who performs a variety of feats of horsemanship with a degree of mingled grace and dexterity, which entitle her to the palm as a female equestrian, and almost induce the spectator to give to such displays a higher and better place in his esteem than of right belongs to them. She rides with firmness, and guides her well-trained steeds through their varied evolutions in a style which would have placed her high in the betting at the Olympic games, and made many an old Grecian's eye sparkle with gratification. She comes to us from Franconi's, the Parisian Astley's; and although not yet out of her teens, has exhibited in Madrid and other parts of Spain, as well as in many of the chief towns of Germany.

The following appeared only in our late edition last week:—

Loss of the Ship England, off Ostend.—It is with regret we have to add to the already frightful catalogue of wrecks that have been detailed in this journal, the total loss of another fine ship, namely, the England, Captain Thomas Lewis, belonging to London, which foundered two days after the hurricane, in seventy-eight feet of water, about nine miles off the coast of Ostend. This is the seventh ship Messrs. Ward and Son have lost within the last eighteen months and none of the others were insured.

Another Vessel Wrecked near Boscastle.—All Hands Lost.—The Elizabeth Aletta, commanded by Mr. Bakker, was driven upon the sands at Cruckinton Haven, situate within six miles north-east of Boscastle-harbour, where, in the course of one hour, she was totally lost, and all on board perished.

Safety of the Crew of the Jessie Logan. Cork, Jan. 18.—The Lynx, arrived here from Messina, has on board the crew of the Jessie Logan, from Calcutta to Liverpool; left the former port September 4th; was struck by a heavy sea 13th inst., which carried away poop, stove in her stern, and swept decks, and was abandoned the 15th inst. in lat 51, long. 5, having 13 feet water in her hold.

Further details of the dreadful effects of the late hurricane are still coming in to Lloyd's, and it is remarked that in proportion to the amount of property destroyed the loss of life has been much greater than usual. Extract of a letter received at Lloyd's on Friday morning, dated Boscastle, Jan. 18.—"I have now to inform you that many of the skins and bales of cotton, and fragments of the Jessie Logan, have been secured, and the whole of which is now warehoused. The ship struck against a perpendicular rock, 400 feet high, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and of course in a few minutes went to pieces." Another letter states that about ten wreckers, engaged in plundering the Jessie Logan at Boscastle, attacked the revenue officers and coast guard, but were beaten off, and nine of them secured,

By a private letter received at Plymouth on Monday last, it appears that the transport Defiance, Captain R. W. Eliot, was struck by lightning off Nankin on the 30th of August last, between seven and eight P.M. The electric fluid shivered the mainmast from the truck to the heel, and was attracted by the chain cable from the hawseholes on deck to the chain lockers below. Providentially no further damage was done. The Defiance had troops on board, with government stores, including gunpowder and rockets. Great consternation naturally prevailed. She is not provided with conductors, a precaution necessary in all parts, but more especially in a climate like that of China, where lightning is so prevalent.

Bridgwater.—A quantity of wreck, apparently from a schooner or brig, has been brought ashore near Porlock, with some maps and charts, without any marks on them; some papers have also been picked up—one an account of disbursements of the brig Emma, of Wisbeach, and another relating to the sailing of the same vessel from Shields for Halifax in 1833, signed Richard Marshall. also a paper marked Amity brig, Captain Cour: also a foremast, a sail, mainboom, and a quantity of strandings and rope.

The barque Calypso, Captain Glass, which left Falmouth for Liverpool on Saturday, got in contact off the Lizard with the brig Captain, Captain Wetherley, when the former lost her bowsprit, jib-boom, &c.; and the latter stanchions, jib-boom, rigging, &c. The brigs Streatham Castle, from Licata, and Hart, from Girgenti, had arrived damaged, from the heavy weather encountered on their passage from the Mediterranean, having lost boats, stanchions, spars, sails, &c.

AFFRAY BETWEEN CORNISH WRECKERS AND COAST GUARD.

LOSS OF THE LILY OF LIVERPOOL.

We regret to state that this splendid vessel, insured by the underwriters at Lloyd's to the extent of £20,000, the property of Mr. Maxwell, at Liverpool, was totally lost during the tremendous hurricane on Friday, the 18th inst., together with the Little Test, of Southampton, and another (name unknown), upon the Taunton Sands, situate about two miles and a half to the north of the North Lighthouse, in the Bristol Channel. The ship was registered at about 600 tons burden. She had a general cargo on board, consisting of cotton and silk goods, boxes of copper ore, gunpowder, muskets, sabres, swords, pieces of ordnance, &c., and at the period of the unfortunate catastrophe was upon her passage to Old Calabar, on the coast of Africa.

About two hours after she struck, a vessel called the Appledore, Mr. Williams master, came alongside, and, by means of his boat, took the crew off in safety. They were afterwards conveyed to the lighthouse, where every comfort and kindness was shown to them. We regret to add, that some time before the vessel came ashore, a portion of the crew had forcibly broken into the store-room, and drank to such excess of spirits, that some were lying about the deck in a shocking state of madness, and would have perished but for the humanity of their messmates, who secured them to the rigging to prevent the sea washing them overboard; and there they remained until assistance arrived alongside the wreck. The crew consisted of 23 men, besides Captain Townes, the commander, and first and second mates.

Immediately after the wreck being observed by the coast-guard, a strong body of men was stationed along the coast to protect any part of the cargo that should be washed ashore. Towards morning, as the tide rose, the breakers threw the ship higher upon the sands, where she soon broke in two, and her cargo floated out, and was washed upon the beach. As night advanced a band of desperate wreckers made their appearance and commenced plundering the cargo to a great extent. Several were fired at by the coast-guard without any serious result, but they still continued their depredations with the utmost impunity. Since then several of the principal offenders have been apprehended and committed for trial.

SPORTS OF ENGLAND.—No. II.

HARE-HUNTING.

Second in our sketches of British Sports comes hare-hunting, here given such as it was in the days of its glory, before Melton Mowbray could boast its present races, or steam-ships and railroads had beaten wind, tide, and horseflesh. This sport is now seldom seen in its primitive shape, time and manners have not failed to act upon hare-hunting as they are wont to do upon all things; indeed, the latest changes, by introducing the dwarf fox-hound, have quickened the sport and taken from it, as a subject of illustration, its main characteristic, by banishing the "blue mottled harrier." This "newest fashion" we eschew, and give hare-hunting as it should be given such as it was when Somerville sung, and such as it yet is in some sylvan corners of Old England—a whit slower perhaps, but not less hearty, healthful, or exhilirating, than the rattling system of a later day. The dwarf fox-hound, with its superior pace, possesses very fine qualities of nose, but cannot in the latter respect surpass its predecessor; while the "blue mottled harrier" gives at a glance, to a true sportsman's eye, the peculiar character of the scene which our sketch of hare-hunting seeks to pourtray.

While upon this subject, we mention with regret the death of Hylton Jolliffe, a true sportsman of the good old school—one whose presence has given life and spirit to many a well-run chase.

Mr. Jolliffe was one of the oldest members of the House of Commons, having represented the borough of Petersfield more than 40 years; and in this character, no less than as a soldier and a sportsman, his memory deserves the compliment we pay it, by the publication of his portrait.

He entered the army early in life, holding a commission in the Duke of York's regiment when little more than 16 years of age. In the course of the war with Republican France he was frequently engaged in active service; and in the memorable campaign in Egypt, which terminated with the victory of Alexandria, Colonel Jolliffe commanded a battalion of the Coldstream Guards on the decisive day, the 21st of March. On his marriage with the heiress of the Earl of Ferrers, he quitted the profession of a soldier, and directed his attention chiefly to those pursuits which constitute the avocations of a country gentleman. His hours of amusement were devoted to the sports of the field, in which he attained such celebrity as to have acquired the designation of "the hero of the chace." Descended from a family of very high antiquity, some of his estates in the north of England have been continued in uninterrupted succession, in one branch of his family, for more than a thousand years. A claim to revive a cherished hereditary title, long in abeyance, was at one period favourably entertained by the ministers of the day; but as it was considered invidious or injudicious to restore so ancient a baronv, George III. expressed his sentiments as preferably disposed to a new creation; but this not being in accordance with the views of the father of the gentleman just deceased, the idea was never realised. When pressed by the late Earl of Liverpool to accept a baronetcy, the suggestion appeared to Mr. Jolliffe to convey something so much like an insult, that he is reported to have made the following sarcastic reply to the minister—"Your proposal, lord, if executed to, would only enable me to do by patent what I already practise as a gentleman—namely, walk out of a room after the very numerous tribe who have recently been elected as fit subjects for such a dignity !"

PORTRAIT OF HYLTON JOLLIFFE, ESQ.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

From the Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse Herald.

LONDON IN 1842.—The last number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS—a weekly newspaper of considerable ability, and which is embellished with a variety of appropriate wood-cuts—is accompanied with an engraving, on one enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is beautifully executed, every object of interest is neatly defined, and the most remarkable features of the Modern Babylon are at once recognised. The two views—one of which is a north, and the other a south view of London—have been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, and the point of sight selected by the artist is the summit of the Duke of York's Column. Altogether, the picture is the completest of the sort we have ever seen, and must have cost a world of time and trouble.

From the Preston Pilot

The proprietor of this paper has nobly redeemed his promise of providing a weekly newspaper that should "honour the eye in which it was to be produced," and, whilst he has so faithfully performed his part, we trust that he has not been disappointed in receiving that ample support which his unexampled endeavours have so well entitled him to expect. In addition to the numerous and very superior specimens of the graphic art given weekly, the proprietor has presented the subscribers with two very magnificent views of "the City of the World," our own great metropolis, the talent exhibited in the production of which is of the highest order; indeed, the art of wood-engraving is not have received so powerful a stimulus, through the instrumentality of this paper, as cannot fail to raise it to an eminence which must make it the envy and admiration of the whole world of letters.

From the Drogheda Argus

LONDON IN 1842.—We took occasion, in May of the past year, to notice a weekly paper then newly published, under the title of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Since then this periodical has been progressing in public favour, and very deservedly so. The talent of the PRESS in England is unrivalled at the same time the mind and the taste of the people, which object it carries out by well written original articles, and by beautiful engravings illustrating all the interesting occurrences of the day. We have chiefly to refer to the engravings of a magnificent plate presented to its subscribers in the opening of the new year. It is a tableau monstre of London, in two parts; a north and south view, taken by the Daguerreotype from the summit of the York Column.

From the Kilkenny Journal.

We have already expressed our opinion of the merits of this extremely interesting paper. But the fact of the spirited proprietors having made a present to their subscribers of a magnificent print, entitled "London in 1842," calls for a fresh meed of approbation. These splendid views of London have been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet—one is northern, and the other southern. They are executed in the highest style of art, and are contained in one immense sheet. If anything were wanting to complete the popularity of this elegant and admirable journal, it is now supplied by that chef d'œuvre. "London in 1842."

The spirited newspaper, which is of an entire novel, and decidedly meritorious, character, has just presented its subscribers of six months' standing with a splendid view of "London in 1842," which was taken from the top of the York Column, by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures one a north, and the other a south view of the Metropolis. It is a most accurate representation of London as it is at present, and taken from a pleasing point of view, fully displaying the beauties of St. James's Park, and the gorgeous mansions in its vicinity.

From the Dorset Gazette.

A NEW YEAR'S GIFT.—The liberal and spirited proprietors of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS—a weekly newspaper of standing worth—have just presented its readers with a beautiful New Year's Gift, namely, an extensive bird's-eye view of London, from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, on one large sheet. It was taken by the celebrated Daguerreotype process; and is one of the most extraordinary examples of pictorial illustration ever offered by any London newspaper. The London ILLUSTRATED NEWS is a publication of highly meritorious character, hebdomadally presenting a condensation of the accumulated information of the daily press, with the most pleasing and tasteful embellishments. We cannot pass him in silence on the management of so useful and amusing a publication

From the Belfast Vindicator.

We have had occasion already to notice in favourable terms this extraordinary weekly newspaper, and we have now to speak of a production of a fresh effort of the proprietors to merit the patronage of the public. Commencing the new year well, they have gratuitously presented a magnificent gift to their subscribers, being a view of "London in 1842," taken by the Daguerreotype process, and under the sanction of the Duke of York executed in the most beautiful style of art, and contained on one immense sheet. The objects are represented with the greatest accuracy, and there is a pleasant air diffused in the entire whole proves the wonderful perfection to which even wood-engraving has been brought within the last few years. A more elegant, appropriate, and cheap holiday present could not be found than this admirable view of the "great Metropolis."

From the Newcastle Chronicle.

The spirited proprietors of this splendid and interesting weekly paper have presented to their subscribers a splendid print of the City of London, which, for neatness of design and elegance of execution, certainly far and away surpasses anything of the kind we ever inspected. This splendid view of the "great metropolis" is published on one enormous sheet, taken, we understand, by the extraordinary Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures one a north and the other a south view of London, the point whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's Column. The Times thus speaks of this chef d'œuvre.—"The pictorial effect is really very fine. the perspective is well managed; the accuracy with which individual objects of interest are represented is no mistake as to the beauty and the boldness of the general picture; while the nicety of execution, along with the softened blending of lights and shades, reflects high honour on the artist, and shows the extent to which wood-engraving has been carried. These prints would not be a more appropriate and acceptable present (in so portable a form) for country friends

From the Worcester Independent.

That beautifully embell shed periodical continues to keep pace not only with the favourable anticipations which its earlier numbers led us to form, but to exceed all conceptions of what can possibly be effected by the weekly press. Its last number is accompanied with a view of London, worth, in our opinion, a whole year's subscription. It is truly a colossal specimen of pictorial illustration, and fully proves the gigantic powers of the Daguerreotype principle, by which process, we understand, it has been produced.

From the Dumfries Advertiser.

The first volume of this charming publication closes with the year 1842; and the first part of volume second is already out with the opening year. The illustrations are graceful and spirited, and indicate in variety. The rapidity with which they are executed is not the striking occurrences of the day is especially wonderful. A together, this is a remarkably beautiful and remarkably cheap publication. And now let us still more particularly notice a "New View of London," presented to its subscribers by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS. It is a splendid picture.

From the Hull Packet

This unique publication has entered upon the new year right gloriously. It has got only "come out" in the full blaze of that resplendent "halo" with which it has continued to surround itself, but accompanied also by a magnificent print, of colossal dimensions, representing a bird's-eye view of the great metropolis, from the summit of the Duke of York's Column The title of this splendid print is "London in 1842;" and its pictorial effect is really admirable. The presentation of such a work of art to its subscribers bears striking evidence of the spirit and enterprise of its proprietors and conductors, and will not be lost either upon the public taste or the public discernment. The object of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is well expressed in its title. It is to illustrate the news of the day—every great event, every striking occurrence—by pictorial representations; and this carrying out in a manner far beyond what could have been expected in a weekly the price of which scarcely exceeds that of its unadorned contemporaries.

From the Cheltenham Journal

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has published a supplement, with which they give a "Colossal View of London," a plate, 4 feet 4 inches in length, representing London as it is. It was taken from the top of the Duke of York's monument, by means of M. Claudet's Daguerreotype process, on a number of small silver plates, copied from thence on upwards of sixty distinct blocks of wood, which required the employment of nineteen engravers for two months, the work never stopping night or day. It was afterwards stereotyped and printed. It is indeed a triumph of art, and we recommend this unique production to the attention of our readers.

From the Norfolk Chronicle.

Having ourselves been among the numerous purchasers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS from the period of its commencement, we make our acknowledgments to the proprietors of this splendidly and admirably conducted publication for a copy of the most recent print of "London in 1842," which, in common with the rest of the subscribers of six months' standing, we have received as a gratuitous presentation. The view in question is taken from the top of the Duke of York's column, near St. James's Park, and owing to the difficulties necessarily encountered in the execution of the original drawing (founded on the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet), are added copies of the no less accurate and by which the drawing so obtained was transferred on the largest scale to the ingenious, united blocks of boxwood, wherein the talents of the engraver have been felicitously exercised, it is impossible for us to speak in terms of "fitting praise," with reference to the consummation of so splendid a work of the kind. A work in which local accuracy and pictorial effect are conjointly displayed with consummate skill, and which reflects the highest credit on the various ability of the artists employed, and on the liberal spirit of the donors of the print. In thus returning our notice of it, we have a real pleasure in bearing testimony to the increasingly great merits of this extraordinary and hitherto unrivalled enterprise. For, whether in point of graphic excellence or of literary character—whether consideration be given to its varied intelligence, the keen and timely tone of its editorials, or to the indefatigable vigilance, the Argus-eyed vibrancy, the unfailing promptitude with which subjects of the pencil, the beautiful embellishments of every connected work is equal to the contemplation of its readers, we have no hesitation in affirming, that its present ample enjoyment of popularity and success is a guerdon well-earned by the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

From the Dublin Evening Packet.

A work of art as unique as it is really magnificent has been issued by the proprietors of this publication. It contains a picture of London, taken from the top of the Duke of York's Column, by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, and is divided into two parts, northern and southern view. The engraving, which occupies a sheet of paper of vast magnitude, is splendidly executed, and, in connexion with the double number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS it accompanies, it forms a perfect wonder of newspaper enterprise.

From the Limerick Reporter.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—A weekly newspaper, thus named, is making rapid progress since its first publication, about seven months since. It presents amusement with instruction weekly to be met with in weekly periodicals, combining art and science with the news. A supplement, as a New Year's Gift, was lately presented to its subscribers by the proprietors of this excellent and very instructive paper, together with the publication in one enormous sheet, four feet and a half feet by three and a half, of a superb view of the metropolis, taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, from the summit of the Duke of York's Column. This picture is the completest of the sort we have ever seen, and is altogether unrivalled by anything heretofore produced by this mode of engraving, and calculated to excite, in all who behold it, feelings of surprise at the magnitude of its proportions. It forms two pictures, one a north and the other a south view of London. The execution of these views is admirable; every object of interest is well, brought out, and the most conspicuous features of the great city are at once discovered. To publish such a plate was an arduous undertaking, and we must say for an accurate representation of London as it is at the present moment, and all the changes that have taken place since the erection of the Nelson monument, which is at present undergoing repair, it surpasses in neatness of finish and execution anything of the kind we have ever witnessed.

From the Waterford Mail.

One of the most magnificent works of art, in connexion with the above publication, has just been issued. We allude to the "Picture of London" presented by the proprietors to the subscribers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, in one sheet of vast magnitude taken by the Daguerreotype process at M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates combined to form two pictures—the one being a north view of London, and the other a southern view—taken from the summit of the Duke of York's monument. The immense expense to which the proprietors must have gone in getting up such an engraving, spares free of expense to their readers, displays a degree of enterprise and spirit on their parts which must be met with a corresponding patronage on the part of the public. The readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS must feel grateful for this costly New Year's Gift with which they are presented.

From the Worcestershire Chronicle.

Of all the illustrated periodicals of the present day, the subject of this notice stands, perhaps, pre-eminent. Its last number is accompanied with a splendid print, one of the productions is a striking picture of the Metropolis (published as a supplement to the NEWS of January 7., taken from the summit of the York column, which stands, as many of our readers are aware, on the Carlton House, between St. James's park and Pall Mall Those who are acquainted with London will be delighted with the accuracy with which all the principal edifices are seen, and those who are not will be forthwith provided with a splendid and faithful representation, to give them some idea of the vastness and magnificence of the capital of the world. The engraving is taken by the Daguerreotype process on the wood engraving, on a colossal scale, which we have ever seen, and the labour attendant upon its production must have been very great. The original pictures were taken by M. Claudet, by means of the process discovered by M. Daguerre, on a great number of silver plates these had to be copied and arranged in a general whole, then they had to be drawn upon the wood (no less than sixty blocks) and the engravers pressed together to form a surface sufficiently large for the picture; next came the engraving, and, when that was done, it was distributed out to the various engravers employed on the work. The original of a printing machine, and the electrotype process was resorted to, for the purpose of procuring a duplicate set of plates. This, however, was found to be too slow a process, and hence it was abandoned to procure another set from the matrix to print. The design was carried into execution, and the result is now before us, the most splendid work of the kind (as we before observed) we have ever witnessed, and we do not hesitate to say that the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have spared no expense, and that their enterprise, combined with consummate talent, and great labour, the work must have cost, the proprietors of the NEWS have for their spirited undertaking.

From the Kent Herald

LONDON IN 1842.—Under this title the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have published a magnificent engraving, on a colossal scale, of unequalled magnitude and excellence. It is a view of London, taken from the summit of the DUKE OF YORK'S Column, looking to the south, St. James's Park, and to the magnificent Regent's Buckingham Palace, Westminster Abbey, Queen-street, the Athenæum, St. Church, the Reform and the United Service Club houses, the Houses of Parliament, St. Paul's Cathedral, &c., &c. It is probably the largest wood engraving ever produced, and could only be executed by the most skilful engravers. The views were first taken separately by the Daguerreotype process, combined by skilful draughtsmen, and transferred in sixty of the largest slabs of box-wood that could be procured. The junction of these, and the obtaining from the whole an engraving of uniform excellence, is among the triumphs of the art. The proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have completed, and will no doubt largely contribute to increase the already extensive popularity of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

From the Brighton Gazette.

The proprietors of this paper have just united what is properly called by one of its numerous admirers, "the Press" with the Pencil. It has presented its subscribers with a splendid print of the Metropolis, type from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, and executed with a faithfulness and spirit most creditable to the artists. The publication of this paper forms a new era in newspaper literature, and will of course be hailed by all connected with it.

From the Age Advertiser

This is the most attractive newspaper of the day. Its object is to blend amusement with information, delivering the latter in the most pleasing form. Its proprietors are most appropriate to the matter, and are executed in a style that led us to fear at one time that they were more certain to gratify the eye than the mind. A great number of engravings have, however, fortified the proprietors in their hope of success, and they have given a striking proof of their intimation to make the publication worthy the support of the intelligent to all. their subscribers, on the completion of their first volume, a view of "London in 1842," one of the largest and best executed efforts of pictorial illustration we have ever seen. It is itself worth a year's subscription

From the Cambridge Chronicle.

A review of a newspaper is a newspaper is somewhat extraordinary, but the peculiar character of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS renders it somewhat a departure from the beaten path. It presents an entirely new feature in newspaper literature—that of "illustrating" the news of the week by wood-engravings that are hoped to rival in excellence the productions of the very praiseworthy ability with which the views of its conductors are carried out does not require to be commented at length at this time. The engravings, however, are not trashy affairs, ill-conceived and clumsily executed, but really most creditable productions, many of them being beautiful specimens of art, and all serving to give a lively impression of the subjects they represent. We have only further to speak of the extraordinary production which the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have given to their subscribers—an enormous engraving of London, taken from the Duke of York's Column. Mere description cannot give a fair notion of this wonderful example of newspaper enterprise, but any one who has seen the engraving must be struck by the beauty of design so upon calling at our office. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has met with success for its continued success. It is calculated to improve the mind and taste of the people, and, in an increase of the general knowledge of the productions of the trashy prints which have so long been a disgrace to the weekly press of London

From the Newcastle Journal

The spirited proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a "weekly," pictorially embellished, have issued and presented to their subscribers with the number ending January 7, 1842, a very handsome Daguerreotype engraving of the great capital of the metropolis—London. This splendid print measures a feet 4 inches by 2 feet, and is allowed to be a perfect likeness. This extraordinary work must have been most effectual as the production of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for a copy of this wonderful wood-cut. As a suitable present at this season of the year there have had no opportunity of seeing the newspapers, we recommend the prodigy of the fine arts to our readers, the prize being only sixpence.

From the Wiltshire Independent

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON PACKET which has had occasion to speak favourably on its first appearance, maintains that character which its early numbers gave promise of. The idea was a very good one, it was well followed up, and we believe success of no ordinary kind has attended the enterprise. The last number is a specimen of the ability displayed in the literary department, or the spirited cuts with which it is illustrated and ornamented, seems fully equal to any of its predecessors, is accompanied with an engraving, upon an enormous sheet of paper, of London in its present state. The engraving, which is in two parts, giving a north and a south view of the great metropolis, has been taken by the Daguerreotype process from the top of the Duke of York's Column, and exhibits very clearly and distinctly all the remarkable features of mighty London. We cannot speak more highly of this splendid work of art than it deserves.

From the Fermanagh Reporter

This publication has now arrived at the completion of its first volume, and the proprietors have truly asserted their claim to support. Throughout the whole series, the true spirit of hilarity is in the ascendant, and the extensive patronage the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has already received is proof of the ability with which it has been conducted.—Whether we think of the wit or the humour—whether we think of the original articles or the suitable engravings that accompany them, it is impossible to restrain the purple fluid from

"Tickling up and down our veins."

The most recent achievement of the spirited publication is an enormous sheet presenting a splendid view of London. This view is well executed, and reflects great credit on the artist, whoever he be.

From the Glasgow Herald

VIEW OF LONDON IN 1842.—A very wonderful specimen of the art of wood-engraving has just been published in connexion with a pictorial periodical well known under the title of THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It consists of an enormous bird's-eye view of London, taken from the summit of the Duke of York's Column, by means of M. Claudet's Daguerreotype process. In point of magnitude it is the largest wood cut ever produced in this or any other country, being upwards of eight feet long and more than six feet broad—the largest one of the celebrated "Death of Douratza," which, a few years ago, was reckoned the finest as well as the largest effort in wood-engraving ever made. The view is magnificent, embracing every object within and around the metropolis, and all delineated with singular precision and fidelity. The perspective, and lights and shadows, are managed with admirable effect, and the whole forms a beautiful picture, calculated to convey a striking idea of the grandeur and extent of the British metropolis As a work of art, it is well worthy of preservation, and the Londoner who has not seen it has a pleasure in store worthy of public approbation. And the Londoner who has not seen it has a pleasure in store worthy of public approbation. And the Londoner who the fine arts in general are likely to receive from the application of recent discoveries in science. Some idea may be formed of the labour expended upon it from the fact that the block is composed of upwards of sixty distinct pieces of box-wood, and that the engravers were more than three months engaged upon it, working night and day for two months. The number which the beautiful print accompanies concludes the first volume of this entertaining work, which appears to be conducted with unabated energy and ability.

From the Sunderland Chronicle

From the examination of several numbers of this varied and highly interesting publication among the newspapers of the day, we were led on a former occasion to express our highest opinion in its favour, and to view it as an enterprise worthy of public approbation. Added to its being a work of the soundest information, and containing in its original features articles of leading talent, it is calculated also to instruct and amuse through the medium of cuts, and consequently must be a great favourite among the great readers of newspapers than any we have yet seen. The pictorial representations with which each number abounds are the finest specimens of the art, and the designs and execution of the views have been the result of much labour, meaning the whole an undertaking of great expense, which, considering the cheapness at which it is given to the public, can only be expected to make a return by that vast extent of circulation, that we are happy to perceive, it has already attained to.

We have this week been presented by the proprietors with an enormous pictorial sheet, entitled "London in 1842," issued to the subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It contains two views, one of the north and the other of the south parts of London, taken by the Daguerreotype process on silver plates. The delineations are considered the most accurate, and as said to be the truest representation of London ever produced, affording to strangers the clearest notions of the magnificence and splendour of the finest city in the world.

From the Oxford Herald

We have more than once noticed a paper entitled the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, for the purpose of bestowing upon it the commendation it has given to the art of wood-engraving. We have again to award our praise to the proprietors of this ably-conducted paper for the spirit with which they have brought out a print of London in 1842.

From the Perthshire Courier

At the beginning of the year, we may very properly notice some of our contemporaries of the weekly press which have given to their subscribers the experiment of taking a line of their own—of decidedly successful. At the head of these we must place the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, an undertaking for which taste, talent, and enterprise have obtained immediate and decided success. When we recollect the difficulties which appeared to us that it would be impossible to maintain the degree of excellence with which it started, so numerous and well-executed were the plates which it presented to its readers, we considered that what we saw was the result of overproduction, and that neither time nor money could be afforded to support the same display week by week. We are glad to perceive, however, that there has been any falling off, either in the number or merit of the illustrations; but on the contrary, that every interesting occurrence which could be made more intelligible and interesting by the artist, has been nobly and liberally done. But it has now become still more interesting, as it has entered into the whole, and produced what may truly be called a number of art, and which will, constitute an epoch in the history of wood-engraving. We have received from the spirited proprietors a representation of London, taken from the top of the York column, nearly five feet in length, and so well executed, that we shall be much surprised if it be surpassed in neatness, or ornament, a case which it well deserves. We beg to tender the spirited proprietors our best thanks for their courtesy in sending us a specimen, and wish them all the success which their ingenuity and enterprise have so well entitled them to expect. We cannot but notice that the accompanying number is illustrated with many views of old London, before the fire, and contains a song in praise of the great city, set to music with accompaniments, not difficult, though they would have obtained deserved praise if they had been given by themselves, seem trifles when compared with their gigantic companion.

From the Norwich Guardian

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—This is the title of a literary and pictorial publication which has met with unprecedented success since its commencement in May last. We have had repeated occasion to admire the taste and ability displayed in its wood-cuts, which are generally of a very superior description; but in the present instance, we are presented with a splendid view of London, on a scale of magnificence seldom attempted in wood-engraving. It was taken by the Daguerreotype process, and is unrivalled in the other Atlantic, and in a style of elegance and accuracy which could only be surpassed

From the Perthshire Courier

NEW AND UNRIVALLED VIEW.—The proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have published a superb view of the Metropolis, in one enormous sheet, which, being stamped as a supplement to the newspaper, goes free to all parts. This wonderful production is taken by the Daguerreotype process, and is the first instance, but to give our readers an idea of the labour and expense attending the subsequent process, we may mention that the engraver has been employed for many day and night for two months, to transfer the drawings to the wood. The view is taken from the summit of the Duke of York's column, and is divided into two views—the north and the south These are admirably executed every object of interest is brought out, and the most prominent features of the great metropolis are at once discovered. The whole forms a great triumph of the art, and is pictorial.

From the Newry Telegraph.

LONDON IN 1842.—This is the title of a print which has been presented to the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers on the occasion of the New Year. It is an extraordinary example of pictorial illustrations which has ever yet been offered by a newspaper, and giving convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process, applied on a large scale, and through the medium of the wood engraver. The print, which is of enormous length and width of the imperial city, from two points of view, the breadth of the masses into which the artist throws his subject, the richness of detail, the relief of light and shade, all combine to make this the most eligible "Picture of London" which has ever been presented. It is, in short, a rare subscription which country readers can form for themselves any idea of the grandeur of the British metropolis

From the Mayo Constitution

The subscribers to this weekly publication have been presented by the publisher with a splendid print of London. There are two views of the great metropolis, and they are pronounced to be most accurate. This is a new feature in the weekly press, and we do know of the success. This has been truly pronounced to be the most extraordinary example of pictorial illustration which has ever been offered by a newspaper, and giving convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process, applied on a large scale, and through the medium of the wood engraver. The print, which is of enormous length and width of the imperial city, from two points of view, the breadth of the masses into which the artist throws his subject, the richness of detail, the relief of light and shade, all combine to make this the most eligible "Picture of London" which has ever been presented. It is, in short, a rare subscription which country readers can form for themselves any idea of the grandeur of the British metropolis

From the Tipperary Free Press.

The spirited proprietors of this interesting paper have published a splendid print, under the title of "London in 1842," as a present to their subscribers. It is a most extraordinary pictorial production, taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, forming two magnificent pictures—one a north, and the other a south view of the great metropolis. The correctness of the delineations and execution of the views cannot be surpassed. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been the most remarkable and successful novelty of the year when gave it birth. Conceived in a liberal spirit of enterprise—conducted with a view to the promotion of national intelligence, and the more refining influences of moral and intellectual progress, it has, beautiful, and hitherto unfield to the novelist and historian—dedicated to justice and the good of mankind above all, clasping Literature and Art together in the firm embrace of Mind at approved and speedy augmentation of circulation, as well as at home, and won its way into the popular heart with a rapidity and success commensurate with the far spread and enthusiasm which it had so suddenly called up

Extract from Dr. Ure's testimonial, June 6, 1841:—"I find Mr. Nelson's Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior, to the best Isinglass, for every culinary purpose; it is entirely free from any disagreeable taste or smell, and I have little doubt to ensure its either kinds of gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is an article well adapted for hotels, taverns, mess-use and ship stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—Eamcote Mills, Warwick, and 14, Bucklersbury.

SILVER SUPERSEDED, and those corrosive and injurious metals, called NICKEL German Silver, superseded by the introduction of a new and perfect substitute ALBATA PLATE. C. WATSON (late Alderman), 4 and 5, Bardsan, aided by a person of science in the amalgamation of metals, has succeeded in bringing to public notice the most beautiful article ever yet offered, possessing all the richness of silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness, with its perfect sweetness in use, rendering it as free a chemical purpose, by which all that is noxious in mixed metals is entirely extracted, resisting all acids, may be cleaned as silver, and is manufactured into every article for the table and sideboard.

The public will immediately see and appreciate the advantage of using Albata Plate, and that silver is not more different from gold than has metal is from all others, the public will therefore have no difficulty in discovering the animus which directs the virulent attacks made against this by a party who to daily sacrificing them from the unparalleled success that has marked the progress of his New Plate since its introduction. THE BEST MEDICINE IN THE WORLD. Read the following statement, which must carry conviction to the mind of every reasonable person, and affords additional and weighty testimony in favour of this singularly efficacious medicine.

TO THE PROPRIETORS OF PARR'S LIFE PILLS

Gentlemen, This is to inform you, in detail, how Old PARR'S LIFE PILLS (of Pills of Health) have done for me. First,—They have cured me of a cough of about three years' duration, by which I could sleep very little; but the third night I took them I slept very comfortably. Secondly,—Of a Nervous Affection, with which I have been troubled for many years, chiefly, of Costiveness, from which I have suffered much for many years, having been, during the last three years, frequently obliged to take medicine every other day, or even more frequently to going to the ground. Fourthly,—Of the Rheumatism, from which I have suffered much, but now only very seldom and very slightly. Fifthly. Of a Scorbutic humour, with which I have tormented at least forty-four years, having been lame with it, several times, for months together. This has been a very stubborn case. I do not know what I may have, but at present I have not a sore upon me. I am now enabled to bless and praise God for his mercies in bringing to light such a restorative of health and soundness of body. I am not like the saint I was a year ago, being so much altered for the better. All these cures have been effected in me, by the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. And Lastly.—I believe them to be a safe preventive of the Bowel Complaint, for neither I nor my wife have had it since taking them; she having frequently had it previous.

I am, Gentlemen, your humble Servant, R. H. RICHARDSON, Schoolmaster.

Red-Lion-street, Walsall, Staffordshire, January, 1841.

WITNESS.—R. Richardson, his present wife, can vouch to his being afflicted as above, for more than 22 years.

NOTE.—You are at liberty to make use of the above statement in any way you please; I am ready to answer any question put to me, relating thereto. R. W. R.

MESSRS. T. ROBERTS and Co., London.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS! Purchasers may be sure they have the genuine medicine if they find the words PARR'S LIFE PILLS engraved on the Government Stamp, which is pasted round the sides of each box, in WHITE letters on a red ground. Prepared only by T. Roberts and Co. Crane-court, Fleet-street; and sold wholesale by their appointment, by J. Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; also by Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard, London; and J. R. Raines, Edinburgh; and all respectable chemists and dealers in medicine, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family boxes 11s. each. Full directions are given with each box.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 25th January, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—I have seen no material alteration in our fashions since the date of my last letter which requires any particular remark. Robes for full dress are made much pointed at the waist; for half-dress the corsage is cut round, and has a band; and the sleeves and corsage are perfectly plain for velvet redingotes. For ball-dresses I have observed two or three very handsome toilettes in tulle, trimmed with blonde. Among other evening dresses let me mention a robe in figured rose satin, having an opening on both sides of the skirt, and trimmed with a rouleau of marten sable on each side of these openings, which are not carried very far down, the robe being sufficiently short to permit the petticoat of rose satin, trimmed with fur, to be seen. This same sort of fur is used for trimming round the corsage and at the bottom of the sleeves. This dress had an extremely effective appearance. Amongst our various fashions this winter there is none more decidedly exhibited than that of having garlands of flowers placed on each side of robes. I have now before me a ball-dress made for one of our most distinguished fashionables, trimmed in this manner. It is a robe of blonde, with small bouquets of roses, and relieved on each side by a garland of little May roses. The garland is fastened to the waist, and is attached to the skirt in a kind of festoon, reaching to nearly the height of the middle of the leg. The robe being thus relieved, permit a volant of blonde placed under the robe of white satin to appear; this volant, in its turn, being furnished on either side by a bouquet of roses placed at the bottom of the garland; and, as well as the crown of Inez de Castro, which was worn by the same person, it was a very beautiful and remarkable dress. Blonde is much worn at all our parties, particularly for coiffures. I lately observed a coiffure châtelaine, which, I think, I once before mentioned to you, made of blonde; it had long falling pieces on each side of the face, but which were kept in their place by a fringe of gold, of which each end was fastened by an emerald or a ruby. At the same party was a lady wearing a coiffure Lamballe, formed of a cordon of little roses winding spirally round a little blonde scarf, forming a sort of toque, worn rather on one side and slightly forward on the forehead. The two ends of the scarf, which were reunited on the same side, fell down upon the neck. When this coiffure is well put on, and fastened in front by a rivière of diamonds, I know nothing more charming or more elegant. As I have before observed, an immense quantity of flowers are now consumed: their delicacy, their beauty, and their extraordinary similarity to the natural flower is one of the most remarkable things in our industry. We have just seen, at the magasin of Chagot, the cactus, the Beatrix crown, and some others of extreme fidelity to nature, and arranged with a most marvellous taste; these are in constant request, and are everywhere seen. As usual, lace is an object of the greatest luxury here, and forms the most fashionable trimming to robes of velvet, satin, and brocade; but of all our lace the type of the greatest distinction is the Alençon, of which the richness of appearance harmonizes perfectly with the superb stuff which it is so generally employed to ornament. I do not know that I have anything farther that deserves your attention; and till my next, adieu.

Dujecta membra poetæ.—Horat.

* * * * *

A form now moves
By the Abbey's wall,
Like a spectre from midnight tomb—
And softly treads
That its footstep' fall
May not waken the dismal gloom!
A cheek once blushing—
An eye of blue,
And a bosom warm and fair—
But the blushes are lost
In the moonlight's hue,
And the eye is bathéd
In sorrow's dew,
And the bosom is cold despair!

'Tis the second night
Of her weary watch,
And many a time she vainly tries,
From the the distant vale
A sound to catch
That will hush her weeping and calm her sighs!
But no—'tis silence—
And the tears
Run quickly down her pallid cheek—
Alas! that one
Of such few years
Should have a heart so nigh to break!

Oh! 'twas the soul
Of gentleness!
It waited not
For deep distress
To move its sensibility—
The dew of pity from her eye
Would damp her cheek if ev'n a flow'r
Were rudely torn in blossom hour!

She sinks on a tomb
Unable to stand—
Her head droops down
On her lily hand:
Her eyes close up
Their fount of tears
And a lifeless thing
She now appears!

IRELAND.

Mr. O'Connell has addressed a letter to the Cork Examiner, in relation to the Irish Poor Law, which thus concludes:—"It has been said that I have rated too highly the income of five hundred pounds a-year as the minimum on which to impose the charity-tax. I have been asked why should not lesser incomes of £300 or £200 or £100 a-year be liable to the tax? My answer is, that I would leave all persons of a smaller income than £500 a-year to the impulses of their own benevolence, generosity, and above all, to the impulse of their Christian convictions. The evidence in the original Poor Law inquiry is conclusive, that it is safe to leave the middle and poorer in Ireland to their own Christian feelings. That evidence shows that it was these classes who supported the multitudinous paupers in Ireland; principally from a most laudable sense of religious obligation. I would leave them to work their way to Heaven by doing good to the poor, to the sick, and the desolate. It is objected to me that I opposed the Poor Laws with a view to promote the paramount object of my political life—the Repeal of the Union. There never was a more unfounded objection; there is nothing more likely to promote the repeal than allowing the present poor-law system to work out many more of its mischiefs, and to aggravate, by personal sufferings, the dislike which we naturally entertain to English legislation. No. If I could abolish the present Poor Laws, I should deprive myself of a powerful weapon which I otherwise could, and which (if left to me) I candidly confess I will use, in every legal and constitutional way, to promote the interests of the repeal."

Fatal Affray.—Sudden Death of a Coroner.—Since Tuesday week an inquest has been in progress on a small island, near Lanesborough, on the Shannon, upon the body of a peasant, killed in an affray with the revenue police on the previous Friday. On that occasion a party of the police proceeded to seize an illicit still, when they were attacked by the populace, and a desperate conflict ensued. One of the peasantry was shot dead, and several of them were severely wounded. The police, ten in number, after exhausting all their ammunition, were, it is stated, compelled to abandon the seizure of the still and the illicit whiskey, the lieutenant who commanded the party and several of his men having been wounded. The government, and the excise authorities deemed the case one of so much importance that Mr. Stormont, of the Irish excise solicitor's department, was despatched to attend the inquest. The evidence on both sides closed on Friday week, and the coroner was about to commence his charge to the jury, when he suddenly dropped dead! For some time the greatest consternation prevailed, but upon consideration it was found that all the proceedings taken were null and void, and it was therefore determined to obtain the attendance of another coroner, in order to commence de novo.

The chairman of the Irish Fisheries Protection Society has received a communication from the government, stating that a Bill will be brought forward in the ensuing session, for the purpose of providing funds for defraying the expenses of the preservation of salmon in the Irish rivers.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—The supplies of English wheat offering at Mark-lane this week having been on the increase, and, comparatively speaking, of inferior quality, we have to report a very heavy inquiry for that article, and the prices, in consequence, have suffered an abatement of from 1s to 2s per quarter without clearances being effected. So little has been passing in foreign wheat, both free and in bond, that the quotations have remained almost nominal. However, no fresh sales, but rates must be complied with by the holders. The best malting barley has gone off at late rates; but grinding and distilling sorts have declined in value 1s per quarter. In malt a fair business has been doing, but in oats, beans, peas, and flour next to nothing has been transacted.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 5570; barley, 4050; oats, 3140; and malt, 5982 quarters. Flour, 4910 sacks. Irish: oats, 4610 quarters. No Scotch or foreign.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 53s; ditto white, 54s to 58s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 40s to 47s; do. white, 49s to 57s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 22s to 28s; malting do., 28s to 31s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Oxford, 53s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 23s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 35s to 38s; maple, 37s to 38s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 30s to 26s; peas, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had a fair supply of clover seed offering, but the inquiry for it has ruled inactive. In all other kinds of seed little has been passing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 46s; hemp, seed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 8s 6d to 9s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 42s 1d; barley, 27s 2d; oats, 17s 0d; rye, 28s 2d; beans, 27s 7d; peas, 29s 5d.

Imperial Averages of the Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 6d; Barley, 25s 6d; Oats, 17s 1d; Rye, 29s 1d; Beans, 28s 4d; Peas, 30s 7d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 10s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—Although there has been a slight falling-off in the demand for tea, holders remain firm, and sound common congou, cash, cannot be had under 1s 3½d per lb. No public sales are yet declared.

Sugar.—In most kinds of sugar but a moderate business has been transacted, yet we have no material variation to notice in prices.

Coffee.—This article has been again in slow request, and the quotations have had a downward tendency.

Cocoa.—Little is doing in cocoa at about previous currencies.

Rum.—The rum market is very dull, sales being with difficulty effected at lower rates. Proof, Leewards, 1s 7d to 1s 8d.

Indigo.—The quarterly sales have been brought to a conclusion. Out of 6810 packages which passed the chair, 499 have been withdrawn, 2689 bought in, and 3621 sold. As compared with the October sales prices show an advance of 10d per lb. on Kurpah and ordinary Bengal; 9d on good and middling ditto; 6d on fine Bengal and Madras; and 1s on Oude.

Tallow.—We have a steady demand for P.Y.C. on the spot, at 47s. For forward delivery little is doing.

Oils.—Only a moderate business has been done in oils this week, at about late rates.

Provisions.—In Irish butter little is doing at barely stationary prices. Foreign butter is in demand, and the best Friezland is held at 116s to 118s per cwt. Bacon is very dull. In other kinds of provisions scarcely anything is doing.

Wool.—About 2700 packages have been imported this week. Fine parcels are selling on full as good terms as of late, but in the inferior descriptions next to nothing has been transacted.

Hops.—This market remains steady, and the late advance in figures is firmly supported.

Potatoes.—The supplies still continuing large, and the weather mild, the demand is slow, at 3½ to 6½ per cwt.

Coals.—Adair's Main, 15s 6d; Chester Main, 15s 3d; Holywell Main, 17s; Ord's Redheugh, 14s 6d; Wylam, 16s 9d; Tanfield Moor, 17s 9d; Hetton, 20s 3d; Stewart's, 20s per ton. Ships arrived, 7.

Smithfield.—Notwithstanding the supplies of both fat and lean stock offering in our market this week the demand for beef, mutton, and pork has ruled heavy, at, in some instances, drooping prices, but veal has advanced from 4d to 6d per 8lbs. Scarcely any foreign beasts have been on offer. Beef from 3s 2d to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s 4d, veal, 4s 10d to 5s 10d; and pork, 3s 10d to 4s 8d per 8 lbs., to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—In consequence of the immense supplies of country slaughtered meat which have been on offer in these markets the general inquiry has ruled excessively dull, at low currencies. Beef has sold at from 3s 2d to 3s 8d; mutton, 3s 4d to 4s; veal, 4s 1d to 5s 6d; and pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d per 8 lbs., by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The West India mail arrived in the middle of last week, but the letters received from these important colonies are not so late as might be expected by steam conveyance. The information generally, however, is satisfactory to the West India merchants in this country, in consequence of large supplies of this article weekly arriving from various quarters, which circumstance is much in favour of the manufacturing consumers. Sheep's wool, on the contrary, is gradually becoming dearer, the demand for it in Leeds and various other places having materially increased during the current month. In the silk trade, also, activity is gradually becoming more obvious. In barley and oats a considerable dullness exists, and each of these articles are a shade lower than they were last week.

In the money market, the only difficulty which the great capitalists at present find is a safe and profitable channel for the employment of their property. As trade improves, however, a part of this difficulty will be removed. In the meantime, public securities are the principle attractions for money investments.

On the English Stock Exchange, time bargains have for some time past been limited by the small quantity of what is called floating stock in the market, the abundance of money during the last two years having been employed in stock purchases for investment, by which a great portion of speculative stock has been taken out of the market altogether. In Consols for Account, therefore, the operations weekly become less interesting, and little difference exists now, consequently, betwixt the value of transactions for time or for money. In the course of this week the quotation has varied between 94¾ and 95¾, and little interest has been extended towards them by the public. On the Foreign Stock Exchange, very little business indeed has been done in the course of this week, and still less alteration can be noted in the value of any description of foreign securities.

In East India produce a great deal of business has occurred this week. The sales of indigo went off better than was previously expected, and prices, on the average, are rather higher than the October sale produced. Of East India sugar, likewise, large quantities were brought forward for sale, and prices were fairly maintained, considering the circumstances generally of the market in Mincing-lane. The quantity of opium on sale is not large, the holders generally waiting for further advices from the East before they press their property on the market for sale; indeed, when the mail arrives, it is more than probable that the demand will be increased, and higher prices then obtained than can be got at the present moment.

Ferris, Esq., of Gainsgrove, to Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the late Chilholton, Hants.—On the 25th inst., at All Souls Church, Langham place, by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Rochester, Sir Henry E. Austen, of Sandford, Surrey, to Catherine Frances, widow of the late Sir Robert Peckington, K.M.T., of Chelsworth, Suffolk.

DEATHS

At Blunham House, Beds, Sir Peter Payne, Bart. He was M.P. for this county in the short session of 1830—succeeded in his title by his eldest son, now Sir C. Gilles Payne, Bart.—In his 85th year, George Tyrrell Conquest, Esq., known as the author of a "History of Gloucester." His memory was most retentive, and he retained his faculties to the last.—Killed, during the retreat of the British army from Cabul, in the Tungee Tarekee Pass, Captain Rawdon Mair Mile, 5th Bengal Native Infantry, fourth son of the late William Augustus Miles, Esq.—At Astley Hall, Lancashire, Captain J. A. Ducie, late of the 92nd Regt., in his 60th year.—At Aynesbury, aged 84, Elizabeth, relict of Dr. Edmonds, whom she survived only a few days.—At Dentrelure, Scotland, James Neilson, esq., aged 83. He was 54 years a married man, and had 11 children, 49 grandchildren, and 41 great-grandchildren in all 101 descendants.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 40.—Vol. II.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 4, 1843. [Gratis.

PRESENT SESSION OF PARLIAMENT.

The present session of Parliament opens under circumstances calculated to render it one of the most interesting and important of any similar occasion within the last ten years. It is far from improbable that in the coming war of politics we shall see some new combinations of forces; the state of the country at home, its relations abroad, all present points of the deepest interest—all furnish abundant matter for the consideration of Parliament, which is now about to decide upon the merits of much that has passed, as well to legislate for the future.

As it is our principle to avail ourselves of every opportunity to give the public full and complete information on topics and events of immediate interest, we have this week devoted a supplement to the proceedings of the opening of the session, and a copious report of the first night's debate, published at the same hour as by the morning journals—a thing, we believe, never before attempted by any weekly journal.

Before we proceed to the details of this event, we think it would not be unappropriate to the occasion to give a brief sketch of the origin and general history of Parliament, for, like every other human institution, it has illustrated and proved the "eternity of change." The parliaments of our Henries and Edwards as little resembled the body of senators who met at Westminster on Thursday last, as the present state of the city in which they are called together is like that which met the eyes of a contemporary of such events as the deposition of Richard the Second or the battle of Bannockburn. Constitution, powers, functions, all have been altered—they have "waxed old as a garment, and as a garment have they been changed;" but the institution itself remains, adapted to the new forms of society, active as ever, and powerful both for evil and for good.

The endeavour to trace such an institution as Parliament to its remote origin, is much like following the stream of a large river to its source; we find so many tributaries falling into it in different places, and augmenting the main current, that by the time we have gone pretty high up towards what we regard as its springs, it becomes difficult to say which is the principal branch, and which merely the one contributing to swell it. Thus every history of Parliament begins by identifying it with the Michel-synoth, or great council—the Michel-gemote, or great meeting—and the Wittena-gemote, or meeting of wise men—all which terms were used by our Saxon forefathers to designate the gatherings of their chief men for deliberative and legislative purposes, and, in all probability, for judicial functions also. But the points in which these meetings, and what we generally understand by the term parliament, resembled each other, are far less in number than those in which they differ. The former were at first but the rude gatherings of the warriors of the north, when they first made themselves formidable to the inhabitants of southern Europe, on such occasions as the choice of a leader or a king, and which after times moulded into a form more adapted for a race not entirely or exclusively martial. How they were elected or chosen is but imperfectly known; but down to a far later period than that in which they existed, the suffrage by which they were chosen was far more general, in proportion to the number of the population, than it is at the present day. The earliest mention of the term "Parliament" occurs in the preamble to the Statute of Westminster, in 1272. The word appears to have a Norman-French origin. It is composed of the monarch, the lords spiritual and temporal (the House of Lords), and the knights, citizens, and burgesses (the House of Commons). Blackstone has defined its constitution at the earliest period at which it becomes marked with any distinctness. "The main constitution of Parliament as it now stands was moulded out so long ago as the 17th year of King John, A.D. 1215, in the great charter granted by that prince, wherein he promises to summon all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, personally, and all other tenants in chief under the crown, by the sheriff and bailiffs, to meet at a certain place with forty days' notice to assess aids and scutages when necessary; and this constitution has subsisted in fact, at least, from the year 1266, the 49 Hen. 3rd, there being still extant writs of that date to summon knights, citizens, and burgesses to Parliament." A statute of the 15 of Edw. II. declares that the matters to be discussed in Parliament for the good of the realm should be treated "according as had been before accustomed." This, as observed by Mr. Hallam, "not only establishes by a legislative declaration the present constitution of Parliament, but recognises it as already standing upon a custom of some length of time." The authority of Parliament has been very different at different times, and powerful as it is at present, it has been much more extensive, indeed, under the sway of the Plantagenets, it was almost boundless; it was much circumscribed by the Tudors, and under Henry the Eighth and Elizabeth its power was totally destroyed; the growing spirit of the people restored it to much, but far from all its original importance during the struggle with the Stuarts. A few instances of its ancient privileges may be quoted with advantage, to enable us to compare the present with the past. It is evident from recorded facts, that the Parliaments of old meddled with matters that neither Peers nor Commons would now dream of touching. They possessed all the rights and privileges they now enjoy, and many others joined with them. Nor does it seem that their extensive powers were placed exclusively in the Peers. The Parliament rolls, from the time they have been preserved, are more occupied with the proceedings of the Commons than of the Peers. To begin, for instance, with one of the most important of the present privileges of Parliament, the right vested in the Commons that all money bills should originate with them; this was not only enjoyed by the most ancient of our Parliaments, but all bills affecting the community originated with the Commons in the first instance.—from entailing the inheritance of the Crown to the enclosing a common. This is proved by the rolls of Parliament, from the first year from which they have been preserved. To the Commons was left almost entirely the business of legislature, the Lords confining themselves to their judicial functions, or to their duties as councillors of the Crown. We will give a few instances out of a vast mass of cases drawn from the rolls of Parliament, and from the Cotton papers. All the states concurred in the election of Henry the Fourth to the crown. The bills for settling the crown on Edward the Fourth, Richard the Third, and Henry the Seventh, all originated with the Commons. Petitions for the confirmation of a Queen's dowry, for the gift of reversions, for grants of lands and privileges, even when addressed to the king, are recorded as being referred to the Commons first, and after the significant entry, in the quaint-looking Norman French of the period, "a cest bille les communes sount assentuz," are taken into consideration by the Lords. But it is not only from their own records that the evidences of their importance in the state are to be drawn. Better proofs, if possible, are furnished by the opinion in which they were held by their contemporaries. They are more frequently petitioned than the Lords or the monarch; petitions are even presented to them by members of the House of Peers, which would hardly have been the case had the Peers possessed all the powers requisite to deal with the matters referred to by the petition itself. In the second year of Henry the Fifth, the soldiers in Picardy petition them respecting their pay; in the 15 of Hen. VI. the Duke of Gloucester (the Duke Humphrey of Shakspere), being chaplain of Calais and governor of the tower of Risbanke, petitions them to authorize the Treasurer of England to pay his soldiers out of some other funds, should the subsidy granted by Parliament for that be insufficient. In the 33 of Hen. VI., the Earl of Warwick, having been appointed to the situations held by the Duke of Gloucester, and not being able to obtain possession of either post, petitions the Commons to request the King to ordain, with the authority of Parliament, that he should not be impeached for anything that might happen to those places before he could get possession of them. The Countess of Warwick petitions them for the repeal of the act by which she was deprived of her titles and inheritances. But not to cite particular instances at greater length, it may suffice to mention the matters to which their assent was required, and to prove which cases as above might be given from the same authorities. In the last volume of the Rolls, including from the twelfth year of Edward the Fourth to the last Parliament of Henry the Seventh, there is not a single petition granted without their concurrence. Matter now wholly under the control of the Crown, of the Court of Chancery, or the judges, are decided by them; their assent is required to pardons, to the depriving a peer of his dignity, to confirming the King's gift of a manor, and a feoffment of lands to certain persons who were to stand seised thereof to the use of his will. It would be difficult to say in what they did not interfere; there was much that could not be done without their consent then, for which no one thinks of asking their consent at present. There are many cases of their recommending persons to the King for employment both in civil and military affairs; of their praising or impeaching ministers and others for their conduct in war or peace; of their interfering in the treatment and exchange of prisoners of war. They reckoned the ransoms of illustrious prisoners as part of the funds of the nation, and required strict account of them; the ransoms both of the French and Scottish Kings were reckoned as part of the public resources. They were frequently opposed to the Crown, and the pretensions of the King. To all concessions they attach conditions either for their own benefit or that of the people. Their caution, and the grudging spirit with which they vote money, is always strongly marked, often amusing, and stands out in strong contrast with the facility with which the millions of the "estimates" are voted at the present day. In 1338 they refused an aid till they could consult with their constituents. In the following session they agreed to give one on certain conditions; if the conditions were not fulfilled, the aid was not to be granted. They remonstrate with the King for his extravagance, and will only allow the funds they vote to be received by certain persons of their own appointing. In 1393 they gave a subsidy under several conditions, one of which is this: if a peace or truce should be agreed to before the second part of it should be due, not a penny of it should be levied ("q'alors nul denier de la darreign moitee du quinzisme soit levez, ne briefissez par la levez.") In 1454 they refuse a grant altogether, alleging that the former one was sufficient, adding, moreover, "for they kan not, may not, ne dar not make any mee gruntes, considered the great povert and penurie that be among the communes of this land, for whom they be comen together at this time." How much have times changed, and yet how well the language of one age describes the circumstances of another! Who that read the debates of the past session but must have met with the iterated assertions of "the great povert and penurie that be among the communes of this land?" In addition to the extensive powers to which we have referred, they had the fullest liberty of speech and freedom of access to the person of the Sovereign. The estimation which a seat in Parliament was then deemed was quite equal to the honour in which it is held by "the gentlemen of England" at the present day. An undue return by the sheriff was punished by a fine of £100 to the King and £100 to the defrauded candidate, a sum which, allowing for the difference in the value of money then and now, cannot be valued at less than £3000 of the present currency. Men of the highest rank under the degree of a peer were then as now to be found among the commons. In the reign of Richard the Second, the Speaker, De La Mere, was the next in lineal succession to the throne. Yet these men, so powerful, so independent in speech and action, the heads and directors of all affairs civil and military—interfering also occasionally even in matters ecclesiastical, were "paid members:" the political party who insist on this among their other demands in their new constitution, have the usage of antiquity to adduce in its favour. Nor were their wages at all insignificant in amount. From every city and borough 2s. per day was the allowance of burgesses and citizens, from counties 4s., a day for the knights of the shire; these sums were equal to 30s. and £3 a day in money of the present time. An officer must be high in rank in the naval and military service who receives as much now. The Commons of England were in fact at one period, and that extending over a long period of time, the depositories of the whole power of the kingdom; the monarchs who were frugal in their expenditure, and managed the revenues of the crown with tolerable prudence, were less dependent on them, but where they were extravagant in habits, or weak of mind, they were placed almost at the mercy of their subjects. Thus Richard the Second was deposed by them with all the form and regularity of a procedure in a court of law, and it is evident from the accounts of the event, that the Commons considered they were only exercising an ancient and recognised right. In the reign of Henry the Seventh, however, they began to lose their influence; the confusion consequent on the wars of the Roses, and the destruction it carried into all the chief families of the state, followed as it was by the sway of an able and unscrupulous monarch, tended to produce this result. In the interval, when the strength of the aristocracy was beaten down by civil dissensions, and the power of a commonalty with many of the features of the present system of society had not arisen, he contrived to render himself almost absolute. But the first open blow at the independence of the Commons was made by his tyrannical son, Henry the Eighth, in the eighth year of his reign, in the statute which limited the franchise to the forty-shilling freeholders in counties, a proof that previously to this the suffrage must have been more extensive. From this period the power and character of the Commons rapidly declined:—

'Twere long to tell and sad to trace
Each step from splendour to disgrace.

We need only look at the page of history for the proof of their degradation. Nothing can well exceed in baseness and servility the conduct of the Parliament in this and the ensuing reign of Elizabeth. They were the ready agents of every act of tyranny and inconsistency in the monarch, by whom they were treated with all the contempt that an oriental sultan can have for his slaves. By the "Maiden Queen" they were bullied and scolded to an extent which, but that the language remains recorded, would alike be incredible and inconceivable, the "faithful Commons," with the Speaker at their head, trembling in the mean time on their knees before her. Even James the First, the least courageous of monarchs, could safely insult the Commons; but his own weakness of character and his boundless and insane profusion, together with the rising spirit and wealth of the people rendered the continuance of this system impossible. Those who hold the purse have one grand element of power in their possession, and this truth the Commons were not long in discerning. Every necessity of the King was the means of wringing from him the restoration of an ancient right or privilege, and the whole of the transactions which resulted in the civil war and the death of the first Charles was but the struggle of the Commons to regain the position they lost under the Tudors and the Stuarts. It is only when we compare the Commons of the present time with those of Henry the Eighth, Elizabeth, and James, that we can appreciate the extent of our obligations to the men who through much violence, and by means in many respects questionable in their character, restored the rights of the Commons of England.

But what is the power of Parliament now? "The authority of Parliament extends over the United Kingdom and all its colonies and foreign possessions. There are no other limits to its power of making laws for the whole empire than those which are common to it and to all other sovereign authority—the willingness of the people to obey, or their power to resist them. It has power to alter the constitution of the country, for it is but the constitution which the last act of Parliament has made. Thus the constitution is not the same this year that it was last; nor will it be the same next year that it is now. It may take away life by acts of attainder, and make an alien to be as a natural born subject. There are some subjects upon which the Parliament is said to have no right to legislate, such, for instance as the Church; but the expression can mean no more than that it is inexpedient to interfere at all with such matters by legal enactment. The very prayers and services of the Church are prescribed by statute. Parliament has changed the professed religion of the country, and has several times altered the succession to the throne." To conclude in the words of Sir Edward Coke, "the power of Parliament is so transcendant that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds." The decisions of more modern judges, however, have shown this opinion to be in some degree erroneous. The power of Parliament was circumscribed in one particular by the celebrated judgment of Lord Denman in Hansard v. Stockdale.

THE ASSEMBLING OF PARLIAMENT.

The act of the Sovereign alone can call the Parliament together. There have only been two instances of the Lords and Commons meeting by their own authority, namely, previously to the restoration of Charles the Second, and at the revolution of 1688. Only in one case can it meet without the summons of the Sovereign when there happens to be no Parliament existing on the demise of the Crown. (Anne, 6. c. 7.) As the Sovereign appoints the time and place of meeting, he, also, at the commencement of every session, declares to both houses the cause for which they are summoned, in a speech delivered by him in the House of Lords, in person, or by commissioners appointed under the great seal. Neither house can proceed to business till this has been done. It is not necessary, however, when they do proceed to business, that they should confine themselves to the questions stated in the summons; they may even refuse to consider any of them, and originate other business of their own. This right is generally asserted at the commencement of every session, in the custom always observed in the Commons of reading some bill a first time pro forma, before taking the royal speech into consideration. Other business is also frequently done at the same time. New writs are issued for places that have become vacant during the recess; returns are ordered, and even addresses presented, on matters quite unconnected with the speech from the throne.

PROROGATION AND ADJOURNMENT.

As the Crown has the power of assembling the Parliament, so he has the power of putting a termination to its proceedings; this is either a dissolution or prorogation. The adjournments are wholly at the discretion of the two houses. Nor is the Crown the sole determining power of the duration of Parliament, since, by the statute law, it must terminate at the expiration of seven years, if it has been elected so long; the demise of the Crown also makes a dissolution. A prorogation suspends all business, and every bill before the house at the end of the session must be renewed in the succeeding one. The forms observed at the prorogations and assemblings of Parliament are always the same; those of the meeting of the houses, as observed on the present occasion, are described in another part of the present supplement.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

Thursday being the day fixed for opening the present session of Parliament, increased enlivenment was observable about the West end, and the passing to and fro of gaudy equipages gave note of preparation that the London season had at length commenced. The crowds to be met with wending their way towards the Houses of Parliament were neither numerous nor well dressed; thus affording a convincing proof that, however interesting or important the matters to be debated, or however popular the great leaders of the anta-go-nis-tic parties in the state, the royal pageant is, after all, the great magnet of attraction upon these occasions. For some time past it was generally known that her Majesty, by advice of her physicians, had declined opening the Parliament in person, the avoidance of excitement or fatigue being the only real reason that existed for this resolve, and the due announcement of the fact prevented anything like public disappointment.

The Lords Commissioners on the occasion were the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Wharncliffe. Both Houses of Parliament assembled at half-past one. There were very few peers present in the House of Lords, but the seats were better occupied, as they presented a dazzling array of court beauties, who appeared to feel like flies in amber. There were several distinguished foreigners in the gallery, who evinced a deep interest as the reading of her Majesty's speech was proceeded with. Amongst the Peers on the Ministerial side we observed only Lord Cardigan, whilst on the Opposition we saw the Marquis of Lansdowne, Marquis of Clanricarde, the Earl of Radnor, Lord Campbell, Lord Monteagle, and several others who take a prominent part in the proceedings of the house. At two o'clock, the Commons having been previously summoned by the Black Rod to attend the bar of the upper house, the Lord Chancellor, seated in front of the throne with the other commissioners, proceeded to read

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you that her Majesty receives from all Princes and States assurances of a friendly disposition towards this country, and of an earnest desire to co-operate with her Majesty in the maintenance of general peace.

"By the treaty which her Majesty has concluded with the United States of America, and by the adjustment of those differences which, from their long continuance, had endangered the preservation of peace, her Majesty trusts that the amicable relations of the two countries have been confirmed.

"The increased exertions, which, by the liberality of Parliament, her Majesty was enabled to make for the termination of hostilities with China, have been eminently successful.

"The skill, valour, and discipline of the naval and military forces employed upon this service have been most conspicuous, and have led to the conclusion of peace upon the terms proposed by her Majesty.

"Her Majesty rejoices in the prospect that, by the free access which will be opened to the principal marts of that populous and extensive empire, encouragement will be given to the commercial enterprise of her people.

"As soon as the ratifications of the treaty shall have been exchanged, it will be laid before you.

"In concert with her allies, her Majesty has succeeded in obtaining from the Christian population of Syria the establishment of a system of administration which they were entitled to expect from the engagements of the Sultan, and from the good faith of this country

"The differences for some time existing between the Turkish and Persian Governments had recently led to acts of hostility; but, as each of these States has accepted the joint mediation of Great Britain and Russia, her Majesty entertains a confident hope that their mutual relations will be speedily and amicably adjusted.

"Her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of Russia a treaty of commerce and navigation, which will be laid before you. Her Majesty regards this treaty with great satisfaction, as the foundation for increased intercourse between her Majesty's subjects and those of the Emperor.

"Her Majesty is happy to inform you that complete success has attended the recent military operations in Affghanistan.

"Her Majesty has the greatest satisfaction in recording her high sense of the ability with which those operations have been directed, and of the constancy and valour which have been manifested by the European and native forces.

"The superiority of her Majesty's arms has been established by decisive victories on the scenes of former disaster; and the complete liberation of her Majesty's subjects who were held in captivity, and for whom her Majesty felt the deepest interest, has been effected.

"We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that it has not been deemed advisable to continue the occupation by a military force of the countries to the westward of the Indus.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"Her Majesty has directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you.

"Such reductions have been made in the amount of the naval and military force as have been deemed compatible, under present circumstances, with the efficient performance of the public service throughout the extended empire of her Majesty.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty regrets the diminished receipt from some of the ordinary sources of revenue.

"Her Majesty fears that it must be, in part, attributed to the reduced consumption of many articles, caused by that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed, and which her Majesty has so deeply lamented.

"In considering, however, the present state of the revenue, her Majesty is assured that you will bear in mind that it has been materially affected by the extensive reductions in the import duties, which received your sanction during the last session of Parliament, and that little progress has been hitherto made in the collection of those taxes which were imposed for the purpose of supplying the deficiency from that and other causes.

"Her Majesty feels confident that the future produce of the revenue will be sufficient to meet every exigency of the public service.

"Her Majesty commands us to acquaint you that her Majesty derived the utmost gratification from the loyalty and affectionate attachment to her Majesty which were manifested on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to Scotland.

"Her Majesty regrets that, in the course of last year, the public peace in some of the manufacturing districts was seriously disturbed, and the lives and property of her Majesty's subjects were endangered by tumultuous assemblages and acts of open violence.

"The ordinary law promptly enforced was sufficient for the effectual repression of these disorders. Her Majesty confidently relies upon its efficacy, and upon the zealous support of her loyal and peaceable subjects, for the maintenance of tranquillity.

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you, that measures connected with the improvement of the law, and with various questions of domestic policy, will be submitted for your consideration.

"Her Majesty confidently relies on your zealous endeavours to promote the public welfare, and fervently prays that the favour of Divine Providence may direct and prosper your counsels, and make them conducive to the happiness and contentment of her people."

After the speech had been read in both houses, their lordships adjourned until five o'clock, and the Commons until four.

Previous to the adjournment of the house, the Earl of Auckland, Viscount Hill, and Viscount Ponsonby, took the oaths and their seats.

Their lordships resumed at five o'clock, at which hour the Lord Chancellor took his seat upon the woolsack.

The Duke of Wellington laid upon the table a bill for the better regulation of select vestries.

The Spy System in Ireland.—Earl Fortescue gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, put a question to the noble duke as to whether any inquiries had been made into the conduct of the provost and magistrates of Sligo, in employing spies to make discoveries relative to Ribbonism.

The noble earl likewise gave notice that he should move that the returns from the Irish constabulary, which were ordered by the house to be printed on the 8th of last August, should be laid upon the table, and that like returns should be laid before the house for every month until the close of the session.

Lord Campbell gave notice that, on Monday, the 19th of February, he should move for the appointment of a select committee to take into consideration the laws relating to defamation and libel.

The Marquis of Clanricarde gave notice that he should on Monday next move for certain returns relating to the operation of the poor-laws in Ireland, and he would likewise move that their lordships be summoned for that day.

The Address.—The Lord Chancellor then read her Majesty's most gracious speech.

The speech having been again read by the clerk,

The Earl of Powis rose to move the adoption of the address. He said: My lords, in rising to address your lordships, to propose for your adoption an address in answer to the gracious speech with which her Majesty has been pleased to direct the Lords Commissioners to open the present Parliament, I take the earliest opportunity of congratulating your lordships upon the happy state in which the foreign relations of this country stand, and the prospect of peace, which is extending itself throughout all portions of the habitable globe connected with the British empire. My lords, I have the satisfaction of doing this, not in the form which is usual, but with sincerity and truth, knowing it to be the intentions of the Government of this country to carry out practically that principle of peace which is so essential to the benefit of the British empire. My lords, I ought not to deal with this question generally. I ought to consider it particularly, and I think I cannot do better for that purpose than by adopting the course laid down in her Majesty's speech. The importance of the first great question brought under the consideration of your lordships in that speech cannot be doubted, when we recollect that it has been the subject of discussion between the two countries of England and America for the last quarter of a century, and when the result of those discussions has been more to disagree than to arrive at an amicable settlement. Under such circumstances it appeared to her Majesty's Government hopeless to pursue the usual course of entering into a correspondence between the Secretaries of State for the two countries. It was found that the adoption of such a course would not bring the matter to a satisfactory result, and it was therefore determined by her Majesty's Government to send out a special mission to America, and for that purpose they selected a noble lord than whom, I will venture to say, never occurred greater unanimity than on his appointment. (Hear, hear.) The result of that mission has perfectly justified the expectations formed by her Majesty's Government, and the noble lord has the gratification of knowing that he has, on the most essential questions, given that hope and expectation of peace which ought to exist between two nations boasting a common origin, and having greater institutions than any other nations on earth. The next question to which I shall take the liberty of directing your lordships' attention is the conclusion of the war with China. (Hear, hear.) A very few short months only have elapsed since last we met in this place, and I believe that, at that time, there was not one of your lordships who entertained any expectation that, with regard to that great question, there was any prospect that it would be so speedily or so satisfactorily settled. Our troops and seamen had to encounter difficulties and dangers; they have had to penetrate into an unknown country; they have had to encounter the dangers of the climate, from which our troops have suffered more than from the sword. All these difficulties and dangers, however, they have overcome. They have shown themselves worthy of their established reputation, and have taught the Chinese Emperor that peace is better with the British empire than a continuation of the present state of things—a state of things in which their own obstinacy had unfortunately involved them. (Hear, hear.) It is with great satisfaction that I perceive the manner in which her Majesty has been pleased to characterise the exertions of the troops and seamen, both native and British, employed in this arduous service. (Hear, hear). The next subject to which I wish to direct your lordships' attention is the conclusion of the war in Affghanistan. That war has also been brought to a happy result. It would be unmanly if I attempted to deny the sad reverses which we previously experienced in that country. It would be unmanly if I did not admit that the difficulties under which we laboured in that country, in consequence of those reverses, were very great. It must be admitted that our reverses in that country had been disastrous in the extreme. Our duty was, in the first place, to redeem the honour of the British flag, and also restore to liberty the portion of her Majesty's subjects, both male and female, who had had the misfortune to be detained in captivity in Affghanistan. I will not now stop to raise the question, whether those ladies were justified in placing themselves in such a situation as to subject themselves to the chance of being involved in the manner in which they had been? It was sufficient to know that they were involved in such circumstances to make it our duty in the first place to vindicate the honour of the British flag, and in the second place to restore those captives to liberty. (Cheers.) Happily both those results have been accomplished. (Cheers.) The first step in the great work was accomplished by the noble and gallant defence of Jellalabad by Sir Robert Sale. (Cheers.) That was the first step in advance. I need not allude more particularly to the noble and gallant conduct of the troops under the command of General Pollock and of General Nott, in the various operations in which they have been engaged in Affghanistan, but I must be allowed to express the great satisfaction I feel at the manner in which her Majesty has been pleased to characterise the exertions of the forces in those countries. I am happy to say that not only have the British forces merited these encomiums, but that the native forces of the Hon. East India Company have proved themselves equally worthy with the British troops. Both the British and the native Indian troops are entitled to be highly lauded for their conduct during the campaign. I may be permitted to allude more particularly to this subject on account of the connection of my family with India. (Cheers.) Greater devotion could not be shown by any troops than that exhibited by the native troops during the late hostilities in India troops, than which any more worthy to serve in line with the British forces cannot be found. The same fidelity, the same devotion, the same gallantry, which, now near a century ago, was exhibited by the ancestors of these very troops—whether we look to the great contest which made us masters of Seringapatam and enabled us to turn the tyrant Tippoo from his throne, or whether we look to the first and greater actions in which the noble duke—(Hear, hear, hear)—led the British arms. My lords, had I occasion to stop here I should consider myself as having more than the ordinary fortune of the person who has the honour of moving the address to the Queen's speech in your lordships' house. But her Majesty has not been satisfied to give her exortions to the countries within her own or immediate dominion, or occupied by her own subjects, but she has had the precaution to secure to the Christian population of Syria, that happiness which has been the object of all persons professing Christianity. (Hear, hear.) Her Majesty has also been engaged, in common with the Russian Government, in endeavouring to bring about a reconciliation of the differences that have hitherto existed between Turkey and Persia, and there is reason to congratulate ourselves on the probability of her Majesty's services being effectual. My lords, we can refer with satisfaction to the feelings which her Majesty expresses upon calling Parliament together with respect to the prosperity of our relations with foreign powers. Her Majesty has been enabled to complete an important commercial treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by which her Majesty has laid the foundation of, I trust, a material increase in the commerce of her Majesty's subjects with that great and extended empire. The results of this measure can hardly be calculated. I may also advert with satisfaction to the tranquillity which exists with the United States, as well as to the establishment of commerce with five of the principal ports of China, and also to the treaty with Russia, to which I have just alluded. No expectations could be more gratifying or agreeable in this respect. I wish it were in my power to turn with equal satisfaction to the state in which we find ourselves at home. We cannot conceal from ourselves the conviction that great masses of the population of this country, in the course of the last year, have been unable to avail themselves to the same extent as formerly of those enjoyments which they usually possess. For although the alterations submitted to Parliament last year, and adopted by your lordships and the other House of Parliament, may account, to a considerable extent, for the depression in the revenue, I am afraid it cannot be concealed from ourselves that those alterations have not alone caused so material a diminution. But it is not in my province, nor is the present the proper occasion on which, to refer to this topic. (Hear, hear.) Another subject which I feel called on to mention to your lordships is the outbreak which occurred in some of the mining districts of England in the early part of last autumn. It will be a matter of satisfaction to your lordships to know that the ordinary powers of the law were sufficient to check that manifestation. To those who are acquainted with the details of those events, and to those who were unfortunate enough to be called on to take a part in them, it must be a cause of gratification that the good sense of the working population had taught them that the results they were aiming at could only be prejudicial to them, and that it was their interest as well as their duty peaceably to abide under the protection of the law. Those measures which will be introduced for the beneficial improvement in the laws of the country, I am sure, will receive the best attention from your lordships; and I beg to take the liberty of recommending them to your lordships' earnest consideration. There is only one topic more to which I feel it necessary to allude: that is the visit of her Majesty to Scotland. Of this your lordships will allow me to speak with pride and satisfaction; and although I cannot say that we can boast of possessing those classic grounds which caused the Roman poet to exclaim in a burst of enthusiasm, "Hic Tiber est, hic Canpus Martius," yet we have that which may induce her Majesty to repeat her visit, and, if we are again honoured with her presence, I trust we shall prove to her Majesty, whenever she again ventures among us, that she has the affections and the loyalty of her people. The noble lord concluded by reading and moving the address, which was a mere repetition of the topics alluded to in the Queen's speech.

The Earl of Ellenton said: In rising to second the motion for an humble address in answer to her Majesty's speech, I must beg from your lordships every indulgence, as this is the first time I have had the honour of addressing you, and I trust your lordships will pay more attention to the subjects of my address than to the manner in which they are brought before your notice. The difficulty of the duty that has been imposed upon me is considerably lightened by the able manner in which the noble earl has adverted to the subjects contained in her Majesty's speech. (Hear, hear.) No doubt your lordships have heard with the deepest interest the opinions of the noble earl upon the late successes in India, he having, as he has already told you, an hereditary interest in that country. It must be most gratifying to your lordships to know that this country is in a condition of the most profound external and internal tranquillity. As to the unfortunate disturbances of some manufacturing towns, they had given way before the force of the ordinary authorities; and as the agitation has, in a great measure, subsided before the power, I may say the novelty, of a strong Government, so the clouds that have obscured our glories in the East have cleared away to even more than the usual brightness. I sincerely trust that the worst is over, and that by the revival of trade and commerce their sufferings will be alleviated; and I also hope that some measures will be proposed by which relief may be afforded to our over-crowded population. There is one subject on which I cannot congratulate your lordships, which is the state of the revenue, though I confess I cannot take such a gloomy view of it as the noble earl who preceded me. The changes which last year received the sanction of the legislature have not yet had time to work out their effect; while the universal tranquillity which has been established has not had time to exercise its influence over us. There is one subject alluded to in her Majesty's speech which I cannot pass over in silence—that is, the visit of her Majesty to Scotland. I trust your lordships will forgive me for expressing the feeling which I know animates all my countrymen, the deep gratitude and enthusiastic loyalty which that visit has occasioned. Coming among us without pomp, and trusting entirely to the fidelity and loyalty of the people, she learned that that trust was not misplaced, for her reception proved that she rules, not alone over the persons, but the hearts of her Scottish subjects. The gracious allusion which her Majesty has made to that visit leads me to hope that once again, at no distant period, they may be cheered by her presence; and I venture to say, on behalf of my countrymen, that they will be able to say, with the Russian soldier, who had received the approbation of his Emperor, "If I have done well this time, I will endeavour to do better next." If the domestic circumstances of the country are such as, on the whole, to create satisfaction, how much more must the hearts of Englishmen throb with pleasure at the prospect of things abroad. How much more grateful must they not feel to the Ministry which had secured to them universal peace—not a peace purchased by wanton aggressions on others, or concessions from ourselves—not a peace forced upon us by defeat and its consequent weakness, but a peace won by the bravery of our soldiers at the point of the bayonet—a peace by which the safety of the country is promoted; and if England, by it, has shown that she knows how to repair her slightly-tarnished honours, she shows also that she knows how to act with moderation; and, however unlike other nations who had obtained similar advantages, England, in the very moment of victory, has shown her aversion to further conquest, and that she is only anxious to preserve her own stability and reputation. The brilliant successes of our army in Affghanistan—marching, as they did, over the bones of their murdered countrymen—reflected immortal credit upon the men who achieved them, and upon those under whose directions they were performed. (Hear, hear.) Our successes in China, and the satisfactory termination of the war in that part of the world, is a subject upon which I may congratulate your lordships. Having been forced into a war with that nation which had never before been taught to treat foreign nations with respect, we carried our arms to the very walls of Nankin, and concluded a peace which is as honourable to us as it will be advantageous to the Chinese, and to the interests of the civilized world. It is also a matter upon which I may congratulate your lordships that her Majesty's Government has been able, with the co-operation of her allies, to procure for Syria the advantages of a just and settled Government. (Hear, hear.) It is also most satisfactory to hear that the differences between Turkey and Persia have been referred to the joint adjustment and mediation of this country and Russia, not only as holding out a hope of a speedy adjustment of these differences, but as evincing the excellent understanding that subsists between England and that great empire. My lords, I shall now advert to a most important success, which I am happy to say has been achieved, not at the price of blood, but by the good sense and judgment of a noble lord, a member of this house: I mean the adjustment of our difficulties with America. (Cheers.) When it is recollected that we sprung from the same origin, speak the same language, and view the same fundamental and firm rock of character and purpose, there is no other nation with which we should be upon the same terms of amity and friendly alliance. (Cheers.) In connexion with most of your lordships, I look upon America as a part of ourselves, as a nation which cannot but progress in our glorious and successful career in the same ways as we should take a pride in their greatness. I trust, my lords, that at this solemn but beginning of a new century and intimacy between the two countries than has hitherto subsisted. I do not think, my lords, that the occasion of the presentation of an address in answer to her Majesty's gracious speech is the fit arena for the introduction of party politics, and I have, therefore, abstained from anything likely to provoke political contention. I am well aware that there is not one of your lordships who does not feel the same ardour in the welfare of the country, and who does not feel duly humbled in full humble allegiance as myself. There is not one of your lordships who is not equally rejoiced with myself to see the dominion of England more firmly established, and peace reigning over the world, and who does not equally desire the revival of trade and the establishment of our naval prosperity. These are not party triumphs, and these are the subjects referred to in the address to which I now ask the unanimous assent of your lordships, and shall not detain you further than to express my concurrence in its details and to second its adoption. (Cheers.)

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, although he was ready to acquiesce in the speech which her Majesty had been advised to deliver, as being framed for the purpose of preventing any difference of opinion with regard to the address in answer, and although he thought it had been judiciously framed, and although he was bound to add in at the noble mover and seconder of the address had adhered to the spirit of the speech in their speech, and had carefully followed it out, and although he had seen no way to be prepared with which they had resolved from the immediate topic of any controversial matter that could create a difference of opinion, yet there were topics unconnected introduced into the speech of that negative character that it was impossible, upon an occasion like the present the opening of Parliament, the first night of a session to pass them without observation or remark. In the first place, he was glad to perceive that in the speech from the throne no allusion had been made to the position of the countries. He approved of the silence and discretion observed in that respect. If they had been called upon to express anything like opinion, what the Government had involved power, as to the working of that necessity, it would have been a painful duty, with whatever success he might, to have endeavoured to persuade their lordships that the operation of the Corn-law, so far as it had gone, was such as that it would have been impossible for them to go out their opposition. (Hear, hear.) Trying that law by the test by which, if they were to have any corn-law at all, they must try it, namely, the test of its interfering with the ordinary movements of trade—applying that test to the corn-law of last year, he believed it could not be denied that there never was a period when the averages made had been so equable, that there never was a period when such a law could operate so little to the consumer, and most fairly to the interests of the growers and to the trade. (Loud cheers from both sides of the house.) He was glad, therefore, that her Majesty's ministers and the noble mover and seconder had used that discretion with regard to the corn-law. At all events, its omission from the address, and his (the Marquis of Lansdowne's) assenting thereto, left him open at any future time to move an amendment upon that measure. He would now come to the topics which had been introduced into the speech, and the most, or, at least, one of the most important was the conclusion of a treaty with the United States of America in relation to the boundary, which had no longer formed a subject of discussion. He entirely agreed in the sentiments expressed as to the effect that treaty by the noble earl opposite. He trusted it would be the harbinger of the good understanding which ought to prevail between the two countries, and he did not think it would have been wise or becoming in England to have insisted with too great strictness upon their interpretation of the treaty which had given rise to these discussions, and the result of which might have been productive of serious consequences, and which would have been most detrimental to the best interests of both countries. Wishing to speak frankly and openly on the subject, he could not but express the regret which he entertained that the large concessions which had been made had not been made the means of settling the dispute, so that no change or concession had been made to the United States so that with respect to the navigation of the St. John he did not mean to say that it was well to make that concession, nor did he say that the navigation of that river was a subject on which ought not to have been admitted in our negotiations with that country—but, seeing that such concessions had been made, he thought other important matters in difference between this country and the United States ought to have been included, instead of allowing that important matter, not as cause of war, because he trusted that nothing of the kind would ever happen as war between this country and the United States—but as cause for unfriendly feeling which might be personally productive of the state of ill-feeling which had occasioned the difference between the two countries from those points not being clearly understood. Expressing as he did his undoubted satisfaction at the conclusion of that treaty, and that his noble friend had been able to make any treaty by which one door of misunderstanding had been closed, and one cause of contention had been removed, he regretted that he could not say the same thing of the other question put an end to, than another door was opened and another matter question produced. He also regretted that the opportunity was not taken of endeavouring to settle, permanently, something with respect to the right of search, that question which lay at the bottom of the most odious and detestable traffic that ever disgraced humanity, or was ever permitted to be carried on, if not with the sanction, at least with the knowledge of the nations of Europe. Her Majesty's Ministers must admit that the important question of the right of search had at the close of one year greatly receded from its position. (Hear, hear.) He could not but regret the distinct declaration on the part of America that they would not consent to the right of search, and he lamented that no conclusion had been come to on that subject. (Hear, hear.) From the treaty with America he came to those transactions in the East which had been alluded to by the noble lords opposite, and which formed so important a part of the enemies of her Majesty's speech. He hailed with great satisfaction and sympathy the terms in which those noble lords had expressed themselves in regard to the bravery and valour displayed by our troops in the East, and displayed on the side on which great military reverses had been recently experienced. He was glad to hear the strong terms in which the noble lords expressed themselves on that subject—he meant the necessity and urgency of employing the strongest military means to assert the power, dignity, and honour of this country upon those fields on which, from the circumstances which had occurred, it had been undoubtedly most unfortunately humbled. As case he hoped he might construe the opinion of the noble lord on that subject to be authorised by her Majesty's Ministers as satisfactory, most decisively, of that to which circumstances did for a time give an opposite colour namely, that there was, that there is, even the local government of India, an indisposition to resist that country for the purpose of maintaining the authority of her Majesty, and recovering the honour and glory of our arms. That circumstances did exist to give apparent countenance to that opinion he was perfectly aware. (Hear, hear.) He hoped, however (the Duke of Wellington) He, therefore, hoped it at that delay was not accompanied with any hesitations as to our intention of recovering the honour of the country in that quarter, by the employment of those means which his noble friend, the late Governor-General of India, left at the disposal of his successor for that purpose, and which were the very means which afterwards were so successfully employed. (Hear.) He hoped, however appearance there might have been of hesitation, that no such real hesitation was ever felt, but that both the recovery of the sanctuary, prisoners, and the reoccupation, gloriously, of that country, were objects which the Government held at heart, and were determined to accomplish, by exerting every means and every power at their disposal. That, hearing from this subject he washed he might refer to another, which from circumstances connected with it, to which allusion had been made, was more or less painful, though connected with the display of the habit of the achievements of the officers and troops, and he then add, not only those of the European troops, but also of those troops whose fidelity had been tested by adverse circumstances, and who even passed the native army of India, upon the maintenance of whose high character for honour, for bravery, and for fidelity, she hold they had upon India, that position essentially rested. But he would, however, pass from that which was of a more mixed character, to all upon which it was most satisfactory to think there could be with regard to every step connected with the proceedings upon the part of all men, or nearly of most men, but one feeling of sympathy he meant the circumstances which had led to such brilliant results, in the termination of the war in the coast of China in exchange particular parts of the subject, he could not but advert to one which had been introduced, and perhaps inadvertently expressed, in the speech from the throne, and it was something which was hardly distinctly affirmed. It was stated in the speech that "the increased exertions which, by the liberality of Parliament, her Majesty's Ministers had been enabled to make for the termination of hostilities with China, had been eminently successful." Now, he did not know to what acts of liberality this particular expression attached this termination of hostilities with China. Was it the income-tax, which had been introduced by her Majesty's Government, by which they were enabled to make these continued and increased exertions in China? There must have been, on the part of those who had framed the speech, an intense desire to say something favourable of the income-tax that this observation was introduced. (Laughter.) Now, I am opposite seemed to think (and he himself had had as much to do with concocting speeches as most men) that, when all the other paragraphs were made, they must get in somehow in favour of the income-tax, and the more they said, "Let us connect it with the conquest of China." Now, he heard of no talks made to bills sent up from one house to the other, but he had never had any such attack as this to a speech. But the moment it was not connected with these compacts in any respect, for, before the speech from the throne was prepared, the requisite measures for the attainment of the object had been previously taken. He must affirm, and he did so without fear of contradiction, that those means had been proposed, and had been, and were completed in the Chinese, and that they were supported by the then Government at home, and by the late Governor-General of India immediately on the advice of the measures with China. He thought it an matter of regret that that Government that, so long as there was a hope of accommodation with the Chinese by pacific means and negotiations, those means had been employed, but from the very moment the means of negotiation failed, and the transactions with the Chinese were of such a nature as to require it, the then Government took care that that particular description of force should be employed for a more extended scale of operations which had been pointed out by his noble friend, the late Governor-General of India That plan was immediately complied with by the present Government, and exactly the same number of regiments as had been named were employed, namely, four regiments of Sepoys. This was before the income-tax. The addition of one of those regiments was made. This was done independent of the liberality of Parliament which had been introduced into the speech. These were matters to which he hoped the attention of Parliament and of the Ministers also would be specially directed, in connexion with our relations with China, as affording the great commercial benefits which must result to this country. (Hear, hear.) Having said so much, he would abstain from going into the consideration of those topics which her Majesty had been advised to omit, and particularly that of the distressed state of the country. The noble marquis then eulogised the patience with which the labouring classes in most parts of the country had borne their privations, and remarked that, where disturbances had occurred, the loss of life and property was considerably less than on any similar occasion in the history of the country. He thought this circumstance ought to add to the desire they must all feel, by any sacrifice, to palliate the distresses of the people, with an full long out to the anticipations which they would be unable to fulfil. (Hear.) With these observations he would conclude, without offering any sort of opposition to the address.

The Duke of Wellington said he was in hopes the tenour of the speech which had been delivered by her Majesty's command, and of the able speeches of his two noble friends, the mover and seconder of the address, would have induced the noble marquis (the Marquis of Lansdowne), if he thought proper to make any observations at all, to abstain from that description of observation which would render it necessary for him to enter into any discussion on that occasion, or take any notice of what he had addressed to their lordships. But the noble marquis had not only attacked the speech for what it did not contain, but also on the score of severity. They had been told that her Majesty had been advised to advert to the liberality of Parliament as having enabled her forces to bring the war in China to an early and successful termination, and then that no mention was made of the income-tax, and that they could not, at least, say that the income-tax was the instance of the liberality of Parliament. He begged their lordships to remember that the common course of parliamentary proceeding (the ordinary course, he ought to say, for it was not the common course under the administration of the noble lord) was, for her Majesty's Government, when engaged in war, to come down with an estimate of the force necessary for carrying it on, of the expenses incurred, and to propose means for finding money to pay those expenses. (Hear.) True, that course was totally abandoned by noble lords opposite, when in office. (Laughter.) They carried on war all over the world with a peace establishment, and concluded, of course, that those who succeeded them would do the same. Now, that was exactly what they (the present Government) did not do. (Cheers and laughter.) The noble marquis said he was one of those who thought we ought not to have submitted to the conduct of the officers of the Emperor of China, or to become his co-tem-house officers. He begged the noble marquis to remember that he (the Duke of Wellington) was almost the single individual in that house who stated, on the motion of a noble lord near him, the real ground of complaint against the Chinese Government was its conduct towards a person employed in the service and upon setting the person of her Majesty. (Hear.) He said them and now that the war was in part and necessary war on the part of her Majesty's Government, and he said further, that, if it had been solely a war for the robbery of the opium, he thought the interests of the country and its honour was involved in that war, and that her Majesty's Government should have made every effort for carrying it on, and have come down to Parliament for assistance to bring it to a successful termination. (Hear.) He was afterwards a party to advising her Majesty on the measures necessary for these purposes, and what was it they did? They recommended her Majesty to recommend to Parliament to grant additional forces and money for carrying on the war, and not a week elapsed after they came into office before an order was sent to India to send reinforcements, and reinforcements were also sent from England, both troops and ships, who, he arrived in time for, and were engaged in, those operations which brought that war to a close. (Hear.) So far with respect to the veracity of the speech. (Hear.) But it was said that it was the same plan and the same operations as those carried on by the former Government. He begged the noble marquis's pardon. He (the Marquis of Lansdowne) seemed to forget altogether the evacuation of the island of Chusan, and the withdrawal of our ships from the northern parts of the Chinese seas, and it was thought desirable for him to remind the house that the speech delivered by her Majesty's command was wanting in veracity. (Hear, hear, hear.) Having said this much with respect to China, he would advert to another subject on which he hoped the noble marquis would have recalled topics of attention: he meant the transactions in India; but when the noble marquis attacked the Governor-General of India, on account of the orders he had issued, he must say, knowing something of India, and something of military affairs, that he stood there prepared to justify every order or movement, whether one way or the other, which had taken place under the authority of the Governor-General, from the moment he took upon himself to administer the affairs of India to the present moment. (Cheers.) The Governor-General, as soon as he took upon himself the government of India, did as much as he was enabled to do according to the state of preparation in which he found matters there at the moment. He could not but have done more. (Hear.) Every order that he gave, whether to halt or to march, was an order absolutely necessary for the safety of the troops at the time. No man that orders war, not occasioned by any act of his, but by the government which he found there upon his arrival in India. He (the Duke of Wellington) felt obliged to say thus much in defence of an absent servant of the Crown, who, he firmly believed, had done his duty by the British public. (Hear, hear.) He regretted that this topic had been touched upon by the noble marquis upon the present occasion; because, if there was anything to be found fault with in any of the transactions, it was not in what had been attributed to the conduct of the present Governor-General. Again, he was sorry that such allusion had been made by the noble marquis with respect to the negotiations which had recently been concluded with the United States. He really thought it would be much better, if he noble friend had wished to make his observations until the papers in reference to these negotiations should have been laid on the table of the house, and that their lordships should have had an opportunity of considering them, and of seeing upon what grounds all the points of the matter rested, and with what view the treaty had been concluded by his noble friend. The noble marquis seemed altogether to forget the measures of the Government, to which he himself was a party, with respect to this very question he seemed altogether to forget these, and the adoption in that Government of the award of the King of the Netherlands. A dispute arose in reference to a territory, to put an end to which it became necessary that a boundary line should be drawn. The Government of the United States insisted upon one line of boundary, and the Government of this country insisted upon another. The question was referred to an arbitrator, and he gave an award which was adopted by this country, but to which the United States would not accede. In this state of things, then, it was determined that his noble friend Lord Ashburton should proceed to the United States, with the view of effecting a new arrangement—that arrangement had been completed, and it was one which, he believed, was satisfactory in every point of view to this country, and more particularly so because it put an end to a dispute which had been of long existence between the Governments of the two countries. As he had before observed, the papers in reference to the new arrangement were not yet in the hands of their lordships, and he thought it was not fair that they should discuss the subject on the present occasion. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

Lord Brougham said he was quite aware that he rose to address the house under considerable disadvantage, in following, as he did, the noble marquis, near him, and his noble friend opposite, who spoke upon subjects of all kinds which came before the house, in a manner which commanded the greatest interest and attention, and which gave to his opinions the greatest possible weight of authority; but upon this particular occasion he had to deal with a subject of which he, of all men living, might be said to know the most; and, as the highest having authority upon it, he must needs have done—as in point of fact he had done—exerted the attention of their lordships. Nevertheless, because he had left out one or two material considerations which impressed upon the public attention, and because he thought that these considerations involved interests of the high order to the dignity and peace of this country, he deemed it to be his bounden duty to trespass for a short time upon their lordships' attention while he referred to them. (Hear.) The first fifth so was the newly-ratified treaty with America, and he heartily concurred with the noble marquis and the noble duke in every sentiments which he (Lord Brougham) had in common with all parties both in and out of Parliament—(Hear—sentiments of the greatest exultation that the differences between the United States and this country had been at length put an end to. (Hear, hear, hear.) But as to the terms of the settlement, and the line of boundary which had been so much talked of to-night, and so much more or less wisely talked of out of doors, for his own part, he must say he cared not how that line was drawn—it was a matter which was entirely indifferent to him what direction it took, let it go a few miles to the right or to the left, even let it affect the navigation of the St. John's River—they might take all, and he would give it willingly up for the establishment and maintenance of a good understanding between America and England. (Cheers.) But he was not left to this question alone in defending the treaty of his noble friend opposite. There was another and a great question which had also been a subject of controversy between the two countries for a long period: he meant that of the slave trade, and he must say that he felt not a little proud of acknowledging himself an old ally of his noble friend in establishing a good understanding between England and America on that subject. But, taking into consideration the admirable skill, the temperate firmness, and the conciliating powers of his noble friend, together with incidental circumstances connecting him with the United States, he, of all her Majesty's subjects, was the man who was best calculated to bring the negotiations in question to their present satisfactory termination -(Hear, hear, and cheers)—to a termination which not only gave to us peace, but established a cordial understanding between their Government and ours, and brought back those feelings of goodwill which for a long time had unhappily been estranged. (Hear, hear.) He now begged to call the attention of their lordships from the affairs of the West to those of the East, and to express, in common with the noble marquis and the noble duke, his gratification at the happy, some might perhaps call it the glorious, termination of the war there. He, however, was disposed to call it a happy termination, because they had been delivered from that war. No one could listen to the justification of the conduct of the Governor-General by the noble duke without feeling the importance of that opinion. It was, he thought, decisive of the question, if that question had ever been of doubtful issue. The highest living authority on military subjects had pronounced a decisive acquittal of the Governor-General, and the opinion could not fail to have a great influence all over the world. (Hear, hear.) But there were some transactions at the end of the Affghan war to which he could not but look with considerable pain—transactions which to his mind required some explanation. They might possibly be capable of explanation or extenuation -they might possibly, for aught he knew, be justifiable, and to hear that they were so would save him not a little anguish; but in reference to these late transactions the English character had been brought to the bar of public opinion all over Europe, and he blushed for the result. Great and mighty bazaars of industry—indications of peaceful prosperity—had been levelled with the ground, and their fragments scattered in the dust—great cities had been set fire to—in one instance, four in one night; and the troops had been let loose on the unoffending people, thousands of whom were hunted down like vermin. Perhaps all this might be explained and palliated, but at present he confessed that he regarded with pain, horror, and shame, those passages at the end of the war in Afghanistan. It was with great pleasure he saw that paragraph in her Majesty's speech which gave an assurance of a continued peace with foreign powers, more especially with regard to our friendly relations with that power on which hung the peace of Europe. (Hear.) He thought their lordships would forgive him for entering somewhat more into detail than he should have done but from the course the debate had taken. He thought, however, that this debate would have a salutary effect elsewhere. There existed in France a great ignorance at the present moment—he did not say among the French people in general, but among certain parts of the community, and among men of some mark in the country, which he could scarcely have believed had he not had the evidence of his own eyes and ears. That ignorance was not confined to those connected with the West Indian interest, or their hired agents in the Chamber and in the press. It existed among a class less interested in closing their eyes at the present time. He had heard these men say that we in England, by a pretended regard for the abolition of the slave trade, wanted only to claim the sovereignty of the seas; and this feeling was at the bottom of all their attempts to prevent the treaty of 1841 from being ratified, and created a disposition to abrogate the treaties of 1831 and 1833. They said that, because the Americans will not admit the right of search, the French also ought not to admit of it; that the Americans were too high-spirited, and had too much at heart the honour of the national flag, to suffer it to be disgraced by that which was called the right of search being brought into operation upon their ships; and why, they asked, should not the French, in like manner, assert the dignity of the French flag? The noble lord here adverted to his exertions, both in Parliament and out of it, from the year 1809, against the slave trade, and in defence of this very right of search, which the Americans, in 1834, offered to this country to establish mutually between them, and that a right much more stringent than that against which so many objections were now urged. It was because this country had refused to adopt some trifling alteration in the treaty then offered, that there had not existed, for the last 19 years, a solemn contract of the right of search more effectual, more stringent, than that which now formed the subject of discussion. He hoped that the French, after this, would not say that they were justified in refusing the right of search, because it was refused by the American people. Was it possible, he would ask, that any portion of the French nation should be so ignorant of their duty—so callous to every feeling of humanity—so utterly devoid of every sentiment of justice—so utterly irrational—nay, so devoid of common sense, as, at this time of day, towards the middle of the nineteenth century, to hold up their hands in defence of the African slave trade? No! there was no such feeling in France. Perhaps there might be a few individuals about such ports as Nantes who would defend the slave trade; but, throughout the length and breadth of France, the whole mass of the population were determinedly opposed to everything like the slave trade. The noble lord then adverted, at considerable length, to the aspersions cast upon the conduct of M. Lesseps, the French consul at Barcelona, during the late revolt in that city, to shew that ignorance on topics of great interest was not confined to France; and that in England, too, misrepresentations were circulated by interested individuals upon such matters. The noble lord went on to say that whatever names might be given to the discontent now felt and expressed in France, with respect to England, whether those names were "right of search," "Portendic," &c., that which was at the bottom of all was the treaty concluded on the 6th of July, 1840, by Lord Palmerston. (Hear, hear.) He had no hesitation in saying (so much he would admit to French partisans), that the dearest and most important interests of this country were intimately connected with the maintenance of peace between this country and France. He regarded the peace of Europe as summed up in one word—peace with France. When he admired the gallantry of the troops of one country, the wisdom of her councils, and the successes of her military and naval forces, he regarded that famous nation (France) with no less admiration, and he held it, as much as England, to be the land of a gallant soldiery, of profound statesmen, of illustrious philosophers, whose history, military as well as civil, in all times, modern as well as of old, had reached a character of the most brilliant lustre. I hold (continued the noble and learned lord) the olive branch in my hand between the two countries, admiring and loving both almost equally; and I will not allow the hope of peace to be torn from me while a leaf, or tendril, or fibre of its composition remains together. My belief is, that it only requires a little temper—a little conciliation—fair dealing, and open and manly conduct on the part of the eminent leaders of parties in both countries to reclaim the people from the unhappy bias already given, from which they are every day recovering, and from which they will be fully and entirely reclaimed by a continuance of peace. (Hear, hear.) I make no apology for stating to your lordships my opinions upon this subject, knowing, as I do, its paramount importance, and that I speak the sense of Parliament and of the country; and having the satisfaction of knowing also that words spoken may not be without their use. The noble and learned lord then sat down amidst loud cheers.

The Earl of Auckland said he felt that that was not the fitting opportunity of entering upon the question of the affairs of India, as it was a matter which he could wish to enter upon fully, inasmuch as it was personal to himself. He should prefer to have the subject discussed on a separate day, and he would, therefore, say as few sentences as possible on that occasion, and even those he would venture on only because his silence might be taken to be acquiescence in what had fallen in the course of that debate. (Hear, hear.) He felt the disadvantage of addressing their lordships after two such speeches as those of the noble and learned lord who had just sat down, and of the noble and gallant duke. (Hear, and cheers.) He felt sure, however, that the noble duke himself would not so far rest upon his own authority as to say his word alone was sufficient for condemnation. With respect to the Affghan war, it had been entered upon as essential to the safety of our Indian possessions. He believed he saw a danger approaching the confines of India, which, if not averted, would have left that empire without power or stability. Under such circumstances, he felt great anxiety and hesitation as to the proper course to be pursued; but, in the end, he felt, in just anticipation of what he believed to be the wishes and views of those to whom he was bound to defer, both in the India House and the Government at home, that he should hesitate no longer, and he accordingly determined upon war. The result was to repel the danger which was now no longer formidable, only because it was not decisively at the time. (Loud cheers from the Opposition benches.) He shared in the sentiments expressed by the noble and learned lord respecting the excesses which were committed by the retiring troops, but he could not share in the mitigated view which he took of the cruelty and treachery of the Affghans. He was glad at the result of the recent expedition to punish those cruelties, and he was glad that the return of the captives had been effected; but he must say, with regard to what had fallen from the noble duke, that he would be glad if all the orders of the Governor-General of India might be found deserving of the high character which he had given them. He did not wish to attack the present Governor-General, nor to detract from his merits. (Hear, hear.) Nothing, in his opinion, could be more unseemly than a recent Governor of India and his successor bandying against each other terms of depreciation and disparagement. (Loud cheers.) He should not, therefore, follow the example set him by the other side of the house. The noble duke, however, had charged him with an omission of which he was himself wholly unconscious. Indeed, if he had even laboured more arduously at one time than at another, it was when leaving India in order that all possible means might be left at the disposal of his successor, and that every man might be made available who could be spared from any part of the territory. The great difficulty was, that of providing carriage cattle. The divisions which had marched in January and in February were provided with cattle for a distance of 400 miles, but the great difficulty arose in Peshawur, owing to the desertion of the camel-drivers, and it was only after General Pollock had restored the spirit of the army and had conciliated our allies, and this gave something like security, that the difficulty was at length overcome. The omission, therefore, was not attributable to him; and if the Governor-General, on his arrival, found himself destitute of means, it was to be altogether attributed to the force of circumstances. He would say no more on the subject of Affghanistan, but would turn to China. The noble earl now entered into a narrative of the expeditions to China in order to shew that he had given directions to have done that which had subsequently been carried out by the present Governor-General, and contended that although the present Government had used the greatest vigour in carrying out the plans already in operation, yet that they would have been with equal energy if no change of government had taken place.

Lord Colchester defended the conduct of the Governor-General of India, and, with respect to the acts of the retiring army, he said he had reason to believe that the instructions were confined to the destruction of buildings used as fortifications and such other purposes, and that directions were given to do nothing to impeach the humanity of the army. With respect to the proclamations of his noble relative, he should on a future day be prepared to defend him. When he arrived in India he found a beaten army—one division wholly destroyed—a deficient revenue, and all public works suspended. Not only were military operations successfully carried to a close, but the public works were resumed, and the revenue was rapidly improving. He contended that the troops ought to have been sent out to China in the month of May, 1841, and by not being so sent there had been a useless waste of blood and treasure. He had drawn their attention to these points because he thought noble lords seemed to wish to take to themselves a credit they were not entitled to.

The Marquis of Clanricarde hoped that the papers would be laid before the house with as little delay as possible, as the wars in India and China, to which they referred, might both be considered concluded. With respect to the right of search, it could not be kept out of view that our concession to America had had a great effect on France. He feared that a question of great importance to humanity had rather retrograded in consequence of that treaty. Other opportunities would be shortly offered for the discussion of the distress of the country and its proper remedy.

The Duke of Wellington said the papers referring to the Chinese and Affghan wars should be laid on the table forthwith.

The Earl of Minto gave some explanations as to the delay in the sending the vessels intended to join the Chinese expedition.

After a few words from Lord Colchester,

Lord Ashburton said he should not have troubled the house with any observations on the treaty he had concluded, had it not been for the frequent allusions that had been made to it during the debate. In a debate of this description, where various questions came before them, each of sufficient importance to justify a night's debate, if this question were also mixed up with it it would be very imperfectly discussed. But when it came properly before the house, he had no doubt of being able to justify himself for the course he had adopted. With respect to the right of search, it had not occupied any place in the negotiations. It was the right of visit only that was discussed. Lord Palmerston had declared himself ready to accede to terms much less advantageous; and though this was no justification of the terms, if they were bad ones, still it took away the ground of complaint from noble lords on the opposite side. He concluded by declaring that the good understanding between this country and America continued uninterrupted, and that at no period of their mutual history had a better understanding prevailed between them.

After a few words from Lords Broughan, Haddington, and Minto, in explanation of former statements,

Earl Stanhope rose and said, from the length which the debate had extended, and from the probability that he should have many opportunities of bringing the subject before the house, he begged to withdraw the amendment which he had intended to move. He, however, gave notice, that, on Thursday next, he should move the following resolution—"That this house do resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, for the purpose of taking into its most serious consideration the present condition of the productive classes of the United Kingdom, with a view to provide the means of their profitable employment."

The Bishop of Exeter briefly addressed the house on the necessity of taking the opportunity of the present peace with China to provide such means of religious instruction in that country as should prove us to be a nation of Christians.

The address, as moved, was then adopted, and the house adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The house met, according to the adjournment, at a quarter before four, at which hour the Speaker took the chair.

The following new members were sworn at the table, and took their seats, having been elected during the recess:—Lord Clive; Mr. J. Emerson Tennent, for Belfast; Mr. David Ross, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Wortley.

The Speaker said he had to acquaint the house that the two sureties, of £500 each, entered into for the prosecution of the petition complaining of an undue return for the town of Nottingham, were unobjectionable.

New writs were ordered to be issued for the following places:—Cardigan, Carmarthen, Bute; for the University of Dublin, in place of Sergeant Jackson, nominated to be one of her Majesty's Puisne Judges in Ireland; for Colcraine, in place of E. Litton, Esq., who has accepted the office of a Master in Chancery in Ireland; for Rodmin, in the place of the Hon. Major Vivian, called to the upper house by the title of Lord Vivian; for the county of Monaghan, in the place of the Hon. H. R. Westenra, now Lord Rossmore, by the death of his father; for the county of Cavan, in the place of Colonel Clements, deceased.

Colonel Rushbrooke moved that a new writ do issue for the borough of Sudbury.

Mr. T. Duncombe said there was a general understanding that no new writs should be issued for boroughs, in the same position as Sudbury, without notice having been given of the intention to move them. He hoped therefore the hon. gentleman would not now persist in his motion for the new writ.

Colonel Rushbrooke consented to follow the course suggested by the hon. member for Finsbury, and gave notice that he would move for the new writ on this day week.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.

Sir T. Fremantle gave notice, on behalf of the Judge Advocate, that he would, on Thursday, the 9th of February, move for leave to bring in a bill relative to the administration of ecclesiastical justice in England and Wales.

Sir T. Fremantle gave notice, on behalf of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he would, on the 13th of February, move for leave to bring in a bill relative to frauds in Exchequer bills.

Sir T. Fremantle gave notice, on behalf of the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies, that he would, on the 14th of February, move a vote of thanks to the officers and men engaged in the Chinese war.

Sir Thomas Fremantle gave notice, on behalf of the right honourable baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, that he would, on the 16th of February, move a vote of thanks to the Governor-General of India, and to the officers and men employed in the military operations to the west of the Indus.

Mr. Wallace gave notice that he would, on the 7th of February, move for a select committee to inquire into the state of the late distress in Paisley; also for a return of the money collected under the Queen's letter, and the mode in which it was disposed.

Mr. Wallace gave notice that he would, on the 14th of February, call the attention of the house to the general distress of the country.

Mr. French gave notice that he would, on the 7th of February, move for leave to bring in a bill for the extension of medical charities in Ireland.

Mr. S. O'Brien gave notice that he would, on Thursday, the 16th of February, move for a select committee to inquire into the mode in which the poor-laws had been carried into operation in Ireland.

Mr. Williams gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, move for a return of all persons who received public money to the amount of 1000*l.* a-year, between the 5th of January, 1842, and 5th of January, 1843. The honourable gentleman also gave notice that he would, on the same day, move for an account of the recommendation of the commissioners appointed in 1831, to inquire into the mode of receiving public money, and of keeping the public accounts.

Captain Polhill gave notice that he would move for a copy of the correspondence which had taken place between the Secretary of State and the magistrates of Dover, respecting the treatment of Mr. Fitzjames.

Mr. Mackinnon gave notice that he would, on the 14th of February, bring in a bill for the improvement of towns.

Sir Valentine Blake gave notice that he would, on the 16th of February, move for leave to bring in a bill to abolish the administering of oaths. The hon. gentleman also gave notice that he would call the attention of the house to the mode in which the business of Parliament was conducted, and would move to have it transacted in a manner more consistent with the convenience of members than the present mode of conducting it.

Lord Ashley gave notice that he would, on the 16th of February, move that an address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to take into her serious consideration the best means of diffusing a moral and religious education among the working classes.

Mr. T. Duncombe gave notice that he would, on Thursday, move for a select committee to inquire into the administration of justice by magistrates during the late disturbances in the manufacturing districts. The hon. member also gave notice that he would, on the same day, move for an inquiry into the mode in which Lord Abinger discharged his duties as a judge during the special commission.

Mr. Roebuck gave notice that he would, on the 16th February, move for a committee to inquire into the policy which led to the war in Affghanistan.

Mr. Ewart gave notice that he would, on Thursday, the 16th, move for an address to the Crown respecting education.

Dr. Bowring gave notice that he would, to-morrow, move for a copy of the charter granted to the Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company. The hon. member also gave notice that he would renew a motion which he had made on two occasions for the correspondence respecting quarantine.

Mr. Hume gave notice, that, unless her Majesty's ministers stated their intention of affording the information, he would move for a return of the several articles and imports the duty on which had fallen off more than £10 in the year, ending the 5th January, 1843, as compared with the receipt for similar articles in 1842, distinguishing those articles on which the duty was altered last session; and that he would also move for a similar return in reference to articles of excise.

Mr. Labouchere gave notice that he should, on Thursday, the 9th of February, move for a return of the wheat imported into Canada, and from thence re-imported into this country, for a certain period.

THE ADDRESS.

The mover and seconder of the address having entered the house and taken their seats,

The Speaker proceeded to read the speech delivered by the Lords Commissioners on Thursday, at the conclusion of which,

Lord Courtenay then rose and said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to propose to this house the adoption of an humble address in answer to the most gracious speech of her Majesty just read, I feel that I am not preferring any unreasonable request when I entreat for myself that kind and indulgent hearing which, under similar circumstances, this house has been accustomed to bestow. (Hear.) Whilst the magnitude and variety of the topics adverted to in her Majesty's speech are such as to place under no ordinary difficulties the mover of the address—(Hear, hear),—I yet feel, Sir, with unqualified confidence that these are topics upon which there can be but a unanimous concurrence. (Hear.) I feel, Sir, that in the announcements which her Majesty's speech makes there are many to which we all will be prompt and anxious to manifest our concurrence. (Hear, hear.) I feel that we all hear with equal satisfaction that announcement with which, for many years past, the speeches from the throne to Parliament have commenced: I mean, Sir, the gratifying announcement that the Sovereign of this country continues to receive firm assurances of friendly regard from all foreign powers. (Hear, hear, hear.) These, Sir, are assurances from which I trust we may augur a long continuance of that peace with which it has pleased Providence so long to bless the nations of Europe. But there is one announcement to which I feel particular pleasure in calling upon this house to respond: I mean that part of the speech in which her Majesty informs us that a treaty has been concluded upon a satisfactory basis with the United States of America. (Hear, hear.) I am sure, Sir, that, however great are the evils of war, every one in this house will agree with me that they are not merely to be measured by the loss of blood and the waste of treasure, but that there is a still greater evil in the disruption of those ties which ought to bind the families of mankind together. (Hear.) Those evils would be tenfold, if such should happen between us and that kindred community which has sprung up under our auspices. (Hear.) We are bound to that community by the kindred of blood, by the similarity of laws, and the identity of our language and our religion. (Hear, hear.) It is, therefore, Sir, with unhesitating confidence I call upon the house to express its satisfaction upon the adjustment of those differences which had for some time existed. (Hear, hear.) Let me turn now, Sir, to another announcement which her Majesty has graciously made respecting the triumphant close of the war in Affghanistan—a war which was carried on under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty—in a country of a peculiar character, and amidst foes of unknown numbers, of untried courage, of strange discipline, and unparalleled ferocity. That extraordinary war has now been brought to a triumphant close by the constancy and valour of our troops, to which, I trust, we shall be the first to offer the just meed of applause. (Hear, hear, hear.) It were idle—it were unnecessary—now to dwell upon the reverses of a former campaign. But, Sir, I cannot speak upon this subject without inviting the house to call to recollection the many instances of individual valour and power of endurance which were manifested by our troops, both European and native—instances which make us feel the greater satisfaction that that courage was not exhibited in vain, and that that suffering was not unattended with good results; for it leads us to reflect with increased satisfaction that British honour has been vindicated, and that the superiority of British arms has been established on the scenes of former reverses. We may turn with feelings of perhaps a less mixed character to another topic suggested by her Majesty's speech: I mean our relations with China, and I am sure that, with equal satisfaction, we shall learn that a treaty has been concluded with China, resulting from the superiority of our naval and military forces, and founded upon terms which her Majesty has proposed. We may, I trust, look forward to this as the commencement of a permanent and salutary intercourse between this country and that mighty and extensive land. There is not a gentleman that I am now addressing who does not feel that if ever there was a time when the prospect of new markets for our manufactures was essential, this is now that period. (Cheers from the Opposition.) Sir, we are informed by her Majesty's speech of a fact, alas! of which the experience of most hon. gentlemen whom I now address has made them aware—that considerable bodies, masses of our manufacturing population, have been suffering for some time under a state of distress occasioned by the depression of the markets of some departments of our manufacturing industry. Sir, we must learn with great regret, as evidence of that fact, the inability of a large portion of our manufacturing population to purchase those articles of comfort, or even of necessity, which under more prosperous circumstances they had been accustomed to; but this inability is one of the causes to which we are to trace the diminution in the receipts from ordinary sources of revenue which is announced to us in her Majesty's speech. That that diminution may be, and is, justly attributable also to other causes—to causes which may be, and it is hoped will be, temporary in their nature, and which cannot but have been present to the minds of those who originated and carried the great financial changes of last year—I mean to the reduction in the duties upon imports—is no doubt a matter which it is satisfactory and gratifying to believe. But, Sir, at the same time, the fact remains—a fact which is brought before us in this the very first stage of our proceedings—that large bodies of our manufacturing population are in a state of distress and depression. Sir, it is with no language of cold and ordinary condolence and pity that I now take this opportunity of saying what has been so often said upon that subject. We cannot but sympathise deeply with the way in which, I will say not only the manufacturing, but the agricultural portion of this community have often borne distress and privations, submitting to them with a fortitude and resignation deserving of a better fate. Such a circumstance renders their distresses still more entitled to the calm consideration of an English and Christian legislature. This state of things of an Of the remedies for this state of things this is neither the fitting time, nor am I a person qualified to speak; but, Sir, this much I may be permitted to say, that while I look forward with hope to the result which will follow from the continued operation of the commercial and financial changes of last year, and to the prevalence, the gradual prevalence, in foreign countries of sounder principles of international policy—(Hear, hear)—while I look forward to those considerations, I must be permitted also to say that any remedy for the national distress which legislation can supply is to be found, not in any crude and hasty measures, not in attempts to exalt and magnify the importance of our interests above others.—("Hear, hear," from the Opposition benches, re-echoed by the members on the Ministerial side) it is not to be found, I say, in endeavours to magnify any one in trust above others, but in a calm and dispassionate consideration of all the intcrests of the community—(Cheers from both sides of the house)—while we weigh justly and duly the importance of each in the social scale of our country, attaching and assigning to each its due share among the elements of our national greatness; and while we take into account all the compound evils of this great community, arising not only from circumstances of such peculiar circumstances, and to such peculiar bands as may result from a complicated and artificial state of society. It is for the Ministers, in the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers, the operation of such principles of legislation that, however unwilling I was to obtrude myself upon the notice of the house, I think it my duty, in acceding to the proposal made to me, not to shrink from the public expression, as the representative of a large and important constituency, of the general confidence which I entertain in her Majesty's present advisers. In the great financial measures of last year the country recognised a great scheme, not to be judged of in its individual parts, or in its temporary operation, but to be looked at upon the whole and in a spirit of candour. (Hear, hear.) I believe that if her Majesty's Ministers continue to act with a similar union of boldness, prudence, and caution; if, in the measures which may hereafter be propounded, an anxiety for the general welfare be exhibited in junction with a due regard to the various interests of the country; if they show themselves ready and anxious to maintain peace at the risk of everything but national honour; to promote economy at the hazard of everything except the efficiency of the public service; introduce change where change may be improvement, but to repudiate and reject it where it is nothing but innovation; I believe, Sir, if her Majesty's Ministers continue to act upon these principles, they will also continue to receive, as in my judgment they will continue to deserve, the confidence of a large portion of the country. (Cheers.) Sir, it is with these views and these feelings that I have come forward on this occasion to propose the address in answer to her Majesty's gracious speech; and I have only before I proceed to read the address which I shall submit, to express my grateful acknowledgments to the house for the kind forbearance which they have manifested. (Cheers.) The noble lord then moved the address, which was, as usual, an echo of her Majesty's speech.

Mr. W. P. S. Milnes said: In rising to second the address, which has just been so ably proposed by the noble lord, in answer to her Majesty's most gracious speech, I trust I shall be allowed that indulgence which I know this house is ever ready to extend to a young member making his first address. It is with no ordinary feelings of embarrassment that I undertake the task for which I have found it necessary to ask the favourable consideration of the house, and I trust that, in the few remarks which it will be incumbent on me to make, I shall make use of no expression calculated to disturb that spirit of harmony and unanimity which it is so desirable should prevail on the present occasion. (Hear.) I shall endeavour, Sir, to confine my remarks to as short a space as will be consistent with the importance of the topics on which it will be necessary for me to dilate. It is with feelings of peculiar pride and satisfaction that I advert to the glorious termination of the campaign in Affghanistan. I believe that on few occasions in the history of that country have victories so important to the security and stability of our Indian empire been achieved. I conceive that it is a matter of congratulation that her Majesty's army should have so nobly triumphed over every difficulty, and should have so gloriously recovered the laurels which previous events had torn from their brows; that, notwithstanding the severity of the climate, and the almost insurmountable nature of the mountain passes, they had, by the skilful guidance of their commanders, rescued the prisoners from captivity, and exemplified the maxim—that England leaves no insult unavenged, that her faith is inviolable when once pledged, that her punishment of the guilty is instant and certain, and that, while she strikes terror into the hearts of her enemies, she is at all times ready, even in the midst of success, to listen to the dictates of humanity and reason. The next topic to which I shall advert is the successful issue of our operations in China, which is not only a subject of importance to England, but to the whole world. I think this, coupled with the brilliant success of our arms in India, will be the distinguishing feature of her Majesty's reign, as this nation may be the means of opening a country which has been hitherto unknown to Europe, and of introducing into it the inestimable blessings of the Christian religion. (Hear, hear.) As a young member, I will not discuss the line of policy pursued by the late Administration, but I trust I am not too bold in expressing my approval of the energy which the present Administration has shown in bringing the war in China to a triumphant close. They displayed an exertion of force adequate to the dignity and importance of the undertaking which sustained the glory of the British arms. I can scarcely calculate the advantage to be derived from the ratification of the treaty of commerce with China, or form any opinion of the amount of trade likely to be carried on with that country; but, Sir, if the relations which we hear of that country be true—if the population be so numerous as it is supposed, and if the prejudices of Asia permit a more enlightened system of policy with Europe—I do not think any treaty could be of more importance, or more calculated to benefit trade and commerce. (Hear.) I congratulate the house that the long-pending boundary question between this country and America has been brought to a satisfactory conclusion by the talents of the noble lord to whom the conducting of that question had been confided. I cannot but think that the maintenance of peace between the two countries is of much more importance than a portion of disputed territory. That question, which had been contested for fifty years, is now finally settled, and I believe it is for the interests of civilization that a dangerous and expensive war has been avoided. (Hear.) I think this house will concur with me in regretting the disturbances which took place last autumn in the manufacturing districts. I rejoice that these disturbances have been suppressed by the energy of the civil authority without any great display of military force, or without the assistance of a fresh law. I regret that these disturbances have arisen; but, notwithstanding the pressure in trade, I think the spirit of insurrection is to be attributed to the means and to the topics made use of by demagogues to excite their passions. (Cheers.) I trust that the news from the East and the new treaty with Russia will contribute to relieve our commerce, and that the measures which have been adopted last session will promote commerce, and at the same time help to equalize the expenditure and revenue of the country. It will require more decisive measures to restore public credit, and to develop the resources of the country. The deficiency in the revenue has continued, which, I believe, is to be attributed to the deficient harvest of 1841. (Hear, hear.) But, I trust, the amount of revenue from the property and income tax may counterbalance this deficiency, and that next year the revenue will so far revive that this tax may be done away with. (Hear.) Notwithstanding the efforts that have been used, panic after panic succeeded among the agriculturists. They had been called on to bear unusual burdens, but, if they contribute to relieve other branches of industry, I believe they will be borne cheerfully. (Hear, hear.) I think the house has heard with pleasure of her Majesty's visit to Scotland. (Hear, hear.) The characteristic hospitality of Scotland and their abundant loyalty marked throughout the progress of her Majesty. (Cheers.) The recollection of her Majesty's late visit will be cherished in the hearts of her Scottish subjects, and will create an effect that will long survive. I have endeavoured, in a few words, to bring forward the topics introduced in the speech from the throne, and I hope the house will unanimously agree to the address, which, if adopted without any dissent, will prove the more gratifying to her Majesty. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion, I beg to thank the house for the kindness it has extended to me. (Loud cheers.)

The address was then read by the Speaker. The question having been put,

Mr. C. Wood said he had no doubt that the noble lord in no degree miscalculated the feelings of that house when he gave expression to the satisfaction which every one must feel at the announcement contained in her Majesty's speech of the termination of those hostilities in which this country had been engaged in two quarters, and of the improved prospect of peace, arising from the termination of differences with the United States. With respect to the termination of hostilities with China, he apprehended that no feeling but one of satisfaction could prevail. However confidently we might rely upon the skill and valour of our troops, no one could contemplate without anxiety the continuance of hostilities at such a distance from this country with a population so large, in a country of which we knew so little; still less could any one contemplate, without feelings of the greatest regret, the indiscriminate slaughter of a brave though barbarous people. (Hear, hear.) It had been the result of that war—a result which seldom attended such operations—that every object for which it was undertaken had been effected. Reparation had been made for the insult and heavy hardships heaped upon British residents; compensation had been made to our merchants for the losses which they had sustained, indemnity had been obtained for the expenses of the war, and he thought the noble lord was justified in anticipating that a treaty might be made for our commerce with China of the most beneficial nature to this country; but, China herself, to what calamities would she be subject, from the effects of intolerance, of ambition, and of religion. (Loud cheers.) With respect to the satisfaction which the noble lord had expressed at the triumphant issue of the operations in Affghanistan, he (Mr. Wood) apprehended there would be no difference of opinion in that house. (Hear.) There could be no difference of opinion as to the advance upon Cabul, and the vindication of the honour of our troops. (Hear, hear). But the house was not called upon on this occasion to express any opinion whatever as to the general policy upon which these operations were conducted; because already two notices of motion had been given, by the hon. member for Bath, and the Right Hon. the First Lord of the Treasury, which would afford opportunity enough to discuss that question. (Hear, hear.) He hoped that, before these motions came on, her Majesty's Ministers would be able to lay before the house the information necessary to form a correct judgment of those operations. (Hear, hear.) He trusted that the information which Ministers already possessed would enable them to contradict the reports which had been circulated, of excesses committed by our troops—excesses revolting to every man of common humanity—excesses said to have been committed by our troops upon the unarmed inhabitants of cities of which we had for some time been in peaceable possession. (Hear, hear.) He trusted that Ministers would be able to inform the house that we had not left in the countries beyond the Indus a justly exasperated population. With respect to the treaty with the United States of America, that was a subject upon which the house would look to the Government for explanation, which he was sure the Government would be most anxious to give. (Hear, hear.) He, for one, was ready to admit that, in adjusting our differences with that country, no importance should be attached to a few square miles of disputed territory, more or less. I confess it appears to me, upon the authority of a document, of the authenticity of which there can be no doubt, that all these questions are not so satisfactorily settled as we might at first have been led to believe. The subject upon which I now wish to have an explanation from her Majesty's Government refers to the question of what is commonly called the right of visit. I apprehend that, of all the questions likely to agitate the public mind in the United States, there is not one more calculated to lead to angry feeling than that of the right of visit, and, as there has been some confusion between what is called the right of visit and the right of search, I shall take the liberty of stating my view of each as distinctly as I can. I apprehend that the right of visit claimed by this country to be the right of our cruisers to ascertain whether a merchant vessel is justly entitled to the protection of the flag which she may happen to have hoisted on the vessel, being at the time in such a condition as to render her liable to suspicion—first, that she is not entitled to the protection of that flag; and next, that, if she be not entitled to that protection, that is, either under the law of nations, or by the right of treaties, subject to the suspicion and control of other powers. That was the claim put forward by Lord Aberdeen in his communication with the Envoy of the United States, and supported by arguments which I am sure it is unnecessary to repeat in a British House of Commons. (Hear.) It is enough to say that if this right is not to be exercised any vessel may sail unquestioned and unintercepted through the squadron of cruisers we possess, full of slaves. (Hear, hear.) It is enough to say that the most atrocious buccaneer or pirate might sail unquestioned through the fleets of all the maritime powers in the world if the right in question were denied. But this right is not only denied by the United States, but it is also stated in the documents to which I have referred that it has been given up by this country. He was aware that the instructions to be given to our cruisers were under the directions of Dr. Lushington and Captain Denman—men whose names were a security for the able and effectual discharge of the duty they had undertaken; but he (Mr. C. Wood) hoped that in the new instructions the spirit of the old instructions would be adhered to. He was sure the answer of the Government upon the point would be satisfactory to that house. (Hear.) He could not, however, help saying, that the present state of the question suggested a doubt as to the final settlement of our differences with the United States. But, speaking generally, with regard to our foreign affairs, he was sure the house would receive with satisfaction the statements contained in the speech from the throne, and would join in its congratulations. He confessed, however, that he derived but little satisfaction from the expressions in the speech relative to our internal policy. (Hear, hear.) The house would, no doubt, participate with her Majesty in the sympathy which she expressed for the sufferings of her people. But surely those sufferings were of a nature to call for something more than sympathy. (Hear, hear.) He did expect to find in her Majesty's speech—he did not say the precise nature of the remedies which the Government was about to propose—but he did expect to find in it some indications at least of the measures they intended to bring forward for the purpose of removing that depression of our trade, which had now lasted too long. (Hear.) And when he remembered the censure of which the late Government was the object for introducing great measures which they had not announced in the speech from the throne, he could not help thinking that no such measures were now in contemplation. The hon. gentleman who seconded the address had told them of some symptoms of reviving trade; but no one could be so sanguine as to believe that any great improvement had of late taken place in the condition of our people. (Hear, year.) In order to restore the vigour of commerce, they had been promised that measures should be brought forward that would considerably alleviate the distress. (Hear, hear.) No one could doubt what those measures ought to be, namely, measures that would increase the demand for labour, stimulate trade, and improve the condition of the people. At the conclusion of the speech from the throne at the end of last session, such measures were promised; and he must confess that it was with feelings of the greatest disappointment that he found in her Majesty's speech at the opening of the present session no indication that that promise was to be followed up. With many articles of manufacturing industry and consumption the Government had notattempted to deal; he had hoped to see something done with respect to sugar and corn, but the speech was entirely silent on that point. He knew not that in any article affecting the consumption of food the price had been reduced by the Legislature of last session. (Hear,) Fortunately for the population of this country, the price of wheat was low during the last autumn, but he confessed he did not see how that could any way result from the measure of the right hon. gentleman. He thought the panic and alarm which had existed amongst the agriculturists were the most unfounded panic and alarm, as far at least as the measures of the right honourable gentleman were concerned, that could possibly prevail. For three months after the bill of the right honourable gentleman for regulating the price of wheat passed into a law the price was only three shillings lower, on the average, than when the old law was in operation. It was true that, under the operation of the sliding scale, it all came in at the time of the harvest; but he did not believe that one grain more or one grain less came in in consequence of the change. ("Hear, hear," from the Opposition.) It came in at a different time; it came in paying a different rate of duty; but, so far as the produce and the consumer were concerned, he believed the new law was altogether a dead letter. Whatever might be the principle upon which future corn-laws should be based be it protection, be it revenue, or be it a duty for registration only—it must be acceded by all that it was desirable to get rid of the uncertainty which now existed (Hear.) He believed that the reduction in the price of agricultural produce was to be attributed entirely to the want of demand. (Hear, hear.) Allusion was made in the speech of her Majesty to the deficiency in the revenue. He believed that they were then to a considerable extent suffering the penalty of rejecting, in 1841, the measures which were then proposed by the late Government. (Laughter from the Ministerial benches.) That those measures were sound in principle he believed no member of her Majesty's Government would deny, after the deductions which they made last year, whatever might be the opinion of their supporters. It was impossible to deny those measures were calculated to create a demand for our manufactures abroad, and thereby to improve the condition of our manufacturing population. They were told at the time when these measures were proposed, that all that was necessary was a change of Government; as though, when hon. gentlemen opposite were placed in office, money would be sure to flow into the treasury. He apprehended that the result was far from bearing out such an opinion; that at that time the deficiency was greater than it had ever been. (Hear, hear.) Up to the 10th of October the estimated deficiency was two millions and a half. Had it been diminished in the last quarter? (Hear, hear.) He thought not; he thought he might say that the deficiency, up to the 5th of January, was not less than three millions and a half. He sincerely hoped that the receipts from the income-tax would be as great as had been expected by the right hon. gentleman himself, but they must double his own estimate in order to meet the deficiency. He believed the falling off in ordinary sources of income extended to everything except the Post-office. (Hear, hear.) The greatest deficiency was in the Excise, which was not touched by the measure of the right honourable gentleman, and which had usually been considered as the best test of the prosperity of the nation. If they were ever to be relieved from the burden of the income-tax, it could only be by the improvement of the ordinary sources of revenue. He could not but hope that the Government would bring forward some measures for improving the state of commerce. Even the speech of the noble lord encouraged such a hope, for he had expressed a hope that the Government would persevere, not rashly, but steadily and firmly, in the course which they had pursued during the last session. He trusted that, even before that debate was concluded, the right hon. gentleman would not leave them without some assurance that such was his intention. Such an assurance would only be in accordance with the recorded opinions of the right hon. gentleman himself, and of the Government of which he was the head; and he might depend upon it that, whatever the opposition which he might meet with from gentlemen who sat behind him, he would, at least, have the continued support of that (the Opposition) side of the house, in carrying out those measures which were best calculated to improve the condition of the manufacturing population. The condition of the people was one of which the oldest man could scarcely remember a parallel. The depression was similar to that which prevailed when Mr. Huskisson, in 1825, brought forward his measures for the relaxation of the then commercial tariff. Under that relaxation trade revived. He believed that from the application of similar remedies to the whole of our imports, and especially to the great articles of consumption, they might look with confidence to a large increase of revenue, and an improvement in the moral and social condition of the whole population. (Cheers.)

Sir R. Peel said he was happy to infer, from the general tone and tenour of the speech of the honourable gentleman, and the approbation with which that speech was received from those who generally concurred with him in opinion, that there was every prospect that they would be able to present to her Majesty an unanimous address in answer to her speech. He would not have heard the declaration of the honourable gentleman, with reference to the foreign policy of her Majesty's Government, with great satisfaction, because it appeared to him to imply cautious and almost unqualified approbation of the policy which her Majesty's Government had pursued with respect to foreign affairs. (hear, hear.) The only reservation which the honourable gentleman had made was with respect to the convention pursued to the westward of the Indus, conceiving, as he did, that, as there was a notice on the books of the house with respect to that particular subject, there would be a more fitting opportunity afforded of expressing his opinion. The hon. gentleman referred particularly to the treaty which this country had concluded with the United States. The hon. gentleman said, with respect to the differences referred to in the speech from the throne namely, those between the State of Maine and the United States—that a few miles more or less of territory was of little importance, compared with the adjustment of differences between two mighty countries, which had continued for half a century, and which were now amicably settled. He rejoiced to hear from the hon. gentleman his frank admissions in respect to the policy pursued towards the United States, as far as the question of boundary was concerned. Considering the uncertainty which prevailed as to the letter of the treaty, the ignorance of the geography of the country which prevailed at the time—considering also how impossible it was to execute the treaty, the division made giving one-half to the United States and the other half to this country, their military stations being preserved, the adjustment of the questions upon the whole being more favourable than that which was given to them on a former period, he felt confident he would be able to express satisfactorily to the house that they had acted consistently with sound feelings—consistently with the interests of the country in ratifying that convention. (Cheers.) He knew there were parties who tried to obstruct the amicable settlement of the question: there were those who blamed Mr. Webster as well as Lord Ashburton, because he had acceded from the pretensions put forward by the United States, because he saw there was no other mode of bringing that question to an amicable settlement. (Hear, hear.) He was taunted with selling his country. Here it was the Ashburton capitulation, there it was the Webster capitulation; but, God be thanked, there were sufficient moderate and good men who knew that a relinquishment of extreme pretensions on each side might be compatible with the authority of each, and that the question of dispute was nothing compared with the establishment of an amicable union between two great people of kindred origin and kindred language, and whose interests were as deeply interwoven as their origin. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It was a painful duty to him to refer to the message of the President of the United States, but he sincerely and honestly believed that it was necessary that a good understanding between the United States and this country should prevail on the subject of the right of visit. (Hear, hear.) That message did not give a good account of the nature of the negotiation which had taken place upon the subject. (Hear, hear, hear.) The right of search was a belligerent right, or, if it existed in a time of peace, it was a right given and conceded by one country to another. The right of visit was different from the right of search. The right of visit was merely a power to enable us to ascertain if a vessel, bearing the American flag, was a bonâ fide American vessel. If they knew that a bonâ fide American vessel, fitted up with American money, and commanded by an American, had on board a cargo of human beings, intended to be sold as slaves, they were bound to allow such a vessel to pass. But then this country had a right to know that such a vessel was really what she was represented to be. The principle upon which the right of visit was contended for was admirably laid down by his noble friend (Lord Aberdeen), in his despatch dated the 20th of December, 1841, the object of which was to declare that the object of the right of visit was to ascertain if the vessel with American colours was what she represented herself to be. Now, he (Sir Robert Peel) could not see, considering how America was surrounded, how her revenue or her commerce could be safe unless the right of visit were maintained. (Hear, hear.) But when he recollected that in the seas in the neighbourhood of the American coast the Government of the United States did expect vessels to submit to the right of visit, he was really astonished to see the objection urged against the right of visit claimed by this country. Such being the state of the case upon this question, it was his duty to declare, in the face of the public, his regret at that part of the President's message relating to the right of search. (Hear, hear.) The principle of this right of search not the belligerent right, but that conventional right, the object of which was to prevent the traffic in slaves—was proposed in 1824 by Mr. Rush, on the part of America, and acceded to by Mr. Huskisson. (Hear, hear.) It was now, however, his duty to declare, in the face of the House of Commons, that the Government of this country had made no concession to America, but had declared their determination to abide by the principles laid down in Lord Aberdeen's despatch, and by those principles they were determined to adhere. (Hear.) Since the President's message had appeared, the Government of this country had taken means to communicate with the Government of America on the subject, and he trusted that the result of that communication would lead to a settlement of the differences which existed respecting it. (Hear.) He did not recollect any other question in respect to the foreign policy of the country that had been touched upon by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman commented upon the state of the revenue. He was ready to admit that the revenue was in anything but a satisfactory state, and, if a balance-sheet were called for, it would support the statement of the hon. gentleman on this subject in the fullest manner. But then there could be nothing more unfair than to estimate the future state of the revenue from its present appearance. He last year admitted the deficiency in the revenue, but he proposed to improve it by raising funds through a new channel. (Hear.) He proposed to remit portions of the import duties, and, out of eleven hundred articles, he did, in fact, remit the duties on 700. The reduction of these duties commenced, in some instances, in July last, and in others in October, and the taxes imposed to meet these deficiencies had not yet been collected. It was not fair, therefore, to take the present state of the revenue as a proof that hereafter it would present the same appearance. He candidly admitted that the decrease in the excise was a proof that there had been a diminution of the powers of consumption of the people. There undoubtedly was reduction in the excise, particularly in the article spirits; but that must not be deemed symptomatic of distress—much of it, he believed, was occasioned by improved habits of temperance in this country as well as in Ireland. He, however, did not seek to be too sanguine in his conclusion. There had been occasioned difficulties also by the pouring in of corn. There had been parties who anticipated an unfavourable harvest. He begged the farmers not to hold back on that account: though right in his prediction, he was not successful in his advice. The farmers did hold back. There was a favourable harvest, and hence followed an increased flowing into the markets of corn. There were great and unfavourable speculations; and he feared there always must be, when they remembered the uncertainty of seasons in this country. He, however, was not, but those who had predicted unfavourable harvests were answerable for those consequences. (Hear, hear.) He thought the reduction in the revenue under the head of the item malt was not altogether attributable to the existing distress. The return of the quantity of malt was 9,010,000 bushels. The reduction in the amount of the spirit duty was not to be taken as evidence of the distress of the country, for they might build upon it that temperance was progressing here as well as in Ireland. But the great reduction in the excise under the head of malt was partly to be attributed to the unfavourable harvest in 1841. He was not contending against the existence of distress, the prevalence of which he had already admitted, but he wished to caution the House of Commons against drawing too disheartening an inference, or taking too gloomy a view of our prospects. (Hear, hear.) At any rate, hon. gentleman opposite could not deny this, that there had been a great reduction in prices. (Hear, hear.) They said that the corn-law had nothing to do with this; that it had not checked speculation; and that, in fact, whatever benefits were enjoyed were attributable to the ample produce of the harvest. Why, he remembered that the language of hon. gentlemen opposite, in June and July, was, that the harvest would be unfavourable. They declared that they had the very best information that the harvest in 1842 would be no better than the one which preceded it. He, however, had ventured to express a different opinion, and had cautioned the holders of corn against trusting to these doctrines. They did hold back their corn, and they had to blame not him but hon. gentlemen opposite for the consequence. There must be at all times uncertainty in speculating in an article the production of which was dependent upon the season; and hon. gentlemen were fairly chargeable with the evil consequences which followed from their expressed opinions, if corn poured in at that period at which, from the uncertainty of the harvest, it was always likely to do. But certainly those parties who did keep their corn back had done so contrary to his admonition. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the excise, he would show in the article of malt the quantity which had paid duty in the last quarter of 1842 as compared with the similar quarter in 1841. In the quarter ending October, 1841, the quantity of malt from barley, the produce of the crop of that year, was 876,000 bushels. In the October quarter, 1842, the number of bushels was 804,000. For the quarter ending January, 1841, the number was 8,951,000; and for that ending January, 1843, the number was 10,561,000; showing an excess in the last quarter of 1,331,000. Now that was evidence that the consumption had increased, and gave grounds for believing that the deficiency in the excise was in a great measure to be attributed to the former unproductive harvest. The hon. gentleman had asked him what further measures he was prepared to carry out that session in reference to the commerce of the country. He (Sir R. Peel) had stated last year the general principles upon which he was prepared and determined to act—that he was ready to give as free a scope as possible to the commercial energies of the country. (Hear, hear.) Such was the principle upon which he had declared himself prepared to act, but, when he had laid that principle down, he had said that the many complicated interests at stake should be borne in mind when, in a country like this, they proposed to make large alterations in the laws which affected those interests. They had made extensive changes in the code which, at a former period, had regulated the commerce of this country. If he had been disposed to make further alterations he would have at once proposed them. He had not led the hon. gentleman to expect that he would go on year after year making changes. It would be better, as regarded the interests of commerce, to make all the changes in one year than to proceed upon a system of secret reservation with respect to further alterations. Whatever alterations took place were in accordance with those principles in the truth of which he still believed, and from none of which was he disposed to recede. (Cheers.) He had stated last year that protection had hitherto been the rule in the commercial system of this country, and said then, as he did now, that that rule, and the interests created under it, should not be lost sight of, but, in acting on those benevolent principles which influenced them, they should, in reference to the interests in question, produce results far from satisfactory. It was therefore not his intention to propose at present further extensive changes in the commercial code of this country. But wherever he did make any alteration it would be in accordance with the principle he had laid down. He, however, as he already stated, had not led the hon. gentleman to expect any further alterations this session. (Hear, hear.) He would not then enter upon a vindication of the Corn-bill. An opportunity would no doubt be hereafter afforded him of doing so by some hon. gentleman opposed to his views on that question. Experience, however, had shown him that in no one of the views he had entertained on that subject had he been mistaken. With respect to the averages it was said that the introduction of the new towns would have the effect of lowering the price by five shillings; and, consequently, raising the duty. Now, it had had no such effect. The fact was, the law had not had a sufficient trial to warrant its abrogation. The objections raised by the hon. gentleman to-night did not at all apply. When he (Sir R. Peel) introduced the income-tax he had foretold that there would be such a reduction in the price of the necessaries of life as would recompense those assessed under the income-tax to the amount of their contributions under it, and his predictions had been verified. ("No, no," from the Opposition.) The result had been such as to enable parties to equalize their remuneration for labour by the reduction in the cost of the necessaries of life. (No, no.) Well, there would be other opportunities of discussing that matter. He should now merely say that having been called on by the hon. gentleman opposite to state his intentions with respect to further commercial alterations, he thought it right to affirm that her Majesty's Government had not in contemplation any such alterations. (Loud cheers.)

Lord John Russell said, that the speech from the throne had been wisely framed to avoid any difference of opinion, or the expression of dissent, by a vote on the first night of the session. He expressed his concurrence in one topic of the address, namely, that which referred to the success of our arms in China, and the satisfactory conclusion of a treaty with the Emperor. He agreed with the hon. gentleman who seconded the address as to the energy and promptitude with which the plan of operations had been followed up by her Majesty's ministers. If there had been any insinuation against the policy or arrangements of their predecessors, he would have been prepared to vindicate that policy and those arrangements which her Majesty's ministers had adopted; but, as no such insinuation had been made, he was left on that topic nothing more to say than that he was willing to bear testimony to the promptitude and decision with which that war was drawn to an honourable conclusion. (Hear, hear.) There was one other topic, with reference to which the right hon. gentleman opposite had given notice of a vote of thanks to the Governor-General of India and the army engaged in the operations to the west of the Indus. These operations undoubtedly did refer as to the military talent of General Pollock, General Nott, and General Sale. But when the right hon. gentleman moved those thanks to the Governor-General and the army, there were two topics which would have to be discussed. One was whether or not our victorious troops had stained the glory of their triumph by the spirit of revenge and retaliation. (Hear, hear.) That house would regret that they should have tarnished the brilliancy of their victories by the slaughter of inoffensive men, women, and children—by, in fact, the violation of that principle of humanity which had governed all nations in all ages. (Cheers.) The second topic related to the part which, it was rumoured, the Governor-General had taken previous to the commencement of the second series of operations in Affghanistan. The rumour was that the Governor-General had directed the retreat of the army from beyond the Indus. The rumour on that point was somewhat vague. It was not clearly understood whether or not the second advance was ordered by the Governor-General, or whether he had left it to the generals in command of the army to decide upon it. That, however, would have to be clearly understood. He presumed, therefore, information would be given by the right hon. gentleman as to the Governor-General's connection with the assembling and operations of our troops in Affghanistan; and, if that information proved satisfactory, he (Lord John Russell) would not refuse him the thanks to which he was entitled. (Hear, hear.) But even on that first day of the session he (Lord John Russell) could not help alluding to two remarkable proclamations issued by the Governor-General. The first of these contained a violent attack on the intentions and the policy of the Governor-General's predecessor. (Hear.) The noble lord who moved, and the hon. gentleman who seconded, the address spoke of introducing Christianity into China. Much as I desire to witness the introduction of Christianity into

China, I cannot approve of an attempt to do so inconsistent with the respect due to the feelings of that people—of any attempt savouring of violence. Sir, I need not say anything with respect to the original expedition to Affghanistan. Whenever it shall be discussed, I shall not fear to enter into the discussion, or shrink from any responsibility which may belong to me from the proceedings of Lord Auckland. The right hon. gentleman has answered my hon. friend with regard to another transaction, the treaty made by Lord Ashburton. I think the right hon. gentleman has somewhat exaggerated the statement of satisfaction which fell from my right hon. friend. With respect to the necessity of maintaining peace between the two countries, I am sure that there will be no difference of opinion in this house and this country. (Hear, hear.) Of Lord Ashburton's talents, of his long experience and knowledge of the disputes between this country and America, no one can doubt. But it so happened that in the year 1838, Lord Ashburton, after giving notice two days previously in the other house of Parliament, gave a very elaborate opinion with respect not only to the colonies in general, but with respect to Canada in particular. He stated that his opinion was that no wise man could expect that Canada could belong to this country more than twenty years, and that for his part, if there was any wish on the part of the Canadians for a separation from this country, he would be perfectly ready to forward that separation. Now, sir, I happen entirely to differ with that opinion. I do not believe that to be the opinion of the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies, nor do I think it is the opinion of the Prime Minister. But, sir, there is another view in which this subject may be regarded, and it is a point of view which gave the people of this country so much satisfaction on hearing the conclusion of the agreement. The boundary question was not greatly studied in this country: very few people knew exactly the boundary claimed by either party, or the reasons upon which it was claimed, or the advantages likely to be derived from it by the country; but the people of this country trusted that it would cement the friendship and perpetuate peace between England and the United States. Now, in that point of view it was most desirable that, with respect to the very question on which you could have an understanding or agreement, there should be a plain and definite agreement. But has that been the case? What is the case now? You have the President of the United States making to Congress, to the people of America, and to the people of all Europe, the announcement that there is an agreement and a treaty with England which bears a certain interpretation. You have the right hon. baronet the Prime Minister of this country declaring that it bears no such interpretation. Why, sir, can we say every question is completely settled, that there is a complete understanding on all questions so long as this is the case? I think with respect to this question, as with respect to some others, that rather too much hurry was evinced to say "we have concluded a treaty with America—everything is settled," when in fact the understanding on one side is different from that entertained by the other, and there is no stability whatever with regard to the treaty. Sir, with respect to this treaty, which has been entered into by the Minister of the Crown, and which has been ratified by them, I think the House of Commons might safely abstain from giving any formal opinion on the subject. I do not think, if the honour of this country is not compromised; if the interests of the country are not placed in any imminent jeopardy, that the House of Commons is required to express any opinion on the treaty entered into by the authority of the Crown. Sir, the remainder of the speech then refers to the domestic state of the country. The subject has been fully entered into by my hon. friend near me, and as it will be discussed on several other occasions, I need not more particularly allude to it. I cannot believe, from the declarations that have been made in the recess—very strange declarations I must say—I say, I cannot believe that it is intended to maintain the corn-laws; and I observe there has been a sort of feeling that the corn-laws could not be defended in conjunction with the principles of the tariff. Important as I think the principles are on which the tariff is founded, I do not think any of the articles of the tariff are equal in point of importance to the article of corn—certainly not equal to the articles of corn and sugar taken together. (Cheers.) Sir, in allusion to the revenue, the speech from the Crown declares that when the duties laid on last year shall come into operation, the revenue will be found sufficient to provide for the expenditure. I am glad to hear upon such an authority a declaration of that nature; but I must say that the reasons which induced me last year to give my vote in every stage against the reading of the bill for the imposition of an income and property tax have been strengthened by the experience which we have had. (Hear, hear.) I beg pardon of the house for trespassing so long on its attention. (Hear, hear)—but there is one part of the speech from the throne to which I wish to allude, and it is, perhaps, the only one with respect to which I was not satisfied -I allude to that part which relates to the disturbances in the manufacturing districts. There is no doubt that there were considerable disturbances—that there were violations of the public peace; but I think that the disturbances which took place arose from the circumstance that the working people thought they were not sufficiently paid, and that the conduct of the working people in those districts were worthy of very much commendation. (Hear, hear.) If the evil was traced to laws which affected our interchange of goods with other countries, he hoped they would soon be altered. (Hear.) He hoped the character of the British people would be maintained, and that we should still be a happy and flourishing nation. (Hear.)

Sir CHARLES NAPIER rose to address the house, but the noise occasioned by members leaving prevented his observations being heard in the gallery.

Mr. WALLACE said he was altogether dissatisfied with the speech which had been read to them in the name of the Sovereign. He did not believe it was her Majesty's, but that of her advisers. (Hear, hear.) The distress—the alarming distress of the country—was treated with indifference. The people were distressed, but they acted with loyalty to the throne. It expressed no commiseration, held out no hope; and he was confident it would bring the present Government into greater disrepute than any ministry had ever before experienced. (Hear.)

Lord STANLEY said he confessed that when he recollected the compliments which the noble lord paid them on that side of the house, at the commencement of his speech, on the manner in which the topics in the speech from the throne had been selected and handled, and when he heard the noble lord proceed to address the house in the way which he did, he could not help thinking that it would have been a more fair and a more manly course (especially after the speech of his right hon. friend) for the noble lord to have abstained from introducing topics which he must have an ample opportunity of discussing on a more fitting occasion; and when it was not the intention of the noble lord to propose an amendment with regard either to the Governor-General of India, or the Government of which his right hon. friend was the head, he should have abstained from discussing the policy of the late or present Government in the general manner which he did. The motion of which his right hon. friend had given notice had not so wide a scope as the noble lord appeared to imagine. The object of it was only to thank the Indian army for the skill, and valour, and energy displayed by them in carrying to a successful termination a war which, when they came into office, bore, to say the least of it, a most unpromising aspect. (Cheers from the Ministerial side.) He would at once admit, that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government by that motion to claim for the Government—to claim for the Governor-General the merit of having mainly contributed to that great success; and the noble lord opposite would have an opportunity of denying his noble friend's claim. The house would have an opportunity of looking at these papers, which the noble lord, who expressed a desire for them, should have in the amplest detail; and after a careful perusal of those documents, and looking at the time the present Governor-General arrived in India, and the triumphant termination of the war, when the whole of the case was put before them, and that they were in a position to judge of the merits, and not on the mere partial consideration of an expression which the noble lord appeared to think was in doubtful taste, then he would not fear even the verdict of the noble lord himself, and most certainly he had no dread as to the verdict which the house and the country would return in reference to the amount of thanks to which the Indian Government was entitled. The noble lord told them that, when they withdrew from Affghanistan, they should not have left the whole country in a state of anarchy behind them; that they should have established some system or elected some sovereign to reign in security amidst the discordant elements by which he must have felt himself surrounded. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) This was the policy of the noble lord in the case of Shah Soojah, who was to reign, as it was stated, not by the power of Great Britain, but in the affections and loyalty of the people. (Cheers and laughter.) This was the circumstance which had led to all the tumult, bloodshed, and anarchy in that disturbed country, which had been fostered and encouraged by the invasion of the late Government, and which had induced the present Governor-General to withdraw within the natural limits of India. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord had alluded to certain reports about excesses having been committed in India, and the soldiery having aggravated the horrors of war. Now he (Lord Stanley) could not say how far this was the case. It was, perhaps, true that the passions of the soldiers had been excited by the scenes with which they were surrounded, and the recollections of the horrors to which they were exposed, and that in this state of excitement they had committed some excesses. (Hear, hear.) He would not then enter into a discussion of the question concerning the gates of the temple which his noble friend had restored to India; but he felt bound to state that in the act of bringing back to India the memento of a former conquest, nothing could be farther from his mind than a wish to invest the proceedings with anything like a violation of religious scruples. The noble lord had also referred to the Ashburton treaty, and said that although a very good settlement had taken place, yet he thought a better might have been effected. (Hear, hear.) But if this were such an easy task, why, he would ask, had not the noble lord done so ten years ago? (Ministerial cheers.) What had the noble lord—the member for the city of London, and the other noble lord the late Secretary for Foreign Affairs, been about, that up to the period of quitting office they had never attempted to bring the matter to a favourable issue? (Hear, hear, hear.) He would not on that occasion follow the noble lord into a discussion of the position in which the question of the corn-laws now stood; but yet he could not refrain from making an observation with regard to it. First of all he stated, that the corn-law was not to be defended by her Majesty's Government during the present session, and next, he informed them that the question was to be put on such a footing as would secure it from agitation. The noble lord had also referred to the subject of the income-tax, and had stated, that, great as had been his objections to this measure last year, his subsequent experience more than realized his worst anticipations. The house would observe, that the noble lord had not considered it convenient to enter on the question of the deficiency in the revenue (which, after all, was the only reason that had induced her Majesty's Government to recommend the imposition of this tax), but had confined himself to mere attacks against the workings of the measure, which was perhaps more objectionable than any other mode of direct taxation, and instead of giving any positive authority for the statements he had made, he could only say that "he was told this by so and so, and had heard that from such and such a one," without giving the slightest authority on which the house could rely. (Oh, oh, and hear, hear.) These, he believed, were all the topics to which the noble lord had adverted; and he regretted exceedingly that he had been compelled to follow him at such length on an occasion when the discussion could not be brought to any serviceable issue—for it was now generally understood that they were about to come to a unanimous vote on the question of the address. He thanked the house for the attentive manner in which it had listened to his observations, and he hoped that their decision should be perfectly unanimous. (Cheer.)

Lord PALMERSTON thought it rather an unreasonable expectation on the part of a Minister of the Crown, that a speech, embracing so many topics of great and powerful interest, should not only be received with an unanimous vote, but also escape observation and remark. (Hear, hear.) He thought the noble lord should have refrained from expressing any dissatisfaction with the difference of opinion that had been elicited in the course of the discussion. It was quite impossible that in the course of one short night they could go into a full discussion and consideration of the various topics embraced in the speech from the throne; but, as the noble lord had expressed an anxiety for such an occurrence, he (Lord Palmerston) thought it highly probable that an opportunity would occur before long, when the noble lord might be fully gratified. ("Hear," from the Opposition.) He should not, therefore, find it necessary to follow the noble lord on the present occasion into the particular details of the Ashburton treaty, or of the other subject which he had mooted. He (Lord Palmerston) meant no disrespect to Lord Ashburton. He had the greatest respect for that noble lord's talents and high character; but, from circumstances connected with Lord Ashburton's family, his lordship was not the best fitted to carry out those negotiations. Entertaining the opinions which the noble lord did on colonial questions, and connected as he was with the country with which he was adversely to maintain the interests of this country, he was not the person that ought to have been selected for an appointment imposing on him duties which he was not likely to perform with credit to himself or advantage to his country. With respect to China, he cordially concurred in the congratulations which the address proposed to convey on the happy termination of hostilities with that country. (Hear, hear.) As to India, every man must rejoice that the operations and talents directed to the honour of the British arms had been triumphant. He doubted whether thanks were to be given to Lord Ellenborough for his successes in India. With regard to other topics, such as our relations with foreign states, he (Lord P.) certainly adverted with great satisfaction. He particularly alluded to the relations between this Government and Russia continuing to be on so amicable a footing, and to the confidence existing between the two Governments. He also looked with satisfaction on the interference of these two great powers to put a stop to the unfortunate dispute between Turkey and Persia. With regard to Syria, he must say that the peace of Europe stood in very little danger of being interrupted, when the chief question which occupied the attention of the great powers was whether the Maronites or Druses should be ruled by independent chiefs, or by indirect authority from Turkey or Russia. Last year they were told that they had left Syria in a state of anarchy—that, instead of having tranquillized that country, they only left things worse than they found them. But where is [illegible] in July, 1841, the state of affairs in Syria [illegible] to look the powers of Europe in the face, now that [illegible] Ameer of the Druses of Lebanon [illegible] regulating the internal government of that country. With regard to domestic affairs, he had hoped that in the speech from the throne clear indications would have been given of what the intentions of the Government were with regard to certain matters which excited so deep an interest in the country: he meant the trading interests generally, but particularly the trade in corn. Before sitting down he wished to know if the cruisers engaged against the slavers by the British Government were to be reduced in number by one half, as had been recently asserted in the French Chambers by Monsieur Guizot.

Sir R. PEEL regretted that the rules of the house prevented his being able to defend his noble friend, the Governor-General of India, as the subject, having been introduced in an early part of the evening, was considered as dropped, and he could not bring it on anew without a violation of the rules of the house. With respect to the questions of the noble lord, there was some mistake in the statement to which they referred.

Sir R. H. INGLIS then addressed the house, denouncing the proclamation of the Governor-General. He believed that no Mussulman governor would ever have shown so much respect for idolatry as the Governor-General had done, nor so little regard to his own true faith. (Hear, hear.) Lord Ellenborough was the last person from whom he should have expected such a proclamation to issue, as, from a previous order to the clergy of India, he appeared to have a due sense of the importance of his religious obligations.

Mr. VILLIERS would not enter into the discussion of any question of foreign policy, but he could not avoid remarking upon the utter disregard of the sufferings of the people manifested by the framers of the speech, and by those who had addressed the house in support of the Government. He could not but imagine, from the way in which the subject had been treated, but that the right hon. baronet did not really believe in the existence of the distress. He could hardly believe that such ignorance of the real state of the country could have been displayed. The right hon. baronet, in his speeches, had treated the sufferings of the people as temporary, and had given the house to understand that no remedies were contemplated. The right hon. baronet had last year admitted the truth of free-trade principles, and this year he had declared that he would not carry them out. The people considered the restrictions on commerce as the cause of their distress; and he was convinced that a total abolition of the laws regulating the importation of food would remedy it, and yet they were told that that remedy could not be resorted to them. The people would not be content with mere expression of barren sympathy for their sufferings: they demanded that something should be done to alleviate them. The honours conferred on his hon. friend the member for Stockport, by almost all the boroughs in the kingdom, showed the progress this question was making. The hon. member for Stockport was identified with the question of free trade, and he had received honours in Scotland which had been refused in many instances to men of high rank and great influence. The right hon. baronet had referred to the state of the savings' banks: the fallacy of that argument had been exposed over again, and yet the right hon. baronet continued to repeat it. The proprietary classes were protected, but the labour of the working classes was not protected. They heard, on the authority of a learned doctor of Oxford, that there were ten millions of human beings in England who did not taste wheat bread, but subsisted on oats, and rejoiced in potatoes; and yet, with such a state of things existing, they were told that the law was well. The real question was, were the people underfed or were they not, and to that question the country expected an answer from her Majesty's Government.

Lord HOWICK agreed with the hon. member for Wolverhampton in deploring that no allusion had been made to any measures to be proposed by the Government for the relief of the existing distress. He considered the state of the country required the immediate attention of Parliament, and he had determined to give notice of a motion on the subject. We ought to look our difficulties fully and fairly in the face, in order to endeavour to devise some means to overcome them. He should wish the house to come to some specific vote on the question, as he was convinced that some specific plan for its relief ought to be adopted, and that it ought not to be left merely to the operation of time. Another hon. member had, however, given notice of a motion on the same subject, and, if the question were not fully gone into on the discussion of that motion, he (Lord Howick) would call the attention of the house more specifically to the subject. (Cheers.) With regard to our foreign policy generally, he begged to express his entire concurrence in all that had fallen from his friend the member for Halifax. With reference to Indian affairs, he thought that his noble friend opposite had found fault, without sufficient reason, with the course taken by his noble friend the member for London, in animadverting on the conduct of the Governor-General during the course of the present debate. In his opinion it would be much more unfair both to the Governor-General, and the Government, to have waited until the vote of thanks should have been proposed to demand those explanations, which he hoped would be given, and thus deteriorate from that vote, the value of which was so much enhanced by unanimity. There were many parts of the conduct of the Governor-General of India which required the fullest explanation, and he must have that explanation before he could concur in any vote of thanks. (Hear.) He considered the noble lord opposite had hardly dealt fairly by his noble friend in animadverting upon what had fallen from him relative to the Governor-General's proclamation on evacuating Affghanistan. His noble friend had justly animadverted upon the tone of exultation and delight in which the Governor-General in that proclamation had alluded to the anarchy existing in Affghanistan. It seemed almost as if he were desirous of having it inferred that his measures had been framed with a view to produce anarchy in the country. (Hear.) Before he could concur in any vote of thanks, he should like to have some explanations as to the excesses alleged to have been perpetrated by the troops. The noble lord had admitted and lamented these excesses committed by some of the troops and the camp followers; but he (Lord Howick) would like to know if they had not been excited to the commission of these excesses by their superiors? Had no example been set by those high in authority? He should wish to know who it was that had ordered the destruction of the Bazaar of Cabul? He trusted that some satisfactory explanation would be given of the course pursued by those in authority on the occasion to which he had alluded. (Cheers.)

Mr. HUME expressed his extreme gratification at the conclusion of the treaty with America, and, although he had disapproved of the appointment of Lord Ashburton in the first instance, yet he must now retract his opinion, for the noble lord had, in the conducting these negotiations, exhibited great temper, judgment, and conciliation, and he had been met by Mr. Webster in a kindred spirit. We were in a better condition to settle the Oregon boundary question in consequence of having settled the other boundary question, owing to the labours of Lord Ashburton. He regretted that no hopes were held out of the completion of a treaty of commerce between England and America, as he was convinced the increased commercial intercourse would be for the advantage of both countries. (Cheers.) He was rejoiced at the satisfactory termination of our differences with China; but he charged the Government to exercise the greatest circumspection in the appointment of our consular agents in that country. With regard to the termination of the war in Affghanistan, although he approved of the policy of evacuating that country, yet he could not but regret the conduct of the troops in that country. They had left a character in that country which nothing could efface. He should like to know who it was that had ordered the destruction of the Bazaar of Cabul. That was one of the most wanton acts of barbarity that had ever been perpetrated. The Goths had never been guilty of such a wanton act of spoliation and barbarity. (Cheers.) The right hon. baronet had proposed no measures for the relief of the distress of the country. The country was suffering from the pressure of taxation which it was unable to bear. (Hear, hear.) If the corn-laws were to be abolished, there would be immediately a revival of commercial prosperity. What was the case at the present moment? The Bank of England had 12,000,000*l.* of bullion which it was unable to get rid of. The circumstance and the cause were unparalleled in the history of this country. The cause was, that our merchants could not send any article of manufacture abroad, because they were obliged to say, send us no coffee, sugar, or wine, or other articles, but send us hard cash. (Hear.) He had heard the right hon. baronet opposite say that the policy of her Majesty's Government was to give employment to the people. But what had he done? He now told them there was to be from him no relief; there was to be no alteration in the corn-law. He (Mr. Hume) was not one of those who thought that by an alteration in the law corn would be cheaper. The alteration would only put us on an equal footing with other countries. Was he not warranted in calling on the right hon. baronet to consider the injustice to which he was a party? Indeed, he (Mr. Hume) had been foolish enough to expect that the right hon. baronet would effect for the country all that it desired, although he had been told by those around him that he was depending on a reed. Yet, recollecting the principles which he heard the right hon. baronet last year avow as First Minister of the Crown, he felt strong confidence that he would not now stultify himself. If he were not able to carry out his avowed principles he ought to resign. He (Mr. Hume) would be glad to see the man on the opposite side of the house who could take the right hon. baronet's place. The right hon. baronet was bound to act on his principles. The people were dying of want, and the distress under which they were suffering was produced by the corn-law. He appealed to the right hon. baronet to apply his principles to that law. The country gentlemen owed it to themselves to look for further changes. What relief, under the present state of things, could they expect from low rents and low prices? Not only would rents continue low from the improbability of prices rising, but the charges the land had to meet would continue in some instances the same, and in others to increase. The poor-rates would increase—the clergy would have to be provided for—the income-tax would have to be met, and the mortgages would have to be paid. He (Mr. Hume) deprecated the finality doctrine of the right hon. baronet; and, if the country were satisfied with it, it was more resigned to its condition than he thought it likely to be. (Cheers.)

Mr. Ferrand said he was of opinion that, if protection were afforded for other interests, it should be also extended to those of the labourer; but protection could not be afforded to the labourer unless machinery were taxed. The right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government was cheered on last year by honourable gentlemen opposite when introducing those measures which they were all told were to benefit the community. Had those measures conferred the promised benefit? Those hon. gentlemen who had cheered them on now came forward with some degree of ingratitude to announce their failure. Did the country express itself satisfied with the opinions of those gentlemen opposite? Had they tried the north of England? They had indeed shut their doors against the masses, and the majority of their audiences were composed of women, who were excited by the poetic outflowing of the hon. member for Bolton. Those who differed from the managers of those meetings were hundled out of the windows. In London there were two or three humble men who, at those meetings of the Corn-law League, wished to show that the corn-laws were not injurious to them, but that their sufferings were chargeable to the robbery and injustice of their masters. How were they treated? (Laughter.) Yes, hon. gentlemen might laugh. Would they meet him in any town in the north of England? When hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the house gave notice of their intention to bring on the question of the corn-laws, he would be ready to meet them, and he would state some facts that would cover the League with confusion, and show them up to the country in their true colours.

Mr. Ewart said he did not know what the hon. gentleman meant by his threat. Did he mean to call for a renewal of those laws which had been passed by Mr. Pitt, in 1799, and which were aimed at, and intended to put down, the Corresponding Society? He did not think the Government would join in the censures bestowed upon the manufacturers. The hon. gentleman admitted the misery of the people, but he denied the cause of it. He owned he was disappointed at the omissions in the speech from the throne. He regretted to find there was no opening to be made to admit cheap food. Had the right hon. baronet given any hopes in respect to an improvement in the condition of the country? None. He did not think there was any great chance that the negotiations for a treaty with the Brazils would be successful, and the opening which had been made with China could only be advantageous in the event of the duty on tea being reduced from 2s. 1d. to 1s., and by allowing the sugar of China to come into this country duty free.

Mr. Gibson would take leave to say a few words in reply to the observations of the hon. gentleman who had a short time previously addressed the house, the hon. member for Knaresborough, and he could assure the hon. gentleman that whatever he might think to the contrary, his speeches had tended very much to promote the cause the Anti-Corn-law League had at heart. If the hon gentleman thought that the sense of the country was against the repeal of the corn-laws, why did he not convene public meetings and convince the people of the fallacy of the arguments of the advocates of total repeal. He maintained that the corn-laws could be no longer supported. The right hon. baronet might discuss alterations in the sliding scale or a fixed duty, but the people would be satisfied with nothing short of a total and entire repeal. He trusted that the hint thrown out by the right hon. baronet in the course of his speech would be fully carried out, and that the next change would be a total and radical one, a bold and comprehensive one, that would settle the question for ever. (Cheers.) He trusted the right hon. baronet would carry out these principles ere long, and he felt satisfied that it would ultimately tend to the benefit of the agricultural interest.

Mr. Ferrand begged to ask whether the hon. gentleman had read the evidence given before the payment of wages committee? That would show that his statements had been fully borne out.

Mr. Gibson explained.

Mr. Brotherton bore testimony to the continued depression of the manufacturing industry of the country. The distress was increasing, and could no longer be denied, and it was time for Parliament to devise some remedy for it. He cared not from what side of the house propositions of that nature would come, but whenever they were brought forward, or by whatever party, they should receive his most zealous and cordial support.

Mr. G. Banks regretted to say that the state of the population of the county with which he was connected (Dorset) was extremely wretched; he trusted that it would be found that there was some exaggeration in the statements that had been made in the course of the present debate. He had no wish whatever to array the power or the might of the landed interest against that of the manufacturers—if he had used such language it was in no invidious sense, because he was firmly convinced that the interests of the one party were bound up in those of the other, and that the country would best prosper under their combined influence. He believed the proceedings of that self-constituted and most unconstitutional body, the Anti-Corn-law League, had done more than anything else to produce the present distress.

Mr. Sergeant Murphy said that it had not been his intention to address the house; but, as the hon. member for Dorsetshire had made accusations against the hon. and learned member for Cork, he could not refrain from saying that it might be better taste if the hon. member had withheld his statements and charges until the hon. and learned member was in his place to answer them. Much had been said of the distress and patience of the people of England, and much credit had been attributed to them on that account; but nothing was mentioned in the speech from the throne of the distress and patience of the people of Ireland, who had required not even the exertion of the constitutional resources of the authorities to enforce tranquillity and order among them. The noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies had said that there was at present an anomalous state of things in Canada. He for his own part rejoiced at it. He rejoiced that those men who had heretofore been proscribed had been exalted to power and official station in Canada. But had such a course been pursued in Ireland? It had not. All the official appointments in that country were made from the ranks of those who had always been the bitterest enemies of the popular cause. In common with all other persons he rejoiced in the successes which had been obtained in India, but he could not agree with the noble lord, who stated that all the acts of the Governor-General were conducive to the highest honour of this country.

Dr. Bowring defended the speech made by the hon. and learned member for Cork at Liverpool, and thought it a most instructive one. With respect to the Affghan war the (Dr. Bowring) was of opinion that that war, both in its origin and progress, reflected no honour on the people of this country. A subject of deeper interest, however, was the distress which existed through the population of this country. He entreated the attention of the right hon. baronet to one fact, sufficiently illustrative of the misery which prevailed in this country. He found that in Bolton, for the year 1842, the number of individuals who received relief from the society for the protection of the poor was 15,290. The average income of those applicants who had been refused relief by the society was 1s. 9½d. per week, and the average income of those to whom relief had been granted amounted but to 9½d. per week.

Mr. Mark Philips was surprised that so many people in this country had formed such sanguine expectations as to the prosperity and the advantages to be derived from the opening of the trade with China. He thought those hopes most delusive. He believed that we should be unable to force the trade in tea between this country and China, unless in the first place we reduced the taxes on sugar.

Captain Pechell said that the debate ought not be allowed to close until the right hon. baronet gave a more explicit declaration as to the orders given with respect to the disposal of the cruisers on the coast of Africa; whether or not they should be exclusively confined to that coast.

Sir R. Peel said that he should answer the gallant captain on a future occasion. With respect to a matter of so much importance, he did not wish to make any statements merely from memory, and without preparation.

The address was then agreed to; and a committee was appointed to draw up the resolutions.

The house adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Friday.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

Sir R. Inglis presented a petition from the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury against the union of the bishopries of St. Asaph and Bangor; also a petition, with a similar prayer, from the Church of England Lay Association.

Mr. Hawes presented a petition on the subject of emigration.

Sir G. Clerk moved the usual sessional orders, which were severally read from the chair, and agreed to without discussion.

POOR-LAWS.—IRELAND.

Mr. H. Grattan, seeing the noble lord, the Secretary for Ireland, in his place, wished to put to him a question of some importance to the people of Ireland. It regarded the poor-laws. He wished to know whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure this session, whereby the mode of assessment of poor-rates in Ireland would be changed. At present they were charged, as the noble lord was aware, upon the occasion.

Lord Eliot said it was not the intention of the Government this time to propose any alteration in the fundamental provisions of the poor-law. However, with respect to some of its minor provisions, inquiries were now being made as to the necessary changes; and when Lord Lincoln's Government were in possession of the requisite information, they should be prepared to state what alterations they would make.

Sir G. Clerk gave notice that, on Thursday, the 9th February, he would move for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the shipwrecks of British vessels, and the means of preserving the lives and property of the persons shipwrecked.

THE ADDRESS.

Lord Courtenay brought up the report of the committee on the address, in answer to her Majesty's speech, which was read a first time, and, upon the motion that it be read a second time,

Mr. Walter rose. He said that it was not without great reluctance that he rose to address the house on the present occasion, the more so because he feared that some portion of his remarks would not be received favourably on that (the Ministerial) side of the house, and the other would not be received with much satisfaction by the Opposition. However unsatisfactory the foreign relations of this country were, painful experience showed that they were but a poor antidote for the distresses at home. Those might have arisen from various causes; but perhaps the chief of them originated with a question which had been agitated for the last half century. On that subject they were now as far from unanimity, and perhaps from tranquillity as they were fifty years ago! It therefore became the imperative duty of every good and patriotic man to assist in putting an end to the anxiety that prevailed, and give tranquillity and repose to the various interests of the nation. The topic to which he alluded was the corn-law. It had been his lot to represent both an agricultural and a manufacturing constituency, and the opinions which he first formed, after all the reading and consideration he was able to bestow on so important a subject, he still retained. That opinion was favourable to a fixed duty on corn, and opposed to every principle of a variable scale. (Hear.) The trade of their own and foreign countries might finally adapt themselves to a fixed duty, while a variable scale would for ever agitate the country, and render the supply of corn uncertain. (Hear, hear.) The measure which the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government introduced last session on the subject received its greatest tribute of approbation from the circumstance that it approached nearer to a fixed duty than any of those laws which preceded it. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman adhered to that law, and, though he might not see the advantage of an immediate change, yet he (Mr. Walter) thought that they might look forward to the prospect of some change next session. (Cheers.) They had been told by those who were in the secret of the poor-law commission of the great sufferings of the mass of the people, and of the great discontent which must prevail if something more were not done for their relief. They had also heard of the benefits to be derived from introducing education into the workhouses. He would not comment on the regulations; the best comment was to be found in the sufferings and deep-rooted discontent of the great mass of the people. The honourable gentleman then proceeded to advert to the other topics contained in her Majesty's speech, and concluded by declaring his adherence to the principle of a fixed duty on corn.

Mr. Ward said, considering the hon. gentleman who had just sat down was at present the member for Nottingham, considering that he had represented a great agricultural interest, considering that he had declared he had never concealed his sentiments, and looking also to the quarter of the house from which he spoke, he (Mr. Ward) thought his speech ought not to be passed without notice. On his part he begged to express his sense of the intimation the country owed the hon. gentleman, who had made what, under present circumstances, was a most important declaration. It showed there existed a tendency to vary the question—it showed there was a sense of the necessity of a change that even among those gentlemen sitting behind the right hon. baronet some might be found (and he hoped every month would increase their number) who were inclined, discarding all party feelings, to state their conviction of the matter, which conviction was evidently this—that things could not rest where they were; that there was a feeling that even amongst those most deeply interested, and most directly concerned in agriculture, a great change had taken place on this subject. Among this class of men there was a sincere desire to see things placed on a footing which would afford some promise of stability. Confining his attention to home questions, he heard last night the speech which her Majesty had been counselled to deliver with the deepest sense of pain and disappointment. He had expected, not that the right hon. baronet would take his stand on the changes of last session, but that professing, as the right hon. baronet did, his conviction that the principles on which those changes were founded were sound—were consistent with reason, and approved by experience—he did hope that, after having seen the misfortunes which operated from the sliding scale, the hon. member would have given some indication of his own views as to what amount of fixed duty he thought ought to be adopted. If there was a low duty there might be a point on which parties would agree, which he most sincerely desired, but as to leaving the question as it at present stood was utterly out of the question. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Liddell said that the authorities adduced by the hon. member for Nottingham against the present system of corn-laws did not support his doctrines. He (Mr. Liddell) denied that the present laws occasioned greater insecurity to the farmers than a fixed duty. Such a duty would not last six months. They would not have half the security which they had under the present law, which he was glad the right hon. baronet defended.

Mr. Ewart congratulated the house and the country on the division, of which there were symptoms, on the other side of the house. Nothing could be more satisfactory to the country than to know that there was a division in the ranks of the opponents of free trade. (Hear.)

The address in answer to her Majesty's speech was then agreed to.

It reply to a question from Mr. Villiers, as to what last night fell from the right hon. baronet,

Sir Robert Peel said he had no objection whatever to answer the hon. gentleman's question. In the first place he was asked whether it was intended proposing any alteration in the present corn-laws during the ensuing session, and his answer was, that he did not think that any alteration should be then brought forward. He had also stated his impression that a fixed duty would not give that protection to the agricultural interest which it received from the present sliding scale, and therefore he would repeat that he had heard nothing to induce him to interfere with the present system. He felt that no better arrangement could be introduced, or one that was more likely to give general satisfaction to the agricultural body. (Hear, hear.) He was certainly not of opinion that a fixed duty would give to the landed property that increased value which some gentlemen supposed. But he would never himself be found to do the maintenance of the present law as to exclude himself from the advantages of experience, if it should be seen that under other circumstances alteration might become necessary. The bill of last session had not yet, however, had a fair trial, and until it had, he would resist any attempt to alter it. (Cheers.)

Lord Howick gave notice of his intention to bring forward on Monday week a motion for a committee of the whole house to take into consideration that part of her Majesty's speech which had reference to the falling off of the revenue.

The address was then agreed to and ordered to be presented to her majesty.

Several official documents were then moved for by various members, and ordered to be furnished.

Mr. Ellice moved to have presented to the house a copy of the instructions given to the commissioners appointed to inquire into the Scotch poor-law system. The hon. member complained of the appointments, which he said should have included one or two dissenting clergymen.

Sir Robert Peel vindicated the Commission, which he said was the best that could have been appointed under the circumstances.

After a few unimportant observations from several hon. members, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Hume moved for a return of the quantity of sycee silver imported from China.—Ordered.

The house then adjourned.

PROSPECTS OF THE SESSION.

The present number of our journal contains the speech of the Sovereign, and an account of the opening of Parliament, and both subjects will be found treated with comment in their proper department; but upon this page we prefer taking a wider field of reflection than is opened to us by these topics in the abstract; and looking forward to the programme of what should be acted in the theatre of legislation, we bend our glance upon the works of the future session rather than upon the immediate incidents by which it is ushered into life.

It will not be denied that a vast and almost overwhelming responsibility will rest upon both Government and Parliament during the next three months—a responsibility which the nation expects them to take with courage, endure with firmness and energy, and acquit with statesmanship and success. The internal condition of Great Britain is calamitous and oppressive; and now that the Income-tax has fastened its fangs upon the country, more classes than the suffering lower, require to be relieved, while even the principles of national safety and honour demand that, in the domestic career of the community, a downward progress should be promptly and vigorously stayed. We cannot continue listlessly to endure either state-imposts or glaring social evils of a destructive and tyrannizing order; we cannot contemplate, with silent inertion, large masses of wealth at a loss for employment, and still larger masses of enduring people at a loss for bread; we cannot watch the bitter advances of poverty from class to class, the fierce and rapid strides of population, proportioned to the very destitution and penury in which it is born; we cannot learn that in the face of extraordinary means of raising money for the public purse—means which the struggling middle orders groan under while they endure—public revenue still becomes deficient, and that with an increase in the inhabitancy there is a decrease in the consumption of human food; we cannot be sorrowfully but plainly cognizant of these dreadful anomalies in the condition of society without a deep and solemn conviction that the nation is now thrown for hope and comfort upon its legislators, and that the time is indeed come when the crime of indifference must no longer darken the doors of Parliament, but when the evils which the country is suffering, in the deepest recesses of its spirit, cry loud and emphatically for laws to relieve and to redress.

Never was there a moment, although surrounded with difficulty, more propitious for the initiative of the "good work" than that which is presented in the commencement of the present session; never was there a moment either, when the noble-mindedness of patriotism ought more generously to break forth among all classes of legislators, and, spurning the base and binding trammels of hollow and designing party, make the restoration of national happiness and welfare the true "labour of love." Let truthfulness and sincerity be thrown into their exertions for the good of the people, and now is the time for success. The great secret will be, not to waste this time—not to make the squabbles between opposition and minister the staple but contemptible business of the drama they have to enact—not to pit Russell against Peel, and Peel against Russell, as birds in a cockfight, of which the reward of the winner is only the loudest crow—not, in a word, to degrade the lofty purposes of senatorial duty into a wretched exhibition of wrangle and dispute.

During the pending debates in her Chamber into what a dilemma of discredit and dishonour is France plunging herself by a resort to this petty and dishonest course? How upon a question of foreign policy is she meshing herself between the alternative of the miserable defeat of a Government or a dangerous though ignoble war. Let England apply the warning to her domestic legislation, and not allow the same bad spirit to work within her own bosom the wretched influences of clique-ism which are distracting the heart of France. Let every man who would make his voice subservient to the purer dictates of wisdom, devote himself to the condition of his country in an honest spirit, and without reservation or delay. There are now no longer the reasons which before arrested the arm of patriotism with some strong and imperative contingencies of the moment. In the former session Parliament had two wars upon its hands. Those wars are happily at an end—though perhaps with less honour to our policy than to our arms.

The Affghan lurks hopeless and shelterless among his desolate mountains, and the devouring pride and sullen ostentation of the Chinese Empire has quailed with unwilling submission beneath the edge of the "barbarian" sword. Our arms are well at rest. The opportunity therefore for vigorous domestic legislation is the more emphatically confirmed and enforced, and now the question naturally arises—into what channels should it direct its cleansing and refreshing streams. The whole condition of the country wants revival—some boon of relief must be afforded to the poor—some healthy stimulus imparted to the rich. The excess of population, one of the palpable afflictions of the times, must be dealt with by worthy schemes of colonization and emigration, or such better alternatives as wisdom may devise. The Poor-laws must undergo a searching and complete revision; they have been the bane of this country for several past years; they have tended, we are persuaded, no less to diminish the revenues of the state than to increase the sufferings of the people; they have been fraught with cruelty, and yet have not answered any just end of policy, nor won the goodwill of any class of the great community. Sir James Graham and the political economists of his order must not be permitted to triumph in the misery which they entail upon the land.

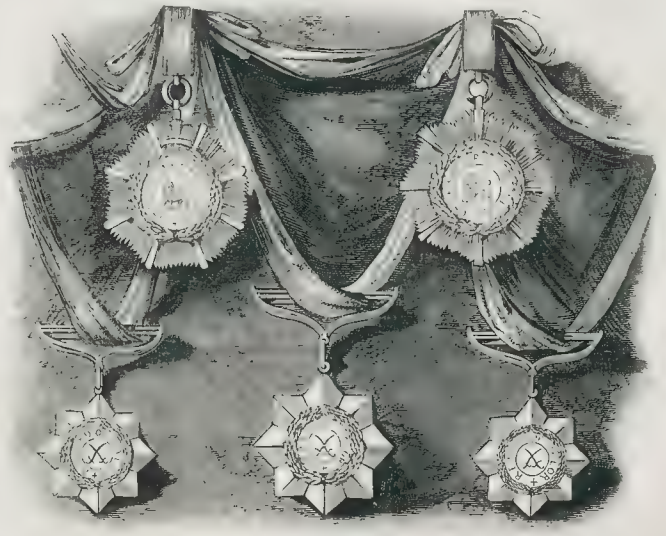
Upon the subject of Corn-laws we hold silence here. There has been so wide-spread, fierce, and exhausting an agitation of the people upon this head, that we shall allow it by its own voice to produce its own results; and, whatever those results may be, before they have legislatorial sanction they shall receive honest and unreserved opinions at our hands.

A very great and important boon will be bestowed upon the community by procuring the simplification of all the forms and means of obtaining justice, by giving to the poor equal facilities with the rich for getting at what is the poor man's as well as the rich man's right; and it should also be remembered that every enactment that tends to promote the ends of Christianity, that is made in a humane spirit to weaken any oppression or relieve any class, will be welcomed by the whole people as a pure and sacred blessing, and as one of those bright springs of civilization which are not dependent upon expediency, but have their source in the goodness of the human heart.

The question of revenue is one with which the Government will find it most difficult to deal, but that cannot be shirked. The country is already beginning to look for a remission of the Income-tax, and yet the Exchequer does not rise with the emergencies of the empire. The double difficulty of replenishing the purse and relieving the people is involved in this question, and we pray Heaven to enable our legislators to bestow upon it a wise and good, and therefore a happy, solution.

The condition of Ireland is neither the last nor least of the considerations upon which Parliament should be engaged; and we shall be honestly and heartily grateful for any generous ameliorations effected for that distracted land. Commend us to some laws that shall hush down the strife of party, and make humane provision for the poor.

We are here warned to conclude, but not without a request to our readers that no misconstruction may pass upon the spirit of the foregoing remarks. They are made, be it remembered, not to support a Government, or cheer on an Opposition. We will afford honest countenance to all the public acts of Sir Robert Peel which seem fairly to grapple with the difficulties of the time, and give promise of change for the better; we will oppose him wherever we discern prejudice instead of policy; but we will never do so in a carping or a spiteful tone. We wish to see the business of the nation carried on with conferential gravity and dignity, but never with the acrimony of party debate. We are sure that this is what all good men desire; it is the bane of independence, and makes the glory of patriotism a byword and a jest. We hope, therefore, to see it honourably dismissed from the discussion of the measures of the coming session; and solemnly and fervently do we pray that, whatever those measures may be, they may pour hope, relief, and happiness into the bosom of old England, and tend to bless the peace, strengthen the power, and confirm the prosperity of our common country.



MILITARY DECORATIONS OF THE NATIVE TROOPS OF INDIA.

The daily journals have been teeming with peculiar illustrations of the good or bad policy of the Governor General of India in reference to the Affghan war. One of the least uncavilled at of his measures, however, has been the establishment of a sort of order of merit to reward and emulate the spirit of the native troops who generally so well conducted themselves during our recent triumphs. A series of medals have been cast to be presented to them as awards of honour; and as appropriate fruits of our victories in the Eastern world, we have much pleasure in exhibiting fac-similes to our readers.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of the past week have been chiefly occupied with the debate on the address in the French Chamber of Deputies, which commenced with an extraordinary but not altogether unexpected incident —that of M. de Lamartine announcing his intention of abandoning the Conservative party for ever, and throwing himself into the arms of the Opposition. What effect the secession of this gentleman may have upon the Government remains to be seen. His speeches have been listened to with pleasure, as admirable instances of the powers of a poetic imagination, but nobody has ever attached importance to him as a practical man of business. The Opposition journals hail his accession with delight, for they hope, now that he has abandoned his old friends, he will seek to make himself agree able to his new ones, by plunging with them into all the wild doctrines which they profess, and drawing largely upon his powers of eloquence in favour of the clamour against the ministry and against kingship.

The debate on Monday was adjourned at six o'clock, and on Tuesday M. David's amendment was of course the first thing proceeded with, but it was ultimately withdrawn by M. David, in favour of a new paragraph, suggested by M. Dumon in the name of the commission by whom the address was drawn up in the first instance. M. Berryer moved the omission of a portion of this new paragraph, and a division took place, but the numbers had not been ascertained when the courier left Paris. Of course nothing had taken place in respect of the right of search. On the paragraph relating to the right of search notice had been given of no fewer than three amendments. The first of these was, as we are given to understand, considered the cheval de bataille of the Opposition; and probably upon this the strength of parties would be tried.

The crack speech of Saturday (the second day of the debate) was that of M. Agenor de Gasparin. It embraced almost everything that could be said in favour of the maintenance of the treaties of 1831 and 1833. He eloquently described the infamous nature of the slave trade, and showed that France would be wanting to her own dignity, to the love of freedom, which she boasted having given birth to in Europe, if she allowed any other nation to take a more prominent part than herself in the suppression of the abominable traffic.

The speech of M. Gasparin produced a great effect. He was congratulated on every side when he left the tribune, and M. de Tocqueville, who replied to him, failed in his attempt to destroy the influence of his speech. As the Journal des Débats very properly says, M. de Gasparin spoke like a statesman, and M. de Tocqueville like a partisan.

A meeting took place of electors of the third arrondissement of Paris, on Saturday, for the purpose of examining the three candidates, Messrs Lafitte, Lander, Decan, and Segantil, for the vacant place of deputy.

On Monday, the general discussion having closed, the paragraphs were debated seriatim. The first two were accepted without opposition. The next two were also adopted with little opposition. In the fifth paragraph, on the subject of Syria, M. David moved an amendment inviting the cabinet to vindicate the rights and privileges which were granted by the Porte to France in the reign of Francis I., and to resume the protection of the Christian population of Syria, which she had possessed from time immemorial. M. Guizot was left to reply on the departure of the post.

The Paris journals of Monday publish a despatch from General Bugeaud, dated Algiers, Jan. 19, announcing the sudden and certainly unexpected appearance of Abd-el-Kader on the right bank of the Chelif, at the head of a force (according to General Bugeaud) of 1000 cavalry and some hundreds of the tribes whom he had compelled to join him; but, according to the Patrie, of a host of Arabs who threw off their subjection to the French as soon as Abd-el-Kader had shown himself.

The amendment having been discussed at great length, the President put it to the vote; but the house being twice divided into two nearly equal halves, the result was declared doubtful by the scrutateurs. The secret ballot was then demanded on all sides, and the operation commenced and proceeded amidst the greatest tumult. When it was concluded the President proclaimed the result. The number of voters was 409. In favour of the amendment, 206; against it, 203; majority against Ministers, 3. The discussion afterwards opened on the paragraph relative to the right of search.

SPAIN.—From the Madrid papers of the 24th ult. we find that a rumour prevailed in that city of the probable appointment of Comte Lara, formerly Envoy to one of the South American republics, to the office of Minister of Finance. It was generally thought that the pending disagreement between the courts of France and Spain would be satisfactorily arranged. Frequent Cabinet Councils continued to be held on the subject of the approaching elections. The illness of M. Calatrava had prevented him for some days from transacting business, but he had quite recovered at the date of the accounts now before us.

Private letters from the Hague, of the 28th ult., state that the Ministers had been engaged for three days consecutively in furnishing to the Secret Committee of the States-General official explanations of the different bearings of the treaty with Belgium, concluded on the 5th of last November. It was expected that the treaty would be approved by a large majority in the States, notwithstanding the petition to which we have recently referred as having been signed by some commercial houses at Amsterdam against the ratification.

THE LEVANT.—We have received accounts from Constantinople to the 7th, Alexandria the 6th, and Smyrna the 9th ult. The supplement of the Malta Times of the 18th ult. gives the following summary of the news from Constantinople, Smyrna, Syria, &c.:—"Great tranquillity reigns at Constantinople with regard to diplomatic matters. The state of Syria alone occupies the minds of the ambassadors, but, as might be expected, all is very secret at the present. Affairs in Syria are comparatively satisfactory. Emir Lieutenant, Jan. 6.—It is the prevailing opinion in Syria that the Governors for the Maronites and Druses have both been chosen, but hitherto the individuals on whom that office has been conferred are not publicly known. We learn that Shekib-el-Arsan, the late Emir Lieutenant among the Druses, has been to Damascus, and surrendered himself up to the Pacha of that city. The Governor-General of Syria, Assad Pacha, having heard of this affair, sent to the Pacha of Damascus to have him given up into his hands, that he might convey him to Constantinople, that the Grand Signior might do with him according to what he merits. The reports say that he is on his way to the capital. The day before yesterday we were all taken by surprise with the announcement of the death of Ahmet Fethi ex-Capitan Pacha. There are two rumours afloat here about the cause of his death; the one is, that he died of a fit of apoplexy; and the other, that he was poisoned. We suppose that, as it is a Turk who has died, most men are naturally inclined to circulate the latter, and the more so, as he has been signally in the way of a certain party. Now that he is no more, Mehemet Ali will have no more to intercede on his behalf with the Sultan, nor to pay him a thousand pounds a year for being an eye-sore to him. There are complaints about the manner in which the packets are conducted between this place and Beyrout. Lately there have been heavy complaints laid by the passengers; who, it is said, have been robbed of divers things they had, because the crew had not sufficient provisions aboard. The captain of the Thaki has been sentenced to pay 100 dollars, it is said, for what the passengers have suffered during the last trip. If all these things be true, is it not high time for the British government to look into the affair, and to rectify what is wrong? On the 23rd ult. arrived at Suez the ship Clown, Captain Morris, from Calcutta, in 72 days. The cargo consists of tin, Bengal rice, pepper, nutmegs, cassia, saffower, tamarinds, tea, and a little indigo and cubebs. We are informed that it is likely that she will return with a cargo of wheat. The Egyptian government offered for sale a few days ago some lots of cotton, but wanted 10 dollars, subject to the export duty and other charges. Every merchant when they found out what they must give, left the place, being determined not to be caught in the trap again, which had sufficiently taught them what was for their interests in times gone by."

AMERICA.—UNITED STATES.—The packet-ship Ashburton, Captain Hutteston, which sailed from New York on the 11th, and the packet-ship Stephen Whitney, Captain Thompson, which sailed on the 14th ult., both arrived at Liverpool on Sunday; the former after a passage of eighteen, and the latter after an extraordinary one of only fifteen days. The papers brought by these conveyances extend from the 3rd to the 14th ult.

The new year's holidays had interrupted the proceedings of Congress. The bill making provision for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon territory had passed to an engrossment in the senate. "The subject," says the Washington correspondent of the Daily Express, "is a monomania with Mr. Linn, of Mobile, who reported the bill from a select committee, and he is quite mad enough already to prosecute his bill vi et armis, and regardless of all attempts at negociation. His full and honest faith is, that the country needs a war to awaken its downcast energies; and though with feelings awakened to the calamities of a war, the welfare of the country, he thinks, would be better maintained by its prosecution than by its concession. It is understood here that the Oregon question is the subject of negociation at London."

The Times of Tuesday, in reference to this subject, very naively suggests that until such time as this question is amicably adjusted, it would be as well to keep the China fleet in sailing order.

The last debate on the bill took place on the 12th ult., when Mr. Benton delivered a long and warlike speech in favour of the appropriation and settlement of the territory.

On the 11th ult. the President pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, in answer to the resolution (adopted at the instance of Mr. Benton) calling upon him to state whether the quintuple treaty for the suppression of the slave trade has been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form; if so, by whom, and for what purpose, &c.; and also to show the origin of the American squadron articles.

The President, in reply, says—"These inquiries were particularly unexpected by me at the present time. As I had been so fortunate as to find my own views of the expediency of ratifying the late treaty with England confirmed by a vote of somewhat more than four fifths of the Senate present, I have hitherto flattered myself that the motives which influenced my conduct had been fully appreciated by those who advised and approved it; and that if a necessity should ever arise for any special explanation or defence in regard to those motives, it could scarcely be in the Assembly itself."

On the 9th ult. the Exchequer system came before the House of Representatives. It came up in the shape of a motion from Mr. Fillmore, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to print a report from the majority of the committee adverse to the Exchequer system recommended by the President, and which said that the bill "ought not to be adopted." A long debate followed. The impression was, that the bill would be rejected. On the 10th ult. Mr. Botts brought forward a series of resolutions impeaching the President for unconstitutional conduct. Several divisions took place, and the affair was finally disposed of by a vote of 127 to 83. After the division, Mr. Botts said he would bring the articles of impeachment for ever.

The message of Governor Porter to the Legislature of Pennsylvania had been published. It clearly sets forth the financial condition of that important state, which is described as "one of the largest, wealthiest, and most populous states of the Union." The resources of the state, the Governor maintains, are fully adequate to meet all the demands against it, the principal as well as the interest of its enormous debt. Governor Porter recommends taxes and honesty, and scorns all idea of repudiation.

The court of inquiry into the mutiny on board the United States brig Somers was still sitting. All the officers of the vessel have been examined on the subject, the court was engaged in the examination of the seamen. The inquiry excited the liveliest attention.

A shocking affair has occurred in Columbus, Georgia. Colonel Hepburn and General M'Dougal had quarrelled. Hepburn sent M'Dougal a note, intended for a challenge, and then went personally to the office of the latter. On opening the door, M'Dougal, "General, I have come!" when he received a pistol-ball in his left side, just below the heart, and died instantly.

Commercial and money matters were without any material change. The rate of exchange on London at sixty days' sight was 10½. Freights had risen in all the ports, there not having been a sufficient number of vessels to ship the produce for the European market.

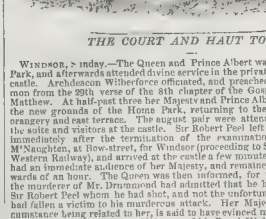
We have accounts from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick by the Duke of Cornwall, from Halifax, after a short passage of fifteen days. The elections had terminated; the members returned were for the most part opposed to the legislative measures of the late administration. At Fredericton the military had been called out to suppress election riots. The electors of Newfoundland had returned an immense majority of Liberals. Nothing otherwise important had occurred. Halifax was lighted with gas for the first time on the 11th January.

CANADA.—The accounts from Canada report an improvement in the health of Sir C. Bagot, and his ultimate recovery was expected. The Provincial Government having left the choice of the capital to the Provincial Government itself, the latter had fixed on Montreal. Mr. Papineau was expected to return to the United States in the spring.

The news from Mexico was late and important. General Gusarry, of the department of San Louis, had, by a military movement, which had been in preparation some time, declared the dissolution of Congress, and announced the overthrow of a new one by Santa Anna, to frame a constitution for the republic. General Canalizo had made the same declaration for his department. The news of these events reached the city of Mexico by express. General Tornel, the Minister of War, on receiving it, immediately made the events known to Congress. That body, it is stated, at once took a decided stand, declaring that they would not listen to threats from any military command, and would continue to sit until driven from the hall by force of arms. The movements of the Generals had caused a great sensation in the capital.

Commodore Jones, with the United States frigate Potomac and the corvette Cyane, had, in consequence of a report which had reached him that war had been declared by the United States against Mexico, occupied Monterey, in Lower California. He gave up the town in two days, after having been assured of the falsity of the report. The Commodore had then sailed for his station.

Campeachy continued to hold out against the Mexican land and sea forces. Skirmishes, which did not lead to important results on either side, were of frequent occurrence. The Mexican ranks are said to have been thinned by the ravages of the yellow fever.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Monday.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Home Park, and afterwards attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle. Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated, and preached an excellent sermon from the 29th verse of the 8th chapter of the Gospel according to St Matthew. At half-past three her Majesty and Prince Albert walked through the new grounds in the Home Park, returning to the castle through the orangery and east terrace. The august pair were attended by the whole of the suite and visitors at the castle. Sir Robert Peel left town, on Saturday, immediately after the termination of the examination of the assassin M'Naghten, at Bow-street, for Windsor (proceeding to Slough by the Great Western Railway), and arrived at the castle a few minutes before three. He had an immediate audience of her Majesty, and remained at the castle upwards of an hour. The Queen was then informed, for the first time, that the murderer of Mr. Drummond had admitted that he had imagined it was Sir Robert Peel whom he had shot, and not the unfortunate gentleman who had fallen a victim to his murderous attack. Her Majesty, upon this circumstance being related to her, is said to have evinced much emotion.

WINDSOR, Monday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards went out shooting in the royal preserves in the Great Park. The royal party had excellent sport. Sir Henry Wheatley arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked out in the pleasure-grounds. Earl and Countess Delaware and the Ladies Elizabeth and Mary West, and Sir H. Wheatley took their departure. Archdeacon Wilberforce also left. Lord and Lady Cremorne, and Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt joined the royal dinner party.

WINDSOR, Wednesday.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out shooting in the royal preserves in the neighbourhood of Cumberland Lodge, and had excellent sport. At a quarter of an o'clock her Majesty held a Privy Council. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Jersey, Lord Stanley, Sir H. Hardinge, the Earl Delawarr, and the Hon. W. Bathurst, took their departure from Windsor Castle for Slough, and left that station soon after four o'clock for the Paddington Terminus, the train conveying the party in twenty-three minutes.

The Duke of Wellington, Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earls of Haddington and Jersey, Lord Stanley, Sir H. Hardinge, and the Right Hon. W. Gladstone went from town to attend the Council by a special train on the Great Western Railway.

After the Council the same Ministers and Officers of State, together with the Earl Delawarr and the Hon. W. Bathurst, took their departure from Windsor Castle for Slough, and left that station soon after four o'clock for the Paddington Terminus, the train conveying the party in twenty-three minutes.

State Parliamentary dinners were given on Wednesday evening by the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, at their respective residences; by the former to a numerous party of peers, and by the latter to a large party of members of the House of Commons. At both banquets the guests appeared in court dress, the members of Orders of Knighthood wearing their respective ensigns. His grace and the right hon. baronet read the royal speech to their visitors during the evening. At the Duke of Wellington's were present—The Lord Chancellor; Dukes of Cleveland, Beaufort, Buckingham, and Buccleuch; Marquises of Bute, Salisbury, Exeter, and Abercorn; Earls of Liverpool, Delawarr, Devon, Eglinton, Powis, Cardigan, Clare, Wicklow, Bathurst, Shaftesbury, Verulam, Talbot, Rodeo, Hoseliyn, Clanwilliam, Wilton, Harrowby, Haddington, Brownlow, and Ripon; Viscounts Sydney, Strangford, and Beresford; Lords Abinger, De Ros, Redesdale, Maryborough, Forester, Wharncliffe, Heytesbury, Ashburton, &c. The invites to Sir R. Peel's dinner included—The Speaker of the House of Commons, Lord Courtenay and Mr. P. W. S. Miles; Earl Jermyn; Lords Eliot, Ernest Bruce, Howard of Samond, and Stanley; Right Honourables G. Dawson Damer, J. Nicholl, Sir Edward Knatchbull, W. E. Gladstone, H. Goulburn, Sir Henry Hardinge, H. Lowry Corry, and Sir James Graham; Hon. Sidney Herbert, Hon. Captain A. Dejcombe, the Attorney General, the Solicitor-General, Sir Frederick Trench, Sir Thomas Fremantle, Sir George Clerk, Colonel Peel, Captain Bodero, Mr. Greene, Captain Meynell, Mr. G. W. Hope, Mr. A. Pringle, and Mr. Bingham Baring.

Admiral Sir George Cockburn is going on favourably, but it is not expected that he will be able to resume his parliamentary duties during the approaching session; and, in the opinion of his medical attendants, some weeks will elapse before he can transact his official duties at the Admiralty.

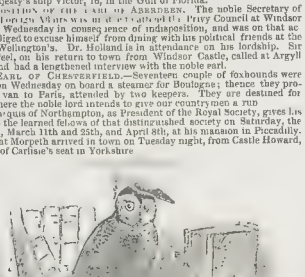
Admiral Sir Robert and Lady Otway have been plunged into deep affliction by the supposed loss of their son, Commander Charles Cooke Otway, of her Majesty's ship Victor, 16, in the Gulf of Florida.

INDISPOSITION OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The noble Secretary of the Foreign Office was in attendance at the Privy Council at Windsor Castle on Wednesday in consequence of indisposition, and was on that account obliged to excuse himself from dining with his political friends at the Duke of Wellington's. Dr. Holland is in attendance on his lordship. Sir Robert Peel, on his return to town from Windsor Castle, called at Argyll House, and had a lengthened interview with the noble earl.

THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.—Seventeen couple of foxhounds were shipped on Wednesday on board a steamer for Boulogne; thence they proceed in a van to Paris, attended by two keepers. They are destined for Rome, where the noble lord intends to enjoy our countrymen a run.

The Marquis of Northampton, as President of the Royal Society, gives his annual to the learned fellows of that distinguished society on Saturday, the 18th inst., March 18th and 25th, and April 8th, at his mansion in Piccadilly.

Viscount Morpeth arrived in town on Tuesday night, from Castle Howard, the Earl of Carlisle's seat in Yorkshire.



THE UNIVERSITIES.

CAMBRIDGE.—REGIUS PROFESSORSHIP OF DIVINITY.—The election to the above distinguished office took place on Wednesday, when Dr. Gilliart was chosen by just the requisite number of votes, viz.—The Provost of King's, the Master of St. John's, the Master of Christ's, and Mr. John Brown. For Dr. Worsiwoith are understood to have voted—The President of Queen's, and Mr. G. A. Browne, and for Dr. Mill—The Vice-Chancellor, Professor Whewell.

An exhibition has just been founded in St. John's College, which will tend to the encouragement of classical learning amongst the junior members of the university. It is termed "The St. John Post Latin Exhibition," value £50 per annum, and open to freshmen. The examinations of candidates are to take place annually, one in Michaelmas term. The first examination for an exhibition on this foundation is to take place in November next.

COUNTRY NEWS.

LEEDS.—SHOCKING CASE OF MURDER AND MUTILATION.—It is with the greatest possible reluctance we feel ourselves compelled to give insertion to the following disgusting and horrifying details of a deed of blood, which has just occurred at Leeds, and which fully equals in atrocity and hellish instigation the abominable cruelties perpetrated by Gouldand Greenacre. On Sunday last, the headless and limbless body of a human being was found floating in the Knostrop Cut of the Aire and Calder Navigation, within about 50 yards of the lock on that cut known by the name of the Red Dick Lock, and within a few yards of the Thorpe Willows Coal Baths, belonging to the Thorpe-hall Colliery, the property of Messrs. Fenton and Leather. The body had been seen on the previous day by some men who were loading a vessel with coals at the staith, but they took it to be the remains of a dog or a pig, or some other animal, and let it remain without touching it or at all examining it. On Sunday it was floating with its back upwards, and then at once it was seen to be the trunk of a human being. It was got to shore by a policeman and two young men, who were walking on the bank of the cut or canal, who first really saw that it was a large portion of the body of either a man or a woman. On being got to shore it was found that the body was dreadfully scorched and burnt; that the head with the neck had been cut off, the right arm cut and separated by the shoulder joint, and that the left arm had been partially cut and severed. Both the legs had also been either cut, burnt or sawed off, and the body itself cut across just below the ribs, taking away the lower portion of the abdomen. Indeed, the whole of the body, except from the shoulders to the lower ribs, had been removed. The front part of the trunk or the upper portion, was burnt in a most shocking manner, both the breasts being completely burnt off, so that there was only a piece of shrivelled matter on each side where the breasts had been. The front of the abdomen had also been burnt away, and the heart, the lungs, and the other viscera had been entirely removed. From the horrible appearance of the back of the body medical men have judged it to be that of a female. How, or by what means the individual has come to her death, what her name is, where she comes from, or how long the body had been in the water before it was got out, are as yet mysteries. There is little doubt but a most foul and barbarous murder has been committed, but there is no report of any female having been missing from Leeds or the neighbourhood, and no opinion can be formed on the subject, but that a woman, apparently between 20 and 30 years of age, has been deprived of life, and the perpetrator or perpetrators of the atrocious deed have severed the limbs and the head off, and destroyed them, probably by fire, and tried also to burn the body, but not having succeeded in the latter part of the infernal crime the body has been thrown into the place where it was discovered. Search has been made in the canal for the other portions of the body, but nothing has been discovered. The place where the body was found is about a mile from the centre of Leeds, and is within the borough.

MANCHESTER.—EXTENSIVE FIRE.—On Saturday night last an alarming fire broke out in the extensive pile of buildings situate in Norfolk-street, close to the Post-office. The building was erected in 1836, a portion of which is in Brown-street, Norfolk-street, and Essex-street. It is in the form of the letter L, was six stories high, and occupied as warehouses by Messrs. Clayton and Gladstone, commission-agents; Messrs. Ackard and Co., general merchants; John Hayhurst, merchant; Andrew Hall, manufacturer and spinner; and Lowe and Law, yarn dealers. The warehouses, at the time of the conflagration, were crowded to the ceiling with calicos, yarns, counterpanes, damasks, &c. The fire originated on the second floor, in Messrs. Clayton and Gladstone's warehouse. In a short time after the alarm was given Mr. Rose was in attendance with five engines and a strong body of firemen. The most of the Manchester borough police were also soon on the spot, and rendered efficient service in removing books and property, as well as keeping off the crowds which were attracted towards the scene of destruction. By eleven o'clock the flames had so far progressed as to leave little hopes of preserving the building, which, about one o'clock, was one mass of lurid blaze. The flames having reached the upper part of the building, where the goods were of a more inflammatory nature raged with great fury, and about half-past eleven the whole roof was on fire, and shortly fell in with a tremendous crash, carrying with it two of the upper floors. The damage done cannot be estimated at less than £250,000, including the building. The whole of the losses, we understand, will be covered by insurances. We are happy to state that no lives have been sacrificed, although much danger is apprehended from the falling in of the walls.

SHEFFIELD.—The following statement of the affairs of Messrs. Parker and Co., of Sheffield, has been laid before the creditors. Previous to their bankruptcy, the assets in available securities and good debts were estimated at 70 to 80 per cent, but under existing circumstances it is impossible to form a correct estimate as to the probable dividend. The total amount of their debts is £620,244, including £150,958 due to the partners. The principal assets are, in current accounts, £424,052; bills and cash, £39,431; estate of Mr. Brown, £36,836; the doubtful debts amount to £165,192. The private estate of Mr. Parker is valued at £120,000 to £130,000, chargeable with a debt due by the bank of £37,000, being part of the above £150,958, and a settlement of £22,000; the remainder is available to the estate. Two items, forming part of the bad debts, are £6,289 due by a former partner, and £29,790 by his son. However, the prospects on the whole are rather more satisfactory than was anticipated on the stoppage of the Bank.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SUDDEN DEATH OF G. A. MUSKETT, ESQ.—On Tuesday morning George Alfred Muskett, Esq., the banker, of St. Alban's, and formerly member for that borough, fell down in a fit of apoplexy and immediately expired. Mr. Muskett had just arrived in town from Rickmansworth. We understand that the deceased gentleman leaves two amiable daughters to lament the catastrophe, which occurred at the residence of his brother, Major Muskett.

The Rev. Mr. Bailey, the particulars of whose case have already fully appeared in this paper, was on Wednesday last put on his trial at the Central Criminal Court, for feloniously forging on the 9th of September, 1841, at the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, a certain promissory note for the payment of £2875, with intent to defraud Robert Smith, since deceased; in a second count the offence was alleged to have been committed with intent to defraud Mr. James Smith; other counts charged the prisoner with uttering and putting off the note in question. The trial lasted until 10 o'clock at night, when the jury returned a verdict of guilty of uttering only. Mr. Jones then applied to have the sentence postponed till next morning, in order to give Mr. Clarkson an opportunity to move in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the evidence of uttering was insufficient. Mr. Humfrey opposed the application, and Mr. Justice Williams said, if there were any ground for such an application the learned counsel might make it hereafter. The learned Judge then proceeded to pass sentence, and said it was his unwelcome duty—unwelcome he could with great truth say, to pass the sentence of the law upon a man in such an elevated station in life, and, from what he had heard, of great talents, and one capable of conducting himself with propriety a man whose example, either one way or the other, we looked to and followed by those in an inferior station: to pass sentence upon a man, after the verdict which had been pronounced by the jury, and which to his mind was perfectly satisfactory, was most painful. He (the learned judge) would not insult his feelings by any unnecessary remarks, for the situation in which he stood must be to him most poignant and degrading. It was, however, his duty to show that all mankind in such a situation must be alike equal, an I subject to the same punishment, but, in proportion as there was knowledge, the greater was the enormity of the offence in the prisoner committing crime. It only remained for him to pass the sentence of the Court upon the prisoner, which was that he be transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life. The prisoner, who had conducted himself with the greatest composure throughout the trial, was totally unmoved when he heard the sentence, but bowed respectfully to the Court, and was removed from the bar.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Tuesday morning, about six o'clock, an alarming fire was discovered by the policeman on duty to be raging in the parlours of the house, No. 5, Somerset street, Manchester-square, in the occupation of Madame Serinett Le Miner, a French lady of fortune. An alarm was immediately raised, and the inmates having effected their escape the fire was fortunately confined to the rooms before mentioned; the loss, however was considerable, as the whole of the furniture, paintings, &c., therein were entirely consumed. The property was insured.—On same night at ten o'clock, another fire broke out on the premises in the occupancy of Messrs. Thompson, machine-rulers and vellum-account-book-manufacturers, situate at 122, Old-street, St. Luke's. A plentiful supply of water was obtained from the different fire-plugs belonging to the New River Company, from which the engines were worked; and after one hour's unremitting exertions on the part of the firemen, the fire was confined to the premises in which it originated.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

An Irish landlord has just issued an edict to his tenantry against improvident marriages, in which he threatens with expulsion all persons on his estate who allow their children to marry before a certain age.——The wonderful feats of arnicalal light by which such extraordinary effects are now every night produced at the Royal Adelaide Gallery was first discovered by the celebrated Tom Steele, who delights in styling himself O'Connell's head pacificator. (Is it owing to this gentleman's influence that nothing is heard now-a-days of the O'Connell tail?)——The Morning Chronicle, in reference to the intriguing policy of Russia in the East, declares that that power is merely repeating her old game of fomenting troubles and seditions, in order that sooner or later she may be called in to settle them.——An important decision has just been given by the Master of the Rolls in the case of the Attorney-General and the Grocers' Company of London, by which it is decreed that out of a certain amount of property left in the hands of trustees, to endow a school and hospital, no payments beyond those originally fixed by the founder's will are to be made, although the property has since increased immensely in value. In reference to this decision the correspondent of a morning paper shrewdly observes, "that, however excellent turtle, and venison, and green water frolics may be in their way, education, based on religious instruction, is influenced by a different standard, to say nothing of the maintenance of the aged and indigent in their destitute."——By the accidental omission of a 0 in our statement of the amount of expense for labour saved to the company by the explosion on the South Eastern Railway at Dover the sum was stated at £1000 instead of £10,000.——The present condition of the Southampton Docks appears to be the source of much dissatisfaction to the shareholders, who held a public meeting at the George and Vulture Tavern, Cornhill, on Monday last, for the purpose of protesting against the proceedings of the directors. No definite course, however, was adopted on the occasion.——The operation of the income-tax continues to be attended by the most disagreeable results throughout the metropolitan districts. In the east end particularly the commissioners find they have not got a sinecure, as the appellants are for the most part Jews, who are not disposed to submit to the surcharge with anything like amiability of temper.——By a recent decision of the Court of Session the claims of the Rev. The flowers, &c., in the gardens round Lee and Lewisham have an appearance of forwardness truly surprising.——The latest humbug invented—and the one which appears now most in vogue—is the forgery of ancient coins, which has been carried to a most incredible extent throughout the country. Some of these ingenious forgeries, it is stated, have on more than one occasion furnished lengthened disquisitions for that peculiar section of the British Association to which the examination of these matters is assigned. A-propos, we observe that the Earl of Rosse has intimated that the next general meeting of this association will be held at Cork, in the month of August, when it is expected that the geological section will finally determine the moisture and dryness, volatility, fixity, corrosiveness, and corruptibility of the Blarney stone. Mr. O'Connell and the Rev. Mortimer O'Sullivan are said to have contributed two learned papers on the subject.——William Connell, who stands charged with attempting to kill by shooting at Mrs. Magnus, the barwoman of the Auction Mart Tavern, has been again remanded, in order to enable the prosecutrix to give evidence.——The Shrewsbury News contains a very sensible account of the death of a poor working man named Pugh, at Welshpool, whose clothes took fire whilst in a state of inebriety, by which he was burned to death in a shocking and revolting manner.——An investigation is at present on foot relative to the purloining of a valuable portion of Earl Fitzwilliam's jewels (some of which were heirlooms in the family) from Milton House. Suspicion attaches, it appears, to some of his lordship's domestics, and one of them, a female, is at present in custody in the Peterborough House of Correction.——The Government Police Gazette of Monday night contains no fewer than ten notices of burglary and housebreaking occurring in the provinces within the past week. In each case the property taken was valuable.——It is positively announced that Mr. David Pollock has received the appointment of Commissioner of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, vacant by the decease of his lamented Mr. Bowen.——In the Court of Chancery, on Tuesday last, Mr. Cobbett, son of the late eminent writer and political economist, applied to discharge an order pronounced by the Lord Chancellor in December last, refusing, with costs, an application for his discharge, he being a prisoner in the Queen's Bench for contempt in not putting in his answer, and also in consequence of not paying certain costs he had been ordered to discharge. The Lord Chancellor again refused the prayer of the petitioner, who left the court in the custody of the tipstaff.——In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Tuesday, an application was made for a criminal information against a Liverpool attorney, named Laine, for writing a threatening letter tending to lead to a breach of the peace; but the court indignantly refused it, declining at once to interfere in what Lord Denman emphatically characterized as low and paltry squabbles.——On Tuesday last a woman named Prentice underwent a private examination before the magistrates, on a charge of being found in the stores of Windsor Castle with a felonious intent. It appeared that the prisoner entered the premises in question (in which he had no business) by means of a skeleton key. He was fully committed for trial.——At the meeting of commissioners of sewers, on Tuesday, Sir Peter Laurie gave notice of a motion, "That in the opinion of this court the wood pavement in the Poultry is dangerous and inconvenient to the public, and ought to be taken up and replaced by granite pavement."——We are glad to intimate that trade has somewhat improved in Paisley during the last week. It only half the attention were bestowed to the improved accommodation of the public, as is apparently the case with the animosities of rivalry, it would be much better for all parties.——The crime of sheep-stealing, it appears, is greatly on the increase in the metropolitan counties.——The "pairing off" system, which is one of the most objectionable in many points of view that could be tolerated, has already commenced for the season, as appears by the following announcements:—"Mr. O'Brien, M.P. for Clare, has paired off with Mr. Kirk, M.P. for Carrickfergus, until the 15th of March; and Mr. Philip Howard, M.P. for Carlisle, has paired off with Mr. Hope Johnstone, M.P. for Dumfriesshire, until the 6th of March."——It is rumoured that the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson, Sir R. Peel's brother-in-law, is about to be appointed Chairman of the Board of Customs.——A dreadful accident occurred to a distinguished member of the Puckeridge hunt (Mr. Hobson) whilst out with the hounds on Saturday last, by which he sustained such extensive injury of the spine, that no hopes are entertained of his recovery.——William Mepham, who was convicted at the West Kent Quarter sessions in 1841, and sentenced to 15 years' transportation for an aggravated assault, has been recommended to her Majesty by the Secretary of State for a free pardon: since Mepham's departure, a man named Wells has confessed himself the real delinquent.——We regret to hear that Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Troubridge is labouring under severe indisposition at Paris, arising from an attack of paralysis.——The Bishop of Chichester is nearly recovered from the indisposition which has confined his lordship to the palace for some weeks.

Lord Seaton is said to have been appointed Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands in succession to Sir Howard Douglas.

On Wednesday the mortal remains of Richard Gregory, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Middlesex, but better known as the potato-salesman in Spitalfields market, were consigned to their last resting place in the family vault of Christ Church, Spitalfields, burial ground, in the presence of several thousand persons. In the course of a few years he became the first in the trade, and realised an ample fortune.

GUIZOT AND THE LONDON PRESS.—Most of the opposition journals (says Galignani), alluding to the articles in the London papers on M. Guizot and his colleagues, approving of the conduct which they have observed on the right of search question, seem to consider the mere fact of their being praised by the English as sufficient to condemn them in the opinion of the French nation. Some of our contemporaries do not hesitate to assert that there is a confederacy between the editors of the London press and M. Guizot against national feeling in France. If a Paris letter appear in a London paper, the correspondent is said to be in the pay of the French Ministry; and if M. Guizot happen to take in the Chamber the same view of the obligations of the treaties of 1831 and 1833 as a London editor had done at almost the same period, M. Guizot is charged with having sent beforehand to the English papers the speech which he intended to deliver in Parliament.

THE QUORN HOUNDS.—These hounds continue to afford brilliant sport, and to attract all the élite of the beau monde to Leicestershire. Never could it boast a greater assemblage of distinguée chasseurs than at the present moment; voilà, par exemple, the meet at Kilby Wharf on Monday, the 23rd ult., included Lords Cardigan, Wilton, Gardner, Maidstone, Beresford, Macdonald, Curzon, the Marquis of Hastings, Count Batthyany, Sir W. W. Wynn, Sir W. M. Stanley, Sir W. W. Dixie, and an immense "field" besides of celebrated hands. There never is a disappointment with these hounds—they always do something good and promise something better.

The Journal de l'Arrondissement du Havre relates that M. Lesueur, the naturalist, some time ago, had discovered part of the fossil bones of an enormous antediluvian animal, supposed to be those of the ichthyosaurus. Conceiving that the rest of the bones lay imbedded at no great distance, and might be exposed by the effects of the late storms, he went out on Wednesday week, with his nephew, M. Berryer, to explore the coast. They came upon a bed of oyster-shells, laid bare by the shingle being washed away. Here they found a complete chain of vertebræ held united by petrifaction, together with large portions of the ribs, and an enormous skull, 2 feet 10 inches in length, and 8½ inches in width, very strongly resembling the ichthyosaurus. On the day before they had discovered, at a short distance from the same spot, twelve of the vertebræ of the tail of an animal of the like proportions. It required the strength of four men to carry these remains to St. Adresse, where they are for the present deposited.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert did not take their accustomed walking exercise in consequence of the wet state of the weather. His Royal Highness Prince Albert took his equestrian exercise in the Riding School, attended by Colonel Wylde.

THE LORDS' ADDRESS.—The Lords' Address to her Majesty, in answer to her most gracious speech on the opening of Parliament, will be laid before her Majesty by the Lord Great Chamberlain, and an answer returned by the Queen on Monday next, which will be communicated to the House of Lords by the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of the Household. When the Sovereign is not in town, and does not open the sessions in person, it is not usual for either house to go in procession to present the Address in answer to the Royal Speech.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex has intimated his intention of standing sponsor in person to the infant son and heir of Lord John Russell.

FIRE AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.—Thursday afternoon the soot of a flue connected with the kitchen chimney of the Foreign Office became ignited, the intense heat from which had caused an iron hot cupboard, or closet, in which refreshments for the clerks are warmed, to be nearly red-hot, by which means the girders of the ground-floor had been set on fire. The firemen, assisted by a body of workmen under the direction of the government clerk of the works, immediately set to work in ripping up the flooring, by which means they succeeded, in about two hours, in allaying all cause for any further alarm, although, as a precautionary measure, some of the firemen were directed to remain at the Foreign Office during the night. Earl Lincoln, and several other noblemen and gentlemen connected with the government offices, were present shortly after the fire was discovered, and remained until it was extinguished.

MORE SHIPWRECKS AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The subjoined intelligence relating to the total loss of several vessels, attended, we regret to add, with lamentable sacrifice of human life, was in the course of Wednesday and Thursday posted upon the books at Lloyd's:—"Wreck of the Douro of Liverpool.—All hands lost.—This vessel, registered as 400 tons burthen, with a valuable cargo on board, was totally lost, with all her crew, on the night of Thursday last, the 26th of January, upon the rocks at the westward of the Scilly islands. At an early hour on the following morning the illfated vessel was discovered by some fishermen, with her masts gone, and thrown on the rocks upon her broadside, with the sea making a complete breach over her. They immediately bore down to the spot, but there was no one on board to give them the slightest information, every soul belonging to her had perished. On the same day four bodies were washed up on the beach, which have been proved to be belonging to the vessel. One of them is supposed to be her unfortunate commander, Mr. Gowland, and the others his seamen. They have since been decently interred at St. Mary's. The rock upon which the vessel struck is called the Crebistahan, and it stands about a mile from the beach. The vessel is reported to be fully insured."

DESTRUCTION OF A VESSEL BY FIRE.—Accounts were received on Thursday of the total loss by fire of the French brig the Tris Angelique, Captain Henry, loaded with a general cargo, while on her passage from Rouen for Marseilles. Her destruction occurred on the night of the 6th of November last, and arose through a barrel of vitriol being left on the forecastle, which flowed into the hold and set fire to the cargo. For hours the flames raged with fearful violence, baffling all attempts made by the crew to subdue it, who at length were compelled to take to the boats and leave the vessel. During the night the glare from the flames attracted the attention of those in charge of the English ship the Countess of London, who instantly altered the course of the ship, and bore down to her assistance. Fortunately, they soon came up with the crew of the unfortunate vessel, whom they took on board and kindly treated. The brig burnt fu-riously until one o'clock the next morning, the 7th, when she dis appeared in 40 fathoms water. It is unknown whether the owners are insured to the amount of her loss.

COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL AND SINKING OF A VESSEL.—Early on Monday morning last a collision took place in the Channel, near the Needles, which very nearly was attended with dreadful loss of life. The Papenburgh galliot, Napoleon, while under full sail, the wind blowing a strong gale from the westward, in making through the Channel, was run into by a vessel unknown, coming from the opposite direction. Such was the violent force with which the vessel struck that the master and crew had scarcely time to push into their boats before the ship went down in deep water. They were afterwards picked up by the American barque, Henry Shelton, and landed safely at Dartmouth.

At Yarmouth, on Friday week, a brig called the Ann, in making the river, struck on the Barnard Sands and sunk. All hands, we regret to say, perished with her.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

By recent American papers, it appears that a correspondence has taken place between certain agents of the Hawaian or Sandwich Islands, and the Secretary of State, which has been communicated to Congress by the President. The message states that the condition of these islands has excited a good deal of interest, from the progress of the inhabitants in civilization, and their becoming more and more competent to maintain regular and orderly civil government. "They lie in the Pacific, much nearer to this continent (America) than to Europe, and have become an important place for the refitment and provisioning of American and European vessels." Owing to their locality, and to the course of winds which prevail in this quarter of the world, the Sandwich Islands are the stopping-place for almost all the vessels passing from continent to continent, across the Pacific Ocean. They are especially resorted to by a great number of American whaling and other vessels; and the property owned by citizens of the United States, to be found in these islands, is very considerable. The message then glances at the feeble state of the government of the Sandwich Islands, its just and pacific disposition, and its anxiety in the march of civilization and improvement. Hence, the American government proposes to respect this rising community, and strictly and conscientiously to regard their rights; lest any other power should take possession of the islands, colonize them, and subvert the native government. Meanwhile, the message declares that the United States seek no peculiar advantages or control over the Hawaian government, but fully recognizes its independence, and proposes to appoint a Consul resident in the islands. On this account, we present our readers with the annexed resumé of this interesting cluster, the civilization of which has been already so materially advanced by British influence.

These islands, it is well known, were discovered some 65 years since by Captain Cook, who named them in honour of Earl Sandwich, then First Lord of the Admiralty. About eight years afterwards they were visited by La Perouse, and merchantmen have followed from time to time the same track, so that a frequent and rather confidential intercourse has been established between foreigners and the islanders, from the discovery of their sea-girt homes by Europeans.

The Sandwich Islands lie between the parallels of 18 deg. 24 min. and 22 deg. 15 min. north, extending in longitude from 154 deg. 56 min. to 160 deg. 23 min. west. Their number is usually limited to ten; and the names by which, according to the latest orthography, they are known among the natives, are Hawaii (Owhyhee), Oahu, Mani, Tmai, Morokai, Ranai, Morokini, Nihau, Taura, and Tahurawe. They are distant about 2800 miles from Mexico on the east, 5000 from the shores of China on the west, 2700 from the Society Islands on the south, and 1500 from the Marquesas.

Owhyhee, the most southern and largest of the whole, is about 97 miles long, 78 broad, and was supposed, when first discovered by the English, to contain 85,000 inhabitants. Woahoo is 46 miles in length, and 23 in breadth, with a population of about 20,000. Towee, situated 75 miles north-west from the latter, is somewhat smaller in dimensions, and is supposed to possess only 10,000 residents. Mowee is 48 miles long and 30 broad, with 20,000 inhabitants. The others are of less importance.

Cook found the four principal islands of the Sandwich group governed by as many independent kings, who frequently made war on each other; but about the year 1782 Tamehameha, a chief of inferior rank, rose against his lawful prince, and, by his superior talents, acquired possession of the whole cluster; the king was slain, and the victor married his captive daughter. Before 1792, when Vancouver touched here, several of the chiefs, availing themselves of the opportunity offered to them by English and American ships, had made voyages to distant parts, and many had resided for a short time in the United States. Thus the people had become sensible of the advantages of a mercantile navy and of fire-arms, and Europeans had furnished them with muskets and ammunition, and taught them the use of artillery and fortification. Many of the chiefs had already built houses of stone, adopted, in part, the European dress, and engrafted English terms on their own scanty vocabulary. Vancouver left them a breed of cattle and sheep, so that the country is now well stocked with both, and can supply ships. Fruits and esculent plants had also been introduced. Tamehameha, however, thought it prudent to place himself under the protection of the English, as he already suspected the Americans and Russians to be desirous of forming settlements on the islands, although he opened intercourse with traders of every class. Sandal-wood, of great value, was found in the mountains; in return for which the natives were at first satisfied with pieces of iron, nails, and coarse cloth; but they soon required axes, guns, muskets, powder and shot; Chinese, American, and British manufactures; and schooners and brigs, measuring several hundred tons. Meanwhile, George the Third assured Tamehameha of his friendship, and presented him with a ship built at Port Jackson. In the true spirit of a reformer Tamehameha soon alienated his mind from all reliance on the ancient gods of Owhyhee, and showed an earnest desire to know the principles of faith professed by more civilized nations; but it was not until the reign of his successor, Tamehameha II., that, through some American missionaries, the idols of Owhyhee were destroyed, or, like the specimen now to be seen in the court-yard of the British Museum, regarded as curiosities.

NATIVE OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.]

The visit of Tamehameha and his consort to England in 1824 was made with the idea that a personal interview with the English monarch might still more effectually secure his protection, and even aid him in his plan for advancing his people in learning and true religion. But the poor island King and Queen died of measles without conferring with George IV.; but their official attendants were graciously received at Windsor, and our Sovereign promised protection to their government against all foreign designs. It will be remembered that the remains of Tamehameha and his Queen were conveyed to the Sandwich Islands in the Blonde frigate, and Lord Byron, the commander, observes, "perhaps the perfect faith reposed in the English by the people of the islands is the strongest proof that ever could be given by a whole nation of simple-mindedness and freedom from guile. There was not a moment's irritation—not a moment's suspicion that unfair means had been used to shorten their days; and we were received as brothers who would sympathise with their grief, and as friends who would be glad to heal their wounds." It may here be mentioned that so far from Tamehameha and his Queen being addicted to gluttony and drunkenness, as was reported during their stay in London, they ate little or no butchers' meat, but lived chiefly on poultry, fruit, and vegetables, and their favourite beverage was some cider presented to them by Mr. Canning. The charge for their table at Osborne's Hotel averaged but 17s. a head per day.

When Captain Beechey visited Woahoo he found a town of wooden houses, laid out in streets and squares, with such economical announcements as, "An ordinary at 1 o'clock," "Billiards," "The Britannia," "The Jolly Tar," &c. There were two hotels, with billiard-rooms; wines and other luxuries were to be had; the chiefs' houses were furnished with tables and chairs; and one of the ministers presented the King with a service of plate, and had in use another service of beautifully cut glass, of London manufacture. The King was attended by a guard and sentinels at his palace; the ramparts mounted forty guns, and troops paraded the ramparts, and 5000 stand of arms were in the island. The harbour was crowded with foreign vessels, and the Government had received consuls from Great Britain and America; and where only the naked savage was lately seen, the clothing of a cultivated people was now worn.

An occurrence during Lord Byron's visit now becomes interesting, in connexion with the projected American protection already noticed. When Lord Byron was asked if King George had any objection to the American missionaries in the islands, he replied certainly not, so long as they did not meddle with the laws or commerce of the country; and one of the leading missionaries disclaimed all intention of interfering in political or commercial concerns. The American preachers have, however, been suspected of some jealousy in regard to the Russians and English. Kotzebue, Byron, and Beechey doubtless considered them more active than enough in matters not strictly comprehended in their spiritual duties. The progress in religion was not so great as could be wished, although in Honorora almost every person might be seen hastening to school with a slate in his hand, hoping soon to be able to transcribe some part of the Scriptures; but the education being made compulsory soon defeated its object.

In 1827, however, Tamehameha III. and his chief passed penal statutes against murder, adultery, theft, gambling, drunkenness, and profanation of the Sabbath. In 1829 domestic comforts had been so multiplied, that in the royal residence there were carpets, crimson draperies, handsome pier tables, and large mirrors, glass chandeliers, lustres, and bronze candelabra. Tamehameha had grown up a fine stout lad, as graceful, well bred, and gentlemanly as any lad of his age in the most polished circles of Europe. Nor was this improvement confined to the court, for Mr. Stewart the missionary, in 1830, describes the sitting-room of a lady convert to the gospel comparatively as well furnished as the palace, the principal article being an elegant writing-table, with papers and books in the language of the country. The king is described as wearing his rich Windsor uniform, and his sister a superb dress, on the opening of a large meeting-house, built by order of Government; and, up to the present day, the progress of our missionaries has been a course of fair encouragement.

The Sandwich Islanders are tall and robust. Compared with the Otaheitans, they are of a dark brown complexion, and the females do not display the same softened graces. But they are distinguished above all other inhabitants of the South Sea by their industry and skill. They have improved almost every spot susceptible of cultivation: in manufactures, canoe-building, and fishery they alike excel. Their general conduct is open, honourable, and friendly; yet they are easily kindled to fierce resentment, especially by any wrong against their chiefs, such as led to the death of Cook.

The natural aspect of these islands is grand and awful. The mountains of Monna Roa and Mouna Koa rise comparatively to an alpine height, and are perpetually capped with snow: both are volcanic, and Reli, on the flank of Monna Roa, is the most terrific and varied volcano in the world: it is 1000 feet deep and six miles in circuit, and in 1840 it threw up lava 50 or 60 feet high: the light was seen 100 miles off, and "Vesuvius is a fool to it!"

Reverting to the local position of the Sandwich Isles, it, doubtless, renders them highly important to all the great trading communities of either hemisphere. "On the north are the Russian settlements, along the coast of their Asiatic territories; towards the north-west are the dominions of Japan; due west are the Marian Islands, the Philippines, and Canton; and on the east are California and Mexico. The establishment of the independent States of South America has of late greatly increased their value as an emporium for the commerce of that remote section of the globe, as they lie in the very track pursued by vessels passing thence to China or Calcutta. They are visited, too, by those who trade in furs in the countries bordering on Nootka Sound, as well as by the whalers, who, having found the sperm whale on the coast of Japan, annually frequent the Northern Pacific."—(Polynesia, by Dr. Russell, just published.) By thus glancing at the position of the Sandwich group, the reader may "guess" the motive of the American Government in its protective anxiety for the independence of the islanders.

THE MARQUESAS ISLANDERS.

These new subjects, or allies, of Louis Philippe are graphically sketched by a correspondent of the Times, who says, as we before quoted, "Having lately smoked a cigar with his naked Majesty King Yutete, who is a fat, good-natured savage, lolling all day under a shady tree in Resolution Bay, and having visited the entire group of islands, I can assure you and your French readers, that as to soil, harbours, situation, and appropriateness for either occupation or emigration, the Marquesas are the most worthless cluster of islands in the Pacific Ocean; and, so far from whalers and other ships being able to procure supplies of hogs, fruit, and vegetables, the scanty inhabitants can hardly maintain themselves.

Contrary, however, to the expectations of this recent visitor to the Marquesas, the French King intends "to throw away money on the settlement;" as a recent number of the Journal des Débats publishes the following extract from a despatch addressed by the Minister of Marine to the Maritime Prefect of Brest:—"The intention of his Majesty is, that the garrison of the Marquesas Islands should be provisionally composed of a battalion of Marine Artillery, a company of Artillery, and a detachment of the sixth company of Sappers and Miners. There are already stationed in those islands two companies of the 3rd Regiment, a detachment of 21 Artillerymen, and a detachment of the first company of Sappers and Miners. I recommend you particularly to take precautions that all the men to be embarked on this expedition should be carefully examined by the chief surgeons of their regiments, in order that it be ascertained that they enjoy good health, that they have been vaccinated, and that their mouths be sound. You will replace those who are unfit for service. Each man, on being embarked, is to be provided with a hammock, mattress, bolster, and woollen blanket. You will likewise supply the troops with a sufficient number of cooking apparatus, as well as implements of husbandry. You will take care that a supply of clothing sufficient for 18 months be embarked with the expedition. It will be likewise necessary to embark 100 iron bedsteads, mattresses, pillows, sheets, and blankets, for the use of the sick in the colony." As the Marquesas are to be the scene of the last French colonization farce, we give from the best authority sketches of the natives—fine muscular fellows, but miserably ignorant. The group displays their gods, with two figures holding out, as peace offerings to their Gallican friends, the staple produce of their country—pigs and yats. Long may Louis Philippe live to reign over his new subjects!

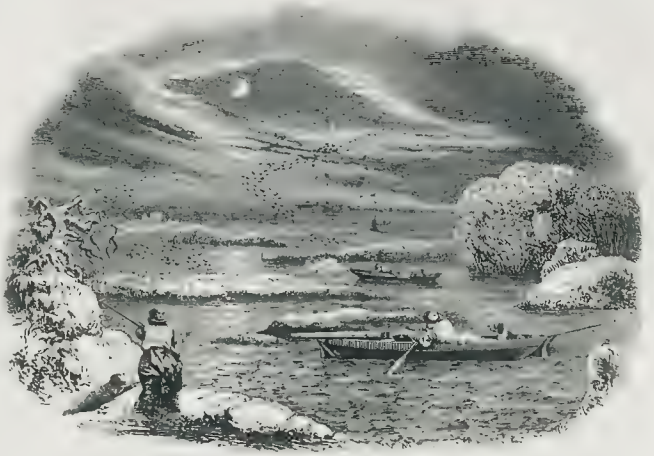
THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS—No. XXVI.

NEW CHURCH, BROADWAY, WESTMINSTER.

Amid the dirt and bustle of the Broadway, Westminster, surrounded by poverty in all its shapes, and enclosed by sheds, hovels, and gin-palaces, another new church is uprearing its head. It occupies the site of an old chapel, founded in the time of Charles I., and will as much surpass its predecessor in size and architectural display as the neighbourhood now exceeds its olden amount of houses and population.

The style selected is Gothic, of the later period of early English. The tower is placed at the north side of the west end of the church—the object in thus locating it being to avoid that stiff formality so disagreeably prominent in many of our modern churches, and to prevent the comparison which, had it been placed, as usual, exactly at the west end, would have forced itself upon the mind, of disproportion between the size and height of the tower and spire and the body of the church. The exterior of the building is stone, and the arches and mouldings of the interior will be of the same material. The fourteen columns which support the roof and divide the nave from the side aisles are of iron. The dimensions of the interior are 94 feet long by 50 feet in width, without including the small chancel at the east end, which is separated from the body of the building by a moulded arch and clustered columns, and is approached by an ascent of several steps. There will be no pews, and the galleries will be appropriated exclusively to the use of the children of the national and parish schools. The first stone was laid the 30th of May, 1842; the amount of contract, with incidental expenses and architect's commission, is £6116 13s. 4d., the architect's estimate being £7893 4s. 11d. The total church accommodation is for 1500 persons, of which number 1200 are to be free seats. The building was arranged to be completed in December of the present year; but, although the roof is just being completed over the body of the church, the tower is little more than commenced. The united height of the tower and spire will be two hundred feet—which is fifty feet higher than the spire of St. George's, Woburn-square; the latter being at present the loftiest of the modern Gothic buildings in London. The towers of Westminster Abbey are but 225 feet high, and the new church will therefore vie with the old abbey as a conspicuous object in the view of this part of the city. But height is not the only recommendation of the design; for, as our view will show, the outline is bold yet graceful, and its composition does credit to Mr. Poynter, the architect, from whose designs it is now in course of erection.

SPORTS OF ENGLAND.—No. III.



WILD DUCK SHOOTING.

The different methods of taking the wild duck afford capital sport and never-ending adventure. "Common wild fowl shooting with a shoulder duck gun," observes Captain Lacy in the "Modern Shooter," "has long been in vogue, and has often been the theme of ancient sporting authors; but, until Colonel Hawker's work appeared, wild fowl shooting on salt-water had scarcely been touched upon; still less had any one of 'gentle blood' ventured to commit his valuable case to 'the vasty deep,' in case so fragile as that yclept a shooting punt. [The merit, therefore, of having invented this new pleasure, or, at least, of having added it to the stock of sporting recreations, attaches exclusively to the gallant colonel. As a practical performer he is most successful, and is, perhaps, the very best wild fowl shot round the British coast. Hail, Hawker! Mac Adam of duck shooters, hail!" The colonel's well known book contains the modes of hut shooting, &c., and some particulars relating to decoys.

The Yankees have what they call their "ducking," i.e. when they form a party to go shoot ducks on Duck Island, in Chesapeake Bay. These are the celebrated canvass-back duck of the American gourmand, and the estimation in which they are held may be gathered from the fact that, in Baltimore market, the price of a single duck is one shilling, whilst the common wild ducks are but threepence a couple. The former has been acclimated in Britain, and why the breed has not been more extensively encouraged is somewhat surprising, as they are sizeable and handsome birds, and, as a table luxury, most delicious.

The usual weight of the mallard or drake is about 2½ lbs., and that of the duck somewhat less; but the foreigners are generally larger than the home-breds. Captain Lacy has shot wild ducks in the Tees Bay above six pounds and a half the pair; but, if much beyond this weight, their purity of breed may be suspected. Wild ducks, excepting a few homebreds, whose full-grown ones are fine eating in August, do not appear in the Tees Bay until November, or, at all events, in any number worth mentioning. The mallards are very poor in condition after the middle of February, not so the ducks. The captain adds: "a common trick played upon the London cockneys is to serve them out with a couple of shell ducks in lieu of wild ducks. The heads and white legs of the former having been cut off, and the birds plucked, as they are just about the size of the latter, and always look plump, they sell better, and it is thus that wild ducks are libelled for eating so 'fishy!'" The captain enthusiastically sings:—

"If tame-ducks were wanting,
And wild-ducks were flown,
Oh! who would inhabit
This bleak world alone!"

PHEASANT SHOOTING.

On Wednesday last, the 1st of February, pheasant and partridge shooting ended; although in most parts of the country where the game is attended to but few birds have been brought down of late, as the remarkable mildness of the present season has led the birds to pair very early this year. The country bears all the marks of spring. "The tit-mouse seeks its food through the straw thatch—the fieldfares, skylarks, and redwings are busy on the same errand over wet meadows—the sparrows and yellow-hammers and chaffinches, still beautiful, though mute, glean from the straw and chaff in the farm-yard—while the ringdove comes for her meal to the ivy-berries. The red-breast comes to the window to amuse with his familiarity, or, as the gardener turns over the loosened soil, seeks fearlessly within a few inches of the spade the insects upon which it feeds." Our illustration will serve to keep in remembrance the sports of the past winter, until the 1st of October, with its leafless trees and almanack memento—right pleasant to sportsman's eye—"Pheasant shooting begins"—affords the time for again testing hand, eye, and gun.

Before the present battue system became general, the pheasant was considered a prize far more worthy of the sportsman than the bird is now regarded. In a wild state, the pheasant, difficult to get at, gave great sport, and when brought down was prized accordingly. It is now, however, more like shooting from a trap—a matter rather of skill and profit than of sport. Indeed, many "lords of the manor," in these game-selling days, send their pheasants to market as regularly as they do their sheep. In a state of nature pheasants frequent woods where the grass is long and tangled, and within easy distance of water. Corn is a favourite food, as those who sow it know, but when this is absent, wild berries and acorns supply its place. The hen lays about twelve eggs, and the young follow her like chickens as soon as they are out of the shell, searching for ants' eggs and other food. If scared, they seek the woods, and only issue thence mornings and evenings.

In partridge-shooting, as, indeed, in all other, the relative proportions of the charge are of great importance.

Mr. Greener says, "Suppose you begin with two drachms of powder, and vary the charge one eighth of a drachm, each shot, up to three and a half drachms, or as may be required, according to the length and bore of the gun, and, for precision, taking three shots with each charge at a sufficient number of sheets of paper, which-ever you find strongest with the least quantity of powder, that is the best charge, as, very likely, the two next additions of powder will shoot equally strong, and yet not stronger, because more of it remains unburnt: therefore, the least quantity that shoots equally strong is the proper charge, which, having once ascertained, never change for any person's plan. All guns, according to their bore and length, will shoot a certain weight, and a certain size of shot best. A great deal of shot in a small bore lies too far up the barrel, and creates an unnecessary friction, and the shot, by the compression at the moment of explosion, becomes all shapes—a circumstance which materially affects its flight.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1843.

Parliament was opened on Thursday by commission, the Lord Chancellor reading Her Majesty's speech, for which, together with all the proceedings up to the time of our going to press, we refer to the supplement accompanying this day's paper, which we have the pleasure to present with kind goodwill to our readers.

The speech itself is of course the immediate topic of discussion, and upon this we have some commentaries to make. It is, in a great measure, like all orations from the throne—whether delivered royally or by proxy—of that vague, indefinite, and diplomatic cast, which precludes the utterance of anything of tangible form and pressure, although it leaves "ample room and verge enough" for deductions, for or against the government, according to the party logic of the time. We shall endeavour to seize upon its topics in a more enlarged spirit, and to state our anticipations of its meaning with the independence and frankness of confirmed neutrality.

The first two paragraphs are of considerable moment:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you that her Majesty receives from all Princes and States assurances of a friendly disposition towards this country, and of an earnest desire to co-operate with her Majesty in the maintenance of general peace.

"By the Treaty which her Majesty has concluded with the United States of America, and by the adjustment of those differences which, from their long continuance, had endangered the preservation of peace, her Majesty trusts that the amicable relations of the two countries have been confirmed."

The first of these passages indicates in a moral sense the uncertainty of human calculations; the second implies something like a conviction of misplaced confidence, even in the fair-promising results of the Ashburton treaty. In the face of the friendly aspect of affairs presented by our foreign relations the same day brings us the intimation that the Prime Minister of France is defeated in the Chamber upon the initiative step in the abrogation of the treaties of 1831 and 1833—a step which, if successfully followed by the opposition, would be the leading provocative to an European war; while, on the other hand, the remarkable speech of Mr. Linn to the American Congress, and the manner in which it was received by the republican parliament, evinced the very presence of the spirit of war within the heart and focus of American legislation.

The result of our hostilities with China is touched upon in a becoming manner, and with no too vaunteful assurance; and we are pleased to find that the improvement of commerce is held out as our best inducement for congratulation upon the termination of a successful, though not too brilliant war.

"Her Majesty rejoices in the prospect that, by the free access which will be opened to the principal marts of that populous and extensive empire, encouragement will be given to the commercial enterprise of her people."

It is possible that further commercial advantages will arise to us from the treaty with Russia alluded to in the speech:—

"Her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of Russia a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, which will be laid before you. Her Majesty regards this Treaty with great satisfaction, as the foundation for increased intercourse between her Majesty's subjects and those of the Emperor."

One circumstance very important to the cause of humanity, and altogether of a Christian and civilizing tendency, is thus quietly confirmed:—

"In concert with her allies, her Majesty has succeeded in obtaining for the Christian population of Syria the establishment of a system of administration which they were entitled to expect from the engagements of the Sultan, and from the good faith of this country."

The victories in Affghanistan are treated with temperate discretion. The speech refers chiefly to the success of the military operations, without insinuating any approval of the civil government, in so far as the administration of Lord Ellenborough is concerned, and it conveys a joyful sympathy for the liberated British prisoners in whose fate her Majesty is (we doubt not, in this instance, with some personal truth) represented as having felt a virtuous, an anxious, and, we are happy to believe, a characteristic, interest. The speech also settles the question of the non-occupation by our armies of the countries westward of the Indus.

In the address to the Commons the gratifying intelligence is conveyed (an "Io triumphe" for Joseph Hume) of a reduction of the naval and military forces—and people expect to find taxes, and soldiers, and sailors wholesomely decreasing together in times of peace. Let Government see that it do not breathe "the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope."

The recent diminution of revenue is rather the subject of explanation than of disclosure. It implies that the Income-tax is only partially collected, and that the reduction of import duties has materially affected the Exchequer.

There is another more important cause of deficiency, however, which we are glad to perceive is not unnoticed in the speech:—

"Her Majesty fears that it must be, in part, attributed to the reduced consumption of many articles, caused by that depression of the manufacturing industry of the country which has so long prevailed, and which her Majesty has so deeply lamented."

We cannot positively fathom the meaning of this paragraph, but we gather from it a glimpse of hope that some very earnest consideration of the general poverty of the lower orders is honestly under the consideration of the executive. Such an admission of a dreadful evil would hardly be so frankly made if some remedy were not also contemplated. But the admission is still too qualified. It is not only in the manufacturing districts that depression exists—the distress has extended to the poor of all classes. The causes of the distress are not hinted at; and, as we expected, neither to poor-laws which are, nor to corn-laws which may or may not be among them, is the slightest allusion made.

Her Majesty makes a grateful return for the kindness which she received during her recent tour in Scotland, which we had the pleasure so abundantly to illustrate:—

"Her Majesty commands us to acquaint you that her Majesty derived the utmost gratification from the loyalty and affectionate attachment to Her Majesty which were manifested on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to Scotland."

By way of pleasantry, we may remark that it is agreeable to find that the Edinburgh Baillies, who, at the time of the Queen's arrival, were snoring in their beds the refrain of

Up in the morning's no for me,
Up in the morning early,

have not been specially included in the royal avowal of her Majesty's satisfaction.

A subject of less congratulation is discovered in the riots which distracted the country a few months past. The Government regrets and reprobates them, but relies upon the strength and efficacy of the law to put down all such outbursts of popular tumult.

We anticipate something from the following announcement:—

"We are commanded by her Majesty to acquaint you, that measures connected with the improvement of the Law, and with various questions of domestic policy, will be submitted for your consideration."

The improvement of the law is a desideratum which we have strongly hinted at in our article of "Prospects of the Session." It is a topic, the agitation of which cannot be too earnestly regarded and encouraged by the people.

The speech concludes with the following aspiration, in which we join with heartfelt cordiality

"Her Majesty confidently relies on your zealous endeavours to promote the public welfare, and fervently prays that the favour of Divine Providence may direct and prosper your counsels, and make them conducive to the happiness and contentment of her people."

Such is an epitome, with comment, on the royal speech. It has little in it to praise or blame. It gives small insight into the designs of Government; but in this respect only resembles all the royal specimens of eloquence which administrations of all colours have made it an almost invariable rule to put forth. It is, in fact, an official "nothingness," and, upon the principle of ex nihilo nihil fit, let nobody attempt to make anything out of it. A few reasonable indications lead to a few reasonable deductions, and that is all. People usually rush to a royal speech with curiosity, and turn from it with disappointment: we do not think either feeling worthy to be indulged. It is to the business of the session that thinking men will look. A speech is, after all, no ministerial manifesto, except when some decided political coup de théâtre can be brilliantly put forth. Then, of course, the bruit and the bustle are duly made and paraded before the dust is effectually kicked up. Now-a-days, such a speech would be the rara avis in terris of political history.

One circumstance we may mention in reference to a commission having been proxy for the presence of the Queen. It is known that the situation of her Majesty is again delicate, and an unwillingness to expose her health to the risk of excitement and fatigue at the present juncture was the sole cause of her absence from that scene, around which her presence has more than once shed the exhilaration of loyalty and joy.

The events which have happened since our last in the French capital have been, and are, of the utmost importance, as likely to influence the destinies not only of the nation in which they have transpired, but of Great Britain also, and even of Europe at large. It has been said by Frenchmen that they would regard any re-accession to office here by Lord Palmerston as tantamount to a declaration of war. Should Thiers succeed Guizot at the Tuileries, there are many Englishmen who would apply the same proposition to the advent to power of the new French minister. We leave the question, however, in the hands of our intelligent correspondent, whose views upon foreign questions have been, since his expression of them in our journal, most materially confirmed, and whose letter in our present number assumes all the importance of a leading article.

PARIS, 30th Jan.

THE important information I transmitted to you in my last week's communication as to the rickety state of the Soult-Guizot Cabinet is fully confirmed. I remark that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is the only English journal which has taken an accurate view of the position of the ministry. The common mistake in England is to reason on France and Frenchmen with only British notions, and hence it is that all the London morning journals have been so singularly in error as to what is passing here, and which you will permit us to add we regard as essentially a crisis affecting the existence of the most pacific and well disposed ministry that has existed since the July days of 1830. Permit us now to trace the course of events since my letter in your number of the 28th. After the effect produced by the speech of the Duc de Broglie, and the vote of the Chamber of Peers, the courage of the ministry was reanimated, and M. Guizot essayed through M. Dumon, the reporter of the Commission, to withdraw or modify the strong paragraph drawn up by M. Dupin. M. Dumon failed to procure the withdrawal of the passage in question, but he was so far fortunate as to induce the Commission to modify the second sentence—that is, the Chamber in the project of address was made to express its approbation of the strict execution of the treaties of 1831 and 1833. Unfortunately the third sentence of this paragraph was allowed to stand thus:—"But struck with the inconveniences which experience has pointed out, in regard to the good intelligence necessary to the accomplishment of the common object, we look forward with much anxiety to the moment when our commerce shall be replaced under the exclusive superintendence of our own flag." A Cabinet council, at which the King presided, was held to consider the course to be pursued in regard to this paragraph. M. Guizot was for opposing it altogether, and in the event of defeat, for the ministry to resign. The King was of a different opinion. His Majesty contended that the passage was sufficiently vague to afford a loophole for the ministry not to attempt to enter on negociations with England respecting the treaties of 1831 and 1833. After a long discussion it was agreed that M. Guizot, when his turn came to speak on this paragraph, should blame the manifestation contained therein, but at the same time should accept it. The opposition having ascertained that the ministry was resolved to accept the paragraph of the commission, had meetings. In the Thier's coterie it was resolved that neither the chief nor his friends should speak on the paragraph, thus imitating the reserve of Count Molé in the other Chamber; so that neither M. Thiers nor Count Molé, the premiers expectant, could be pledged by any declarations of their own, for both these statesmen know full well the responsibility of engaging in a discussion with the British Cabinet touching the repeal of treaties that have been in execution for many years. Some of the members of the Left or Odillon Barrot party, however, resolved on their amendments, making the Commission's paragraph still stronger and more significant. The leaders of the opposition, however, collectively resolved if possible to upset the Central by a side-wind, and I have every reason to believe that the sixth paragraph of the project of address relative to the approval of the conduct of the French Government respecting the affairs of Syria will be the grand cheval de bataille of the opposition collectively. I know that M. Berryer proposes to speak on this question; his line of argument will be that France has only followed in the wake of England on this branch of the Eastern question, and that France has not assumed her rightful attitude as defender of the Christian population. There will be a warm debate, and, as I think, a division, the result of which I trust to be enabled to send to you by to-morrow's post.

NEWSPAPER

PARIS, CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES,
TUESDAY, FIVE P.M.

DEFEAT OF THE MINISTRY.—I write in great haste from the Chamber itself to save post, and if the London morning papers do not send expresses you will have this result exclusively. Briefly the French Cabinet has been beaten in a division on an amendment proposed by M. Berryer, the royalist deputy. The secret scrutiny or ballot took place on the following question :—The amended paragraph of the commission was an approval of the ministry in respect to its Eastern policy. M. Berryer's counter amendment was a condemnation of the Central, although indirectly expressed, according to the parliamentary custom here. The numbers stood thus :—

For M. Berryer's amendment on the Syrian paragraph	206
For the Ministry	203
Majority against the Cabinet	3

There were 409 deputies who voted, and the absolute majority over the moiety of the voters was 205, so that the Cabinet was defeated by one absolute opposition majority and one relative majority.

This defeat, I regret to state, may be regarded as conclusive of the fate of the ministry, for, although it may not go out on this division, the strength of parties has been tested, and it is evident that the ministry is in a minority. The Dufaure-Passy, Lamartine, and Thiers parties were in the majority. The Right of Search paragraph is now on, but there is immense agitation and nobody will be listened to till to-morrow, and it is now believed that a stronger paragraph than even that of the Commission will be carried against the Cabinet, and then it must inevitably resign to make way for another ministry. Count Molé has the principal chance, but the return of Thiers is by no means an improbable event. If so it would be curious, for he went out on the Eastern question in October, 1840.

We have this week redeemed our promise of presenting to our readers a supplement gratis upon the occasion of the opening of Parliament. We, however, take credit for the production of a much more attractive paper than our readers were led to expect, not only by illustrating, in the body of the journal, all the circumstances of the session-commencement, but by employing a large corps of reporters at our own expense, to enable us to publish a faithful and spirited report of the complete debates.

The possibility of an annual royal visit to Scotland, which was rumoured a few weeks ago, may now, we have happened to learn from a well-informed source, be considered as a probability. Lord Glenlyon went to offer Blair Athole to the Queen and Prince Albert as a shooting place and deer park ; and although the royal reply had not transpired, yet as it is known that her Majesty had previously ordered inquiries to be made for an extensive shooting range, it is considered probable that the offer may be accepted. In that event we may confidently look for an annual visit of the royal party to the Highlands.—Fife Herald.

NEW COLLEGE, OXFORD.—It may not be generally known that in the hall of this college there exists to the present day above the modern plaster ceiling the original carved oak roof. This roof, it is supposed, is quite entire, with the exception of the ends of the pendants, which have been removed to make way for the flat ceiling inserted immediately beneath them. Surely there can be no sufficient reason why the trifling sum required to remove the present unsightly plaster ceiling should be withheld, and the original timber roof be brought to light, and thus this building be restored to its primitive state, and be rendered one of the finest rooms in the university.

THE REPORTERS' GALLERY.

The opening of a new session of Parliament affords us an occasion of presenting to our readers, among other illustrations, one of great and pre-eminent interest, in which the object we propose is to place before the public a sketch of that curious machinery by which the proceedings of their legislators, in all their wonderful extent and multiplicity, are made known to the immense circle of political readers which is spread throughout the almost boundless dominions of the British empire.

Several well-known members of the daily press are here represented by the artist in the act of discharging their onerous and responsible public duties in the gallery of the House of Commons. The whole scene presents a deeply interesting revelation of one of the most singular portions of the economy of the vast community of which we are members. We shall not abuse the goodnature of our friends by intruding on their privacy, averse as we know them all to be to be held up to the public gaze ; we have much to say, and many good things to tell of them all, but we think we shall best consult the dictates of good taste by maintaining silence as to their personal history and qualifications. There is one, however, whom our readers will perceive towards the right of the sketch, to whom we cannot forbear adverting for a moment, inasmuch as he is a very dear and valued friend of ours. There he sits, with his broad laughing face running over with frolicsome humour, stooping over the front of the desk—

> Of Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear
> The weight of urgent'est

debates. All who are familiar with the press will recognise in him a true specimen of the Malesian, with all the fertile wit and genuine unaffected humour of his country, and one to whom our own readers have been indebted for many pleasant hours.

The parliamentary reporters of London form a very important and influential body, to whom any man may be proud to belong. They have many privileges, which are objects of ambition to the uninitiated in the mysteries of public affairs. Having access to the Houses of Lords and Commons at all hours during which they are open for the transaction of public business, they are in fact looked upon as a kind of order of hierophants of state affairs, whose duty it is to explain the intricacies and obscurities of politics to the unlearned world. Attempts have often been made to describe their community, but the task has generally fallen into tasteless and uninformed hands. Having, however, better opportunities of becoming acquainted with the subject than most who have chosen to write upon it, we shall throw together in this article a few of the more striking particulars of their history, for some of which the reader will seek in vain in any other source hitherto open to the public. What should be told and what should not has been published without distinction, and that inaccurately. Dicenda tacenda locuti.

Of the early reporters, it will be sufficient merely to mention Sir Simon D'Ewes, long a member of the parliaments of Elizabeth and James, who has transmitted to us in his journal whatever is known to us of the oratory of those distant times ; and Burton, member of parliament in the era of Cromwell, whose Cromwellian diary is the only record that gives us much light as to the eloquence of the Praise-God-Barebones-Parliament, who ruled the roast in the times of the great Protector. Sir Simon and old Burton would probably have been rather to seek, if they had found themselves in the gallery in our own day, and been charged with the duty of reporting a finished oration of Palmerston or Peel ; yet they were hearty and conscientious labourers in their duty to the best of their abilities, and merit the eternal gratitude of posterity for what they have preserved. They probably dabbled in stenography, or, as the phrase then was, brachygraphy ; but of course, as will always be the case with anything that is regarded as a curious accomplishment, instead of the serious study or business of life, any comparison of their proficiency in this art with that of a member of the profession would only provoke a smile. Sir Simon has, however, given us some curious specimens of the harangues of Mr. Secretary Cecil and other statesmen of the Machiavellian school of Queen Elizabeth. Strange, quaint, and almost ludicrous effusions, they seem to our modern eyes ; yet they have a smack of the rare old days, and much of right English feeling. They go straight to the point, without roundabout palaver ; they have nothing of shuffle, subterfuge, or conventional humbug. There is one in particular so richly characteristic, that we cannot for the life of us deny our readers the pleasure of perusing it, and, if they will, of smiling at it, especially as, singularly enough, it has a direct and positive bearing on the measure of our present Premier, Sir R. Peel, and the great question of free-trade which now engrosses the attention of the world. It is a speech against monopolies made in the year 1601, in which the secretary announced the gracious pleasure of her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, that the patents of monopoly, which made provisions and other commodities dear to her people, should be revoked. Our readers will not fail to observe, that the increased activity of the public mind, and the craving for political information, already produced by the transpiring of parliamentary transactions, had even then attracted the attention of the astute minister.

Mr. Secretary Cecil stood up and said, "There needs no supply of the memory of the Speaker ; but, because it pleases him to desire some that he about him to aid his dignity, and because the rest of my fellows do shut, I will take upon me to declare something which I both heard and since know. I was yesterday with three or four of my fellow-councillors, and the message was the same that hath been told you ; and the cause hath not succeeded from any particular course thought upon, but from private informations of some particular persons. I have been very inquisitive of them, and of the cause why more severity was now used than afore ; which, *I am afraid, cometh by being acquainted with some course of proceedings in this house. There are no patents now of force which shall not presently be revoked ; for what patent soever is granted, there shall be left to the overthrow of that patent a liberty agreeable to the law. I take it, there is no patent whereof the execution hath not been oppressive. Would that they had never been granted ! I hope there shall never be more, (All the House said, Amen). I dare assure you from henceforth there shall be no more granted. They shall all be revoked. But to whom do they repair with these letters ? To some outhouse, to some desolate widow, to some simple cottage, a poor ignorant people, who, rather than they would be troubled, and undo themselves by coming up hither, will give anything in reason for these caterpillars' satisfaction. The notice of this is now public, and you will perhaps judge this to be a tale to serve the time ! but I would have all men to know thus much, that it is no jesting with a court of Parliament, neither dares any man (for my own part I dare not) so mock and abuse all the states of this kingdom, in a matter of this consequence and importance. I say, therefore, there shall be a proclamation general throughout the realm, to notify Her Majesty's resolution in this behalf. And because you may eat your meat more savoury than you have done, every man shall have salt as good and cheap as he can buy it, or make it freely, without danger of that patent, which shall be presently revoked. The same benefit shall those have of which they could not call it shall be. Those that desire to go sprucely in their ruffs, may, at less charge than accustomed, obtain their wish ; the patent for starch, which hath so much been prosecuted, shall at length be repealed. But not to make any further performance of the matter, I end, and gravely and truly delivered speech of the Speaker, I must crave your favours a little longer to make an apology for myself. I have held the favour of this house as dear as my life, and I have been told that I deserved to be taxed zealously of the House. I protest my zeal to have the business go forward in a right and hopeful course, and my fear to displease Her Majesty by a harsh and rash proceeding made me so much to lay aside my discretion, that I said, it might rather be termed a school than a council, or to that effect. But by this speech, if any think I call him school-boy, he mocks wrongs me and mistakes me."—Parliamentary History, vol. i. p. 934.

A happy memory to Mr. Secretary Cecil, say we ! and may all present ministers follow so good an example. And so long live our gracious Queen and all her true and real councillors.

Sir Simon D'Ewes and Burton belonged to the class of amateur reporters, of whom Sir Henry Cavendish, M.P. for Lostwithiel, was afterwards the most distinguished member. This gentleman sat in Parliament during the early part of the reign of George III. and at a time when reporters were excluded from the house, and his taste and industry led him to take notes of the debates of those days at short hand. The results of his labours long remained concealed, but having now, by a happy accident, been discovered, they are at the present moment in course of publication in London. They extend over the period from 1768 to 1774, comprising the whole duration of that which has hitherto been known as the unreported Parliament. This was an epoch fertile in orators, as well as in great occurrences. Burke and George Grenville were then the ornaments of the House of Commons ; Charles Fox had just entered upon his career of rising to eminence. The debates on the prosecution of Wilkes and the riots of 1768, on the American policy of Great Britain and on the Government of Canada, are full of the most lively interest, and have been well preserved in many portions by Sir Henry. He was at first only able to give short reports, but he improved by practice, and gradually became what we should now call a very efficient man, although what has yet been published by no means establishes his claim to be called first-rate. Sir Henry afterwards went to Ireland, in the government of which country he filled various important offices. We would fain add the great name of Daniel Defoe to this list, although we are obliged to confess that his claims are much more slender and less distinct. However, in his "History of the Union of England and Scotland," he has given several of the speeches in the Scottish Parliament during the fierce debates on the union, with a minute account of the proceedings on that grand measure. He himself tells us that he attended the house for the purpose, being then in Edinburgh. The celebrated speech of Lord Belhaven, which he has given in the work, was obtained from the orator himself, but those of Seton, Fletcher of Saltoun, and other famous Scottish patriots, we may be allowed to believe were reported by Defoe himself.

Accounts of the more interesting debates during the reign of Anne and the early part of George I. were published from time to time, and may be found in various compilations of that period. But the first persons who embraced reporting as a regular profession were Gordon, Guthrie, and Dr. Johnson. The former were men who attained a respectable position in the literature of their day—Johnson is a man who will never be forgotten, and of whom the parliamentary reporters may well be proud. His career, indeed, furnishes a great, important, and spirit-stirring lesson, which should never be forgotten by aspirants after honourable fame, while struggling with the innumerable difficulties which in London beset the entrance to every profession. To this great man may be applied the lines which were framed of one very different—but who had still some strong points of resemblance to him—Robert Burns :—

> A kind, true heart, a spirit high,
> That could not fear, and would not bow,
> Were written in his manly eye,
> And on his manly brow.

* Our readers probably know that to make public anything that passes in the House of Commons was, and indeed still is, a high contempt and breach of privilege, although the rule is not acted upon.

Gordon and Guthrie both belonged to a people whom Johnson professed to dislike (though it was more pretence than reality)—the Scots ; and we have often thought that, among other causes which may be assigned, his hatred might in part be traceable to some collision or cause of difference having taken place between him and these men, of which no record remains. Gordon is best known by his translation of Tacitus and his political discourses, but his writings were multitudinous. He obtained, probably through Sir R. Walpole, a lucrative place in the excise, a thing which never happens now a days to any one in the same profession), and died in 1750. Guthrie's "Histories of England and Scotland," and his "General History of the World," were creditable performances for their day : they now rest in peace and quietness. He was a man of eccentric habits, of considerable talent, and of vast industry. In 1745 he obtained a pension, which he held to his death in 1770. An amusing anecdote is told of him somewhere, that during the recess of Parliament he used to retire from London to a hut in the wild recesses of the Highlands, to live with himself, and fly for a time from human society, whence, on the opening of the session, he would again return, and reappear among the crowd of London. Gordon was the earliest, but we believe the exact period over which his labours extended is unknown. Newspapers were then of small importance, and made no attempt at regular reports : a month or two would often elapse before a great debate was ready, and then it appeared in one of the magazines. What a contrast this to the present time, when, by the wonderful influence of capital, talent, and numbers combined, the most protracted debate in both Houses appears within six hours, written in a correct and even elegant style, and extending often to the comely proportions of nearly thirty columns of the morning papers. Guthrie composed the debates for "The Gentleman's Magazine" from 1736 to 1740 ; and Johnson from the latter year to 1743. The services of the former were then transferred to "The London Magazine." The parliamentary speeches, as given in that publication, bear considerable internal evidence of general fidelity : they are somewhat too vague, indeed, to be minutely accurate, but it is out of the question to suppose, as has sometimes been done, that they could have been fabrications of the literator. The style of the different speeches is distinctly marked, and we have met with many corroborative proofs of their authenticity in the "Memoirs of Horace Walpole," "Hardwicke's Parliamentary Journal," and other publications and records of the period. Some of Sir R. Walpole's speeches are also strikingly accordant with the manuscript notes of that statesman, published after his death by Archdeacon Coxe. This is the case with the version of his celebrated speech in defence of his policy and personal character, delivered on the 13th of February, 1741, in reply to the furious attack of Sandys, Pulteney, and the other orators of opposition, which eventually forced him to retire from office. Whether Guthrie and his assistants obtained any notes from Walpole it is of course now impossible to say. The occasion was perhaps the greatest that had then ever occurred in the parliamentary history of the country, and was productive of a debate of unexampled length and vehemence. The galleries were crowded by ten o'clock. The debate began about half-past one (for the house then met early in the day) and lasted till seven o'clock next morning. Walpole made a brilliant and, on the whole, a sound and just defence. His great opponent, Pulteney, was so delighted with it, that a few nights afterwards he could not refrain from crossing the house to the treasury bench, where, sitting down by Walpole, he expressed his admiration of the effort he had made. Walpole modestly declined the compliment, and mentioned the speech of Sir W. Young, the secretary-at-war, as being much better. "It was fine," Pulteney replied, "but not of that weight with what you said." This little anecdote is in the highest degree interesting, as one among a thousand proofs which we could give if space permitted, that statesmen are not the cold and heartless beings which men of inferior minds are fond of representing them to be.

The credit of Johnson's debates is more doubtful, as they bear in every page marks of his own peculiarities of style too plain to be mistaken. He was too indolent to attend the gallery regularly, yet there are coincidences of thought, and even expression, between them and other records of the debates of those days, which show that they are far from being without value as reports. It is known that at a dinner where he was present with Francis, Foote, Wedderburn (afterwards Lord Loughborough), and others, he claimed the magnificent burst of eloquence, familiar to every one, as Mr. Pitt's reply to Horace Walpole, as entirely his own composition, declaring that he had written it as a gerat in Exeter-street. This is so far corroborated by other evidence, that Mr. Speaker Onslow (we think it is) states that nothing of the kind took place on the occasion on which Johnson introduces it. The matter, however, is somewhat doubtful. If it did not occur then, it may have occurred on another evening incidentally. At all events, if we choose to assent to this claim, we must admit that Johnson was a party to a fraud on the public of that day, not exactly consonant with his general integrity, nor with the elevated precepts of morality he so often inculcated. Whatever may be, we can well afford to forgive him twenty such impositions for one speech such as he has put into the mouth of the immortal Chatham. Coming to a later day, the most celebrated reporters were Woodfall and Perry, who flourished towards the close of last century. Although the debates of this period are very unequally written, these and other men have yet preserved to us many invaluable specimens of the eloquence of Fox and Pitt, with their great compeers, Sheridan and Burke. We know that men nearly connected with Mr. Fox have represented his speeches, as given in the Parliamentary history to be unworthies in point of genuineness ; but, after careful examination, we are fully satisfied that this hypothesis is untenable. His speeches on the coalition, on the Irish Commercial Resolutions, on the French Treaty of 1784, on the Westminster Election, on the Russian Armament, and others, may be cited as excellent specimens of his style. He never composed more than one or two speeches, and these Lord Brougham (not a bad judge of such matters) has pitched upon as the very worst. Lord Erskine, in a letter printed at the beginning of the collection of Fox's speeches, speaks of them as giving nothing but the caput mortuum of his style. It may appear presumptuous to differ from so great a man ; still we must be allowed to think otherwise. To state our reasons would be many of the speeches appear every way worthy even of Mr. Fox, perhaps the greatest of modern orators ; and, allowing for all the varieties produced by difference of occasion, by the various temper and mood of the orator himself, as well as by the various reporters into whose hands he fell, there is still such a pervading likeness as can only be accounted for on the principle of a general, though not perfect, fidelity in the reports. Of Mr. Pitt's speeches, that on the coalition, in the peroration, at least, seems to be as perfectly reported as it could possibly be, even at the present day. His invective against the French Convention, on the declaration of war in 1793, is also well given, and must have produced a great effect in stirring up the passions of the public at that tremendous crisis.

Perry was a man of prodigious memory, to which he is said to have trusted much in his reports. He is still well remembered, and many anecdotes are told of him. Contemporary with him, and later, were many reporters, who afterwards attained to the highest distinctions in other walks. Among others, Sir James Mackintosh, Lord Campbell, and Lord Eldon may be mentioned. There were some men, too, whose memory yet survives, whose eccentricities did not, perhaps, reflect much honour on the profession. Among these was Peter Finnerty, a friend of Hazlitt, of whom a hundred odd stories are current—most of them little to his credit. Peter was a clever fellow, and, we believe, well enough informed, but we fear he was a sad scapegrace. It was he who, being in the gallery during a pause in the business of the house, called for "a song from Mr. Speaker," and when the messenger inquired for the offender, pointed out an innocent Quaker sitting next him, who, to his utter consternation, was forthwith removed in custody. These and such like stories make many unthinking persons laugh, but suggest other emotions to the judicious. They are not best liked by the highest class of the profession of which we have been speaking. Another freak of Mr. Finnerty's occupied the serious attention of the House, for more than one evening, in 1819. The proceedings, which are eminently absurd, may be seen in "Hansard's Debates." They ended in Mr. Finnerty's being publicly reprimanded and admonished by the Speaker.

On looking back to the views and expressions of the various speakers, in reference to the public press, on the occasion to which we have just referred, and comparing them with those exhibited in 1833, on the discussion of Mr. O'Connell's complaint against the Times, for a breach of privilege, it is impossible not to congratulate the profession on the great advancement which it had made during the interval in respectability as well as in importance — an advancement that has steadily continued, with a progressively increasing acceleration of movement, up to the time at which we write. In 1833 the highest testimony was born by Sir R. Peel, our present eminent Premier, to the abilities of the parliamentary reporters, their fidelity, zeal, and industry in the discharge of their arduous duties. He then stated a fact which, if all circumstances be considered, will be found very remarkable; that he had never, during the ten years for which he held the seals of the Home Department, received a single application for any place under government, as a reward for newspaper or other reports, from any member of the profession. A more honourable proof of the disinterested impartiality by which they are actuated, and which we have ourselves means of knowing to be their universal sentiment, could not be desired. On the occasion we have mentioned, members of all parties concurred in Sir R. Peel's general laudation.

We must now draw to a close this article, which is extending to rather inconvenient length. We will add that the profession is now adorned by men not inferior in natural talent or acquired attainments to any of their predecessors, although its increased labours and difficulties, in modern days, prevent them for the most part from devoting that attention to other pursuits which would give their reputation greater publicity. It would be invidious to enter into particulars, and odious to draw comparisons. All the morning newspapers are reported by men who are fully competent to discharge the duties expected from them, which necessarily vary to a certain extent, and within certain limits according to the general character of each journal, but without any reference whatever, in this department, to the party politics of the paper. The profession is one which tasks both the physical and mental powers of men to an extent of which the general public have little or no conception. It is one too, we lament to have to add, of which the rewards are but slender in proportion to the toils; and not least dispiriting is the reflection that those who follow it, die like the heroes of Ossian, "without their fame," not indeed unwept nor unhonoured, but certainly unsung. No part of the economy of society is unimportant; and a class of men whose duty it is to record and preserve to posterity the eloquence of their times, which otherwise would for ever perish, ought to be held in especial honour and regard as performing functions of high consequence to the state. The parliamentary reporters of London form by far the most ancient body of the kind; in France nothing of the sort existed till 1790, when Dumont, the friend of Mirabeau and Bentham, with other contemporary literary men, reported the debates of the revolutionary legislatures in the journals of the day. The French reporters have now attained unquestioned proficiency, but, on a fair general comparison, must be held inferior in all respects to our own. Certainly they have as yet produced no great men. Of the American press, we will only say that the New York journals alone have some good reporters. The Washington papers, which give the proceedings of Congress, are written and reported in a manner that would disgrace second-rate provincial newspapers in England. They are in fact, for a country like the United States, utterly contemptible. The reason is understood to be that the remuneration is altogether inadequate for well educated men.

In addition to the above sketch of the position of a reporter, and the value of his occupation to the community, it may be interesting to give a few details of the mode in which those formidable columns of close print are produced, which appear every morning during the session so regularly that, like the rising of the sun, or any natural and constantly occurring phenomenon, it ceases to surprise, though the process is in reality a diurnal wonder. Only the most perfect division of labour could effect it, and by the large capital employed on each of the morning journals, this is carried to perfection. Each of the morning papers, and one of the evening journals, retains a corps of reporters in its exclusive service; the corps vary in number from twelve to twenty each, and from the time the House meets till the adjournment, one reporter from each paper is in attendance taking notes of the proceedings. A system of rotation is established, by which the gentleman "on duty" is relieved at the end of every half hour or three-quarters of an hour by a colleague who takes his place, and continues the same process. The hour at which every reporter is to "go on," to relieve his predecessor, is fixed at the beginning of each week, and for that week remains the same for each night of it. A list of all the gentlemen, with their hours of duty, is drawn up, printed, and forwarded to the address of each individual by the Monday morning's post; all are thus fully informed of when they will be required. This list is liable to derangement from accidental causes, illness, &c., but is adhered to if possible. Those who have their half-hour in the early part of the evening will frequently, in a long debate, fall in for a second turn; and on a very "heavy night," even for a third. But as this happens equally to all the corps, in the long run it is not felt as an inconvenience, except there should be a succession of very long and important debates in one week, when the labour falls excessively severe on the early men. On a pretty full corps, however, a third turn in one night does not happen to one individual very often. Each reporter, when his time is up, by the clock on the left in our sketch (in which the minutes and half minutes are counted more accurately, we will undertake to say, than on any other clock in London), he "vacates his seat" in favour of his successor or "relief," and hurries away with his notes to the office of the paper to which he is attached, where he transcribes them as rapidly as possible, and the quicker he can do it the better for his own reputation. A constant succession of reporters is thus kept up, and the "copy" as furnished to the printers by each of them, forms that cemented whole which reads so coherently in the columns of the paper of the next day, though produced by the labour of so many different persons. When the general correctness and fidelity of those reports are considered, the rapidity with which they are written is astonishing. The first part of a speech is frequently in type before the speaker has reached the middle of his address, and the middle may arrive in the Strand or Fleet-street, or Printing-house-square, long before the honourable gentleman is "resuming his seat amid cheers from all parts of the House." The opening of the different lines of railways, and the practice of despatching the morning mails by them, have had considerable effect on the manner in which the speeches delivered late in the night are reported. As all the papers must be ready for the mails at an early hour, it is not usual to give the close of the proceedings fully unless on occasions of extraordinary interest. The House of Lords does not often prolong its sittings beyond six or seven o'clock, but the contingency of a protracted discussion is provided for by a list for the Lords as well as Commons. In addition to the regular reporters, each of the principal morning papers employs a gentleman whose duty it is to remain throughout the proceedings, writing a brief summary of the arguments of each speaker, from which a general idea of the debate can be caught at a glance by those who cannot spare the time necessary to peruse the elaborate report of it. This duty, performed night after night by the same individual, for so many successive hours during which he must at least listen with attention to what is going on, is even more irksome than that of the reporter, who has some change and relaxation, if it be only in walking between his office and the House. A messenger of the House is attached to the reporters' gallery, to preserve order and enforce the regulations of the Sergeant-at-Arms. No book or newspaper is allowed to be read in the gallery, the only publications permitted being parliamentary publications, the notices of motion, or the orders of the day, with which every member of the House is supplied, and a copy of which is placed in the seat of every journal, to be referred to by the reporters in succession. None but the known and accredited gentlemen from each paper are admitted to the reporters' gallery, while, on the other hand, no visitor in the strangers' gallery is allowed to take notes, if he is perceived by the attendants.

INTERIOR OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXIX.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.

We have this week taken for our series of sketches the portraits of three individuals, whose position at the present moment renders them objects of particular interest, though that interest is of different kinds. The first is Sir R. Peel, the Prime Minister of England; the second, the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, Lord J. Russell; and the third, the Speaker of that assembly, Mr. Shaw Lefevre.

It would be impossible, within the limits of this article, to give a detailed notice of the life and career of the Right Hon. Sir R. Peel; that career comprises a political life of more than twenty years, during which have occurred the most momentous changes. In all the discussions which those changes have produced Sir R. Peel has borne a distinguished part, either as the advocate of improvements or as the opponent of alteration. It has also been his fate, compelled by the force of circumstances, to appear at different times in both these capacities on the same question. We mention not this invidiously, it was an inevitable necessity, which to have longer resisted would have produced a most frightful convulsion; and in yielding to the pressure of circumstances, Sir R. Peel acted on the truest Conservative principle. The same spirit which guided him at that important crisis has influenced all his conduct whether he has been in office or out. A disposition has lately been manifested, to hold up Sir R. Peel as an advocate of changes, and to impute to him an inconsistency for being so, while he professes the principles of Conservatism. There is an apparent inconsistency, perhaps, but it is greatly lessened on examination. If he is inconsistent at all, it is with regard to particular measures; but he has never been so to his own principles of action, which are the same now as when he first took office, now nearly a quarter of a century ago. They appear to us clear and comprehensible enough; his policy is to resist changes as long as they are not evidently necessary from the state of public opinion; but that when the delaying them would be destructive of political and social order, to effect them in the safest way possible. The statesman who acts on this principle will be found placed in a different position with regard to any single measure at different periods; but the change will be found to be in the position the measure itself has assumed. If we take the Reform Bill as an instance, Sir R. Peel opposed much of its principle, and nearly all its details; but when his opposition was overruled, and it became the law of the land, he "accepted it," that is, he yielded to what was unavoidable. Should that same Reform Bill be attacked now, there is no doubt that Sir R. Peel would defend it, and endeavour to preserve it in its present form; but we should hardly call him, therefore, the advocate of what he had before so strenuously opposed. He uses the new system as he did the old one, as a defence, behind which he retires, in order to oppose the progress of the innovating spirit—an opposition to which is the soul and animating principle of all Conservatism. He would never originate an original line of policy, or take the initiative in proposing any great measure; but he will always be ready to clear away old obstructions when he sees the current of public opinion running decidedly into new channels. In short, he reverses Goldsmith's description of Burke, who was Too fond of the right to pursue the expedient.

In the policy of Sir R. Peel, the expedient has hitherto appeared to be the chief consideration; and taken in its highest sense, what is expedient and what is right will often be found identified.

Over the chief events of the past life of the prime minister we must pass very cursorily. He is by birth one of the people, as the fact of his father having amassed his splendid fortune by his energy and skill as a cotton manufacturer is generally known. He was born in 1788, was educated at Harrow and Oxford, and entered Parliament early in life, with every advantage on his side with the exception of aristocratical descent. His great wealth, however, in some degree compensated for this, as it freed him from the least tinge of that fatal suspicion to any one entering the House of Commons, the suspicion of being a political adventurer. In his first session he displayed great ability; even his maiden speech stamped him as one likely to rise to consideration in the world of politics. It was spoken as mover of the address. He successively filled the offices of Under Secretary for the Home Department, and Chief Secretary for Ireland; and, in 1822, succeeded Lord Sidmouth as Home Secretary, which office he held till 1827, when he resigned and remained out of power till the formation of the Duke of Wellington's administration. He then resumed his position as Secretary of State, and continued in it till the accession of Earl Grey to office in 1830. The four years that followed saw him the leader of the Conservative opposition, when he took his place at the head of an organised band, and hating no jot of heart or hope, he gradually gathered a force strong enough to justify him in taking office as the head of a Conservative administration from December, 1834, till April, 1835.

The movement, however, was premature; the pear was not yet ripe; the Whigs had not yet broken down the influence they had acquired in the fierce struggle which succeeded the introduction of the Reform Bill. In 1841, the fulness of time was come, and Sir R. Peel, the Fabius of politics, whose tactics of delay had for some time excited the impatience of his party, again seized the reins of Government; and this time it was for a much longer tenure of power. He was made First Lord of the Treasury in September, 1841.

The talents of Sir R. Peel have had more influence in raising him to his present exalted position than his wealth or connections. His genius is not of the same high order as that of a Burke, a Fox, a Sheridan, or that of his own rival, the brilliant and ambitious Canning; but his deficiency as compared with these great men is rather that of the imaginative faculty than any inferiority of comprehension or clearness of judgment. Of fancy or humour his speeches present no trace, but they abound with proofs of an active intellect, cultivated with the utmost care, of untiring application, and memory stored with facts, joined with a ready command of them when required. As an orator he ranks among the highest in an arena where he has formidable competitors; his diction, though occasionally redundant, is always clear, and his language seems to be always at the command of his thoughts; he never hesitates, he very rarely hurries, in his address. He has another great advantage in the perfect knowledge he possesses of his audience; their modes of thought, their tempers, their prejudices; with all these he is perfectly acquainted, and plays on them with all the skill of a performer who is thoroughly master of his instrument. When speaking warmly he frequently turns his back on the speaker and the opposition and addresses himself to the members on the back ministerial benches, a practice which has been censured as something wanting in courtesy—but the habit seems inveterate. He is intimately acquainted with the forms and practice of the House, and he is very rarely "out of order." A memorable exception, however, occurred on the evening that Shiel made his powerful speech against the Income-tax last session. In the excitement that followed the glowing peroration, the adjournment of the House was moved unperceived by Sir Robert, who, on rising to reply, was met by loud cries of "Order!" it being incompetent to a member to speak on the main question after an adjournment has been moved. Whether it was the excitement of the scene, or vexation at being caught tripping on such a point, we know not, but the Premier lost his self-possession, and was for some time unable to proceed. He got out of the difficulty adroitly enough, however, by claiming to speak upon the question of adjournment. A collection of his speeches would contain elaborate orations on every question that has agitated the public mind for the last twenty years. Questions of party interest occupy, of course, a considerable space in these addresses, but many subjects are unconnected with party disputes, such as his reforms of the criminal code, in which he continued the work commenced by Romilly, and his settlement of the currency by the bill of 1819. His measures with regard to the Corn-laws, and his commercial policy in general, though they are now more or less tinged with party feelings by those who are called on to dismiss them, will hereafter rest on their own merits. On their success or failure much of Sir R. Peel's future reputation depends. Whatever may be thought of his policy, there could be but one opinion as to the speech in which he developed it in March last; that speech and his address on introducing the corn-bill were most masterly. The nature of the topics did not admit of much ornament, but as specimens of a clear arrangement of details, admirable classification of facts, and the skill with which every inference that could be drawn from such an immense mass of materials was made to bear in one direction, these two speeches are admitted to have been unequalled.

Sir Robert Peel is an advocate of education; his addresses to the students of Glasgow University and the Mechanics' Institute at Tamworth are among the best of his orations. He also supports the principle of national education in Ireland. He has been a liberal and enlightened patron of the fine arts. In person Sir Robert is above the middle height, and inclined to stoutness; his face is full, but colourless, the toils of leadership having long since banished the roses from his cheek. Time has also thinned his flowing hair: his forehead is decidedly good, and his eyes are of a light blue. The excessive fatigue he has undergone since his last accession to office has apparently told upon him. At the close of last session he had a worn and jaded appearance, which told of many an anxious vigil, and brought to our mind the lines of one of our old dramatists, descriptive of the life of a statesman:—

'Tis toil beyond the care
Of any artisan—beyond the toil
Of him who sweats in war; pale cheek, sunk eyes,
A head with watchings dizzy, and a hair
Made white in youth; such the rewards that wait
On those whose labour is to tend a state.

THE RIGHT HON. CHARLES SHAW LEFEVRE,

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

As a companion to the sketches of the two illustrious chiefs of the contending parties in the state, none can be more appropriate than the portrait of the Speaker of the House of Commons (the chamber of the people) the first commoner of the realm—the guardian of order and decorum in the arena where the fierce and exciting battles of politics are to be fought. The office is one of high dignity, but it also entails great responsibility on its possessor, while its duties are heavy and laborious. Except the judges of the land there is no one office in the state which tasks the energies of the individual man so much. It also requires extreme tact and delicacy in the manner of discharging its duties. The Speaker must have no preference or partialities, personal or political; must be equally attentive to the veriest proser of the assembly, as to the most brilliant and spirit-stirring declaimer; must show the same politeness to the unknown member who "greatly daring" ventures to put a question to "the Right Hon. gentleman," as to the Premier himself when he replies. He must preserve his temper, and be calm and collected when all around him is storm and excitement, and—last and hardest trial of all—must remain awake throughout the drowsiest harangue, when the majority of those who ought to be listeners are sleeping sweetly oblivious of the infliction, stretched on the back benches, or the seats in the galleries, in attitudes which if not exactly such as a Titian would have loved to paint, a Cruikshank might be delighted to copy—their legs crossed like the effigies of Knights Templars on a monument, and with their hats under their heads doing duty as an impromptu pillow. We have witnessed such a scene many times and oft, and the wakefulness of the Speaker under such trying circumstances has filled us with astonishment at what it is within the power of human nature to endure, and left us at a loss whether to ascribe it to a strong sense of duty, or the beneficial influence of green tea. Seriously, the continual attention of the Speaker to what is passing, is absolutely necessary, for he may at any moment be called on to decide a point of order or form, for which he must be always prepared. He is the sole judge in all disputed points of this nature, and his decision is final. A ready obedience is invariably paid to that decision, but in case of contumacy he is, as the depository of the privileges and dignity of the House, invested with ample powers of punishing. The necessity of resorting to such extremities, however, is exceedingly rare, especially when the Speaker possesses the respect and esteem of all parties, which is eminently the case with Mr. Shaw Lefevre.

The present speaker is the son of the late Shaw Lefevre, Esq., formerly member for Reading; he sits in the House as member for North Hampshire, which he has represented from the year 1831. On the retirement of Mr. Abercromby from the chair of the House in 1839, Mr. Shaw Lefevre was proposed by the ministerial party, and was elected by a majority of eighteen over Mr. Goulburn, who was the Conservative candidate for the office. His thorough knowledge of the forms of procedure of the House, his gentlemanly learning and strict impartiality, secured him the confidence and respect of all parties, and in the new parliament of 1841 he was re-elected without opposition. His personal appearance is well calculated to confirm the respect acquired by his talents. He is tall and well formed; his features are prominent, and his courage and demeanour are precisely what would be expected in the first gentleman in the land. He walks up the House to the chair with an air of conscious dignity, that is notwithstanding easy and natural to him; it is seen to reside in the man, and not to be put on with the office or its robes.

LORD J. RUSSELL, M.P.

Lord John Russell, connected by birth with the aristocracy of the land, has pursued the opposite course to his present rival in politics, and thrown himself into the front rank of those who have advocated the cause of Reform. Thus the associations that it might have been supposed would have made him side with the privileged orders of the state have, in his case, been inoperative. But Liberal principles appear to be hereditary in the House of Bedford; the traditions of their line are brightest where they speak of some "scion of their noble stock," who has gained a place in history by his opposition to the pretensions of arbitrary power. The blood of the Lord William Russell, shed upon the scaffold by Charles the Second, by turns indifferent and vindictive, seems to have consecrated all his successors to the cause of freedom. Nor have they disregarded the example.

Lord John Russell is the third and youngest son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, and was born in 1792. Like most of the younger connexions of our noble houses he sought the distinction of a seat in Parliament, at a comparatively early period of life. Here for a long period he was the advocate of all the liberal measures which afterwards, either in his exertions in the opposition or his support when in power, became the law of the land. The repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and the abolition of the Catholic disabilities were in a great degree owing to his unceasing endeavours; and this was at a time when such opinions operated as a certain bar to royal favour or official employment. He introduced the Reform Bill immediately after the Catholic Emancipation, and from two such blows the Tory ministry could not recover. It staggered and fell, and Lord J. Russell found himself included in the new arrangements for carrying on the Government of the country. He was Paymaster of the Forces from 1830 till 1834; in April 1835 he was named Secretary of State for the Home Department, which he held till 1839. Some new arrangements in the Cabinet were then made, and he took the office of Secretary for the Colonies. He remained Colonial Secretary till September, 1841, when the Conservative Ministry came into power. He has represented Tavistock, Huntingdonshire, Stroud, Devon, and Bandon Bridge, but at present he sits as one of the members for the city of London, for which he was returned in the last election. Since he has been out of office he has not taken a very prominent part in politics; he possibly feels that the strength of the opposition is not yet sufficiently consolidated to make an effectual stand against the Conservative Ministry. He gave up attending the House when the last session had little more than half expired, and left all the toils and the honours of the leadership of the opposition, for the remainder of the sitting to Lord Palmerston. Lord J. Russell is an effective speaker, but his matter is often superior to his manner. His voice is not naturally strong, but continued practice in addressing large assemblies has enabled him to use it with distinctness. He is often terse and epigrammatic, and his sarcastic retorts are, generally, exceedingly happy; he is also very successful in his application of an extensive reading in classic, foreign, and English literature. He has a slight hesitation in his manner of speaking, but his sentences are always perfect and grammatical in their construction; they often read better than they appear to be when heard. He has some peculiarities of pronunciation which are not pleasant to the ear: thus, we have never been able to reconcile ourselves to his saying obleege for oblige. These, however, are minor points. Indeed, this absence of fear has been alleged against him as a fault. The Rev. Sydney Smith says, "He would with as little hesitation take the command of the Channel fleet as assume the leadership of the House of Commons." He certainly has two great requisites in the head af a party, moral courage and self reliance.

In person the noble lord is rather diminutive, both in height and breadth. His features are sharp, and not handsome, but they express a great deal of intelligence. He has suffered from ill health, and his family has been visited with much affliction. There is something careworn in his countenance; and, successful as he has been in public life, surrounded as he is by wealth and honours, he has not the appearance of a happy man.

LITERATURE.

BATTLES OF THE BRITISH NAVY, by JOSEPH ALLEN, of Greenwich Hospital. A. H. Baily and Co. 2 vols. 12mo.

The naval history of this country is a favourite subject with most Englishmen, and he is unworthy of the name who does not take a deep and heartfelt interest in the theme. We can never too often repeat that it is to her glorious navy that England owes her greatness. During the middle ages, while her naval strength was inconsiderable, England was but a second-rate power, her insular position rendering the sea her only means of attaining the highest rank. Edward III.'s reign is indeed graced by the splendid maritime victory of Sluys, but this was rather decided by the men-at-arms and land forces embarked than by naval skill and science. Navigation and commerce were fostered by the wise policy of Henry VII. and Elizabeth, and with the growth of maritime power the increase of her general strength and importance kept steady pace, until at length Great Britain, by a slow and toilsome ascent, fighting her way in every age against hosts of jealous rivals and angry adversaries, attained that proud height of supremacy at which she now stands. To the navy we owe our vast colonial dominions, in every quarter of the globe and every climate, from the Arctic circle to the Torrid zone, comprising regions of boundless extent and incalculable resources, from the continent of Australia to the rocky islet of Ascension, where "breaks the long wave that at the pole began." To the navy we owe, also, the most splendid series of military triumphs which history relates, achieved over every nation of Europe, the grateful recollection of which is indelibly impressed on the heart of every lover of his country. If, in future ages, the most valuable portions of the globe shall be covered with nations of English descent, speaking "the tongue that Shakspeare and that Milton spoke," as the inscrutable will of Providence would seem to have determined, to the navy the honour will be due. By means of that service we have been enabled to establish our foreign dominion, and to defend it against all attacks.

There are several histories of the navy, all of which possess many excellences. James's and Brenton's are the most important of modern days. The former is really a wonderful book, from the extent of its details, and the ability and minute accuracy with which they are treated. It, however, embraces only the period of the last war, from 1793 to 1815, or, with the continuation, to 1827. The annals of the navy, during the early periods, and even down to the breaking out of the revolutionary war, are in many respects incomplete and obscure. They are, however, sufficiently well known to impart to the relation authenticity, and the interest which depends on historical truth. Southey's "Lives of the British Admirals" is an excellent work, full of curious information; but that admirable writer was not able to complete the task he had begun. The works we have mentioned, and many others of older date we might name, are unfit, from their great length, or other causes, for a very large class of readers. Mr. Allen's book will supply the wants of those who have not leisure for more bulky volumes. It is a spirited, judicious, and succinct account of the navy from the earliest times, well adapted to become the manual of general readers. The author has selected the most remarkable exploits of our seamen—whether great battles or single-ship actions—distinguished by remarkable bravery and skill, for particular elucidation. This plan is to be commended, since it saves the reader from the fatigue and tedium he has to undergo, in wading through such a mass of uninteresting matter, invariably composed in great part of repetition, as he must encounter in very extensive compilations. We have in the present work abundance of materials, well-chosen, and sufficient to gratify any ordinary curiosity. A feature which gives it much additional interest is the series of admirable portraits of great naval commanders which it contains. These are beautifully engraved from the most approved originals, and are all of them full of expression, character, and force. We may point out those of Howard, of Effingham, and Sir Francis Drake, the conquerors of the Armada; Blake, Monk, Duke of Albemarle, Kempenfelt, Nelson, and Codrington, as especially fine and interesting. There are also many diagrams of the various engagements. We subjoin several extracts, as specimens of the style and nature of the contents.

BATTLE BETWEEN THE DUTCH AND ENGLISH, UNDER MONK, IN 1666.

On the 25th of July the fleets met off the North Foreland. The action was commenced by the white squadron, under Sir Thomas Allen, who at noon engaged Evertzen's squadron; and shortly afterwards the red squadron also engaged De Ruyter, and the fight continued three hours with varied success. Evertzen's squadron was put to flight by Sir Thomas Allen, Everzen, with his vice and rear-admirals, De Vries and Coenders, being killed. Vice-Admiral Banequert's ship was taken, but was afterwards burnt, as was also the Snerk, of 50 guns. The red squadron, under Prince Rupert and the duke, was also successful. the Gueiderland, of 56 guns, De Ruyter's second astern, was disabled, and his squadron was so hardly pressed, that, being deserted by most of his ships, he had to come to close quarters with, and board his squadron to leeward. Tromp's squadron was attacked with equal vigour by Sir Jeremiah Smith and the blue squadron, and so fiercely were the combatants, that both edged off the wind, and separated from the main body of the fleets. Tromp's rear-admiral, Hontuyn, was killed, and his vice-admiral's ship reduced almost to a wreck, having lost upwards of 100 men, killed and wounded. On the part of the English, the Resolution was burnt by a Dutch fire ship. The whole of the Dutch were defeated, and pursued into the Wedings, none lamenting the necessity more than De Ruyter: 20 of their ships are reported to have been sunk or burnt, and 4000 men killed and drowned in this action.

DESTRUCTION OF THE FRENCH FLEET AT LA HOGUE, IN 1692.

At noon on the 23rd, the combined fleet had assembled off La Hogue, and at 3h. P.M., Admiral Russel made the signal for all boats, manned and armed, to proceed to the destruction of the ships in harbour. Vice-Admiral the Honourable George Rooke was appointed to the command of the expedition, and he accordingly shifted his flag into the Eagle, 70, which ship drew little water. The boats, under cover of the guns of the frigates of the squadron, and accompanied by fire-ships, proceeded as the night closed in to the attack; but it was soon found that there was not water sufficient for any but the smallest frigates, for the ships had been all laid aground, and many were high and dry on the sands. The boats, however, proceeded, and notwithstanding a severe fire from the forts and shipping, they boarded six of the ships with very little loss. These were shortly in flames, but the remainder being high up on the shore, and protected by a large body of troops, could not at that time be attempted. On the following morning the boats returned to the attack, and those they had left on the preceding night; in all 16 large and of the line, and many transports. This important service was performed with an almost inconsiderable loss on the part of the English, amounting to no more than ten men killed; and its effect was that of seating William III. much more firmly on his throne, the destruction of that fleet having completely dissipated the hopes and prospects of James. The success was mainly due to the able dispositions of Vice-Admiral Rooke, who afterwards gave many more convincing proofs of his great abilities.

CAPTURE OF THE HERMIONE.

On the 21st of May, the British 28-gun frigate Active, Captain Herbert Sawyer, and 18-gun sloop Favourite, Philemon Pownal, cruizing off Cadiz, in the hope of intercepting a rich ship expected from Lima, discovered and gave chase to the Spanish register ship Hermione. Having arrived up with her Captain Sawyer hailed the frigate, and informing them of the war, requested the Spanish captain to strike. This the captain, being unprovided for a defence, after a short time submitted to, and possession was taken of the most valuable prize which had been taken throughout the war. The net proceeds of the Hermione's cargo amounted to £519,703 18s. 6d., which was thus divided:—

The treasure from the Hermione was landed at Portsmouth, and conveyed to London in twenty waggons, decorated with British colours over Spanish, and under escort of a party of sailors. They made a grand procession, and entered London on the 12th of August, the day on which his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (now Majesty King George IV.) was born, and materially contributed to increase the joy incident on that occasion.

RESULTS OF THE SPANISH WAR OF 1762

No nation ever paid more dearly for ten months' war than did Spain. She lost during this short period the Havannah, with a great part of the island of Cuba, and a large squadron of ships of war; the Philippine Islands, with a great many valuable vessels; the Manilla galleon, and the Hermione. This nation had, on the conclusion of the war, neither fleets, cruizers, nor privateers, sufficient to give any great annoyance to the British commerce; and almost any terms might at that time have been extorted from her. France, also, was reduced to a very low ebb; without a fleet which could question British supremacy, she was compelled to trust only for her offensive operations to frigates and privateers. These, for a time, inflicted much injury upon British traders, but at the end of the war the coasts were nearly freed from their depredations; and the merchants who fitted them out were pretty well tired of such unprofitable speculations.

BATTLE OF ABOUKIR, 1798.

To attempt to eulogise Nelson's conduct, or that of his fleet on this memorable occasion is, we know, a vain thing; but the subject must not be dismissed without comment. Without one exception, the victory in Aboukir Bay is the grandest on record. Whether we take into consideration the determination, the alacrity, or the vigour displayed, or the result, the battle stands unrivalled, and will, probably ever remain so. Not a blemish or the slightest insinuation to the prejudice of one ship is, or has ever been mooted; and this was probably caused by the clearness of the admiral's plans. Each captain knew perfectly well beforehand the wish of the admiral, and gallantly strove to further it. Seamanship and gunnery, unprecedented, attended such an union, and such will ever be the effect of unanimity and skill. The gallant crews of the British, by constant exercising, had attained to such a degree of excellence in point of gunnery as will perhaps never be surpassed.

BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR, 1805.

On the morning of the 23rd Captain Cosmao Kerguelen sailed from Cadiz with a squadron of five sail of the line and five frigates, which latter retook the Santa Ana and Neptuno, and carried them into port. On the 24th the Indomptable, on board which were the survivors of the Bucentaure's crew, making with her own above 1000 men, was wrecked off the town of Rota, and not more than 100 were saved. The San Francisco d'Assis, another of the squadron of Commodore Kerguelen, cut her cables and went on shore near Fort Santa Catalina, where her crew were saved. The Rayo, also of this squadron, not being able to enter Cadiz Bay, anchored off San Lucar, where she soon rolled away her wounded masts, and on this day was captured by the Donegal, 74, Captain Boldero; but two days afterwards the ship parted company and went on shore, and of the 107 men and officers put on board of her by the Donegal, 25 were drowned. The Monarca also drove on shore after the greater part of her crew had been removed by the boats of the Leviathan. The Santissima Trinidad was scuttled and sunk by the Neptune and Prince. The Argle drifted into Cadiz Bay, and was wrecked on the bar of Port Santa Maria on the night of the 24th. The few remaining prizes were at length anchored about six leagues to the westward of Cape San Lucar; and on the 26th the body of the British fleet also brought up a little to the southward of them. The Royal Sovereign lost her fore, main, and mizen masts, and the Mars with main and mizen masts only. On the 29th the Intrepide was burnt by the Britannia, and the San Augustin by the Leviathan and Prince. The argonaut and Swiftsure anchored and sunk by the Ajax. The Berwick was wrecked off San Lucar, 200 of her crew perished with her, the remainder being saved, after much gallant exertion, by the Donegal's boats. The ships Mont Blanc and San Ildefonso, Bahama, and Swiftsure, anchored on the night of the action, and rode out the gale in safety, affording a strong argument in reference to the benefit which might have resulted had the dying injunction of Lord Nelson been attended to. The San Juan Nepomuceno was saved by the exertions of the Phœbe and Donegal.

THE HISTORY AND ANTIQUITIES OF CHARNWOOD FOREST. By T. R. POTTER. With an Appendix on the Geology, Botany, and Ornithology of the District. 1 vol. 4to. Hamilton, Adams, and Co., Paternoster Row.

This is a magnificent volume, printed and got up with all the luxury of typography, and illustrated with splendid lithographed plates. It is devoted to the description of Charnwood, Leicestershire, and the celebration of its historical fame and topographical beauties. Replete with antiquarian and curious information, we commend it to the favour of all who wish to become acquainted with a remarkable portion of their native land, hitherto very imperfectly known. With old Drayton, we say—

> O Charnwood! be thou called the choicest of thy kind:
> The like, in any place, what flood hath kept to find?
> No tract in all this isle—the proudest let it be
> Can show a sylvan nymph in beauty like to thee

LES GLORIEUSES; OU, DEUX FETES ET DEUX VICTOIRES PAR LE CHEVALIER CHATELAIN. London, Hearne and J. Thomas; Paris, Perrin.

This little pamphlet consists of three odes, in the French language, on recent events. British successes at Nankin and Cabul, the Polish Ball at Guildhall, and the Lord Mayor's Day are the themes which the author has chosen for his muse. Like most of the lyric poets of France, his tone is often too narrative and diffuse; but there are some fine vigorous bursts of eloquence. The versification is carefully modelled after J. B. Rousseau, Voltaire, and other French classics. It is occasionally a little rough, but this is entirely attributable to the peculiar inharmonious nature of the French tongue, which is less adapted for most kinds of poetry than any other European language, even that of Holland not excepted. In one passage the chevalier has imitated and surpassed Boileau, who says, in his ode on the taking of Namur by Louis XIV., on the cannon's mouth

> "Vomit le fer et la flamme au loin."

The chevalier's lines are finer—

> "Dont l'effroyable aspect, dans un fougeux transport, > Vomit la victoire—et la mort."

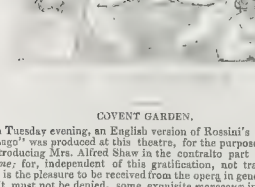
The latter passage gives us another idea beyond that of the mere material of which the balls are composed. Like a good Frenchman and admirer of Boileau, the chevalier will probably consider this exceedingly high praise. We, however, do not entertain a very exalted idea of the merits of that poet. There is one quality, very rare among Frenchmen, which ought to secure a favourable reception for his literary efforts in this country, and that is his kindly feeling towards England, and the manly spirit in which he shows that he can appreciate her numberless claims to greatness. Nevertheless, we regret to perceive, from an amusing correspondence between the Lord Mayor and the chevalier, prefixed to his poem, on the 9th of November, that he has been but scurvily used by that worshipful functionary, to whom he sent



COVENT GARDEN.

On Tuesday evening, an English version of Rossini's "La Donna del Lago" was produced at this theatre, for the purpose, no doubt, of introducing Mrs. Alfred Shaw in the contralto part of Malcome Greme; for, independent of this gratification, not transcendantly great is the pleasure to be received from the opera in general. There are, it must not be denied, some exquisite morceaux in it; but, on the other hand, the style of its music is neither orthodox nor consistent always with its subject, a vice which the gran' maestro himself has introduced, and which too often disfigures with its impertinent monstrosities the most sublime and beautiful of his conceptions. The great feature of the performance was the first scena by Mrs. Shaw, which, in a word, was the perfection of vocal enunciation. To subdivide this general opinion, would be only to give a catalogue of all the various requisites to form a perfect singer; and then again we should be forced synthetically to aggregate them, and present them in an ensemble to the fair representative of Malcolm. Miss Rainforth, in the part of Ellen, sang most charmingly; it is quite delightful to chronicle this amiable young lady's rapid improvement. We have not a doubt of her being very shortly at the head of the department which she cultivates so assiduously, and beg to assure her that such industry never fails to lead to fame and fortune. The other parts of the opera were more respectably than brilliantly filled, and some of the choruses, particularly the Hunters', performed with accuracy and couleur. The opera cannot fail to prove for some time highly attractive; but we anxiously look forward to the production of something that will prove worthy of calling forth Mrs. Shaw's powers to a still greater extent than we have been delighted with, knowing, as we do, that her performance will do ample justice to the noblest conceptions of the minstrel or poet.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

MADAME ALBERTAZZI.—This accomplished vocalist intends visiting us in the course of the season. It is reported she will confine herself solely to the concert-room, and not appear at her Majesty's Theatre, unless the lessee be fortunate enough to induce our fair countrywoman to alter her determination.

RUBINI.—The "prince of tenors" has been reaping a most golden harvest at Berlin, the prices of admission being tripled on the nights of his performance. There is a hope that he will change his intention of retirement from public life, and be heard once more in the Haymarket.

BRAHAM.—Our veteran, or rather evergreen, vocalist arrived with his family last week at Liverpool from America. His son has had immense success in a tour through the States, and, if we may credit report, bids fair to revive the Italian admission of Non c' è Fenore come Braham.

THE PURCELL CLUB.—This delightful society held their annual meeting on Monday last at the Crown and Anchor; Professor Taylor, the founder, in the chair. The English musicians of the present day cannot be too deeply grateful to that gentleman, who, while he is mainly instrumental in making them acquainted with the greatest productions of the Continent, never forgets the national glory of his own country, and the undoubted claims to the highest rank in musical fame which many of his compatriots exhibited, and "highest above the rest" Henry Purcell. Though not to know something of the soul-soothing productions of this great man would argue oneself unknown, yet in truth how very little, after all, is the musical world of the present day acquainted with them beyond hearsay, or that traditional fame which has been bequeathed to us by our forefathers, and which proves to us the humiliating fact that we have degenerated in our musical taste, and have substituted noodles for sense, and unmeaning or opposite phrases for those sandnand graces which, according to the fanciful Plato, wander through the spheres till they are happily "married to immortal verse." Our modern musicians, the greater part, might be adapted to fifty different characters of sentiments, and hence fail to make that lasting impression which the worthies of by-gone days produced by their rigid and interpreting adherence to their text. Such is the music of the great Purcell—such music will never be obsolete; for it is founded on truth, not caprice or fashion of a day; and although it may occasionally sleep its century or two in general oblivion, yet when wakened from its trance by the devotion of an intelligent and enthusastic pilgrim like Professor Taylor, it wake is into new life and beauty, and shows how superiorly they could "raise the song and strike the harp" of old. Many compositions were performed on Monday which had not had utterance for a century and a half, but which plunged every one in the pleasant surprise of hearing the most pure and graceful melody breathing through the most learned counterpoint that perhaps was ever written by any master. Amongst these was the Coronation Anthem composed for James II., the Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, and another anthem, all of which were beautifully executed by a host of distinguished professionals, who, perhaps, never in their life-time before had enjoyed such a vocal treat as was set before them by the good taste and well directed enthusiasm of the worthy founder of the feast—Professor Taylor. The frequent meetings of this society would do more good towards the resuscitation of the greatest vocal school that ever existed, than all the adaptations and importations which we could lay our hands upon stealing, or in the words of Johnson, "naturalising useless foreigners to the injury of ourselv.-

M. BALFE.—It seems odd to prefix the abbrev ation of Monsieur to an Irishman's name, but so it is, and accordingly we announce that the Maladie-Francais gave his second private concert a few nights since at Paris. The selections on the occasion were nearly the same as those of the first soirée, as were the singers also, with the addition of the Prince de Belgiojoso, a tenor, who is styled the Rubini of amateurs. As on the previous night, several delicious morceaux (the compositions of the host) called forth the highest commendations, and Madame Viardot Garcia, as before, electrified a most numerous audience.

M. BENEDICT.—The libretto of the new opera by this able composer, which was originally written by Linley, then altered by Charley, has, we learn, been finally pieuché for representation, and will be speedily put in rehearsal at Covent Garden.

ANCIENT CONCERTS. The Queen's Concerts of Ancient Music have been fixed to take place as follow -March 15 and 29, April 26, May 3, 10, 17, 24, and 31.

PHILHARMONIC. —The Concerts of the Society for the season will take place in the following order -March 20, April 3 and 17, May 8 and 22, June 5 and 19, and July .

The Master-General of the Ordnance desires it to be notified, for general orders, that, in consideration of the gallantry displayed by the Royal Artillery, when serving with the troops recently employed under the orders of Lieutenant-General Sir Hugh Gough, upon the coast and in the rivers of China, her Majesty has been graciously pleased to permit the Royal Artillery to bear upon their appointments the word "China," and the device of the dragon, in commemoration of their distinguished services.

After a continuous tour of home duty, the long duration of which is unprecedented in the military annals of this country, the 7th Dragoon Guards have at length been placed under orders for foreign service. They are to proceed to the Cape of Good Hope so soon as the requisite arrangements for their conveyance thither can be completed. It has also been determined to send the 1st battalion of the 60th Regiment to the same station

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

TOTAL LOSS OF THE ARUNDEL YACHT ON THE SUSSEX COAST.—To the melancholy list of wrecks consequent on the late boisterous weather, another calamity, occurring on our own coast, is now added, in the total loss of the Arundel, bound for Hong Kong and Macao, which took the ground on Winchelsea-reach, about half-past one o'clock, a.m., on Saturday, and soon after became a perfect wreck. A narrative of the circumstances has been given in a private letter from the commander, Captain Richardson, from which we give the following extracts:—The Arundel left Gravesend on Thursday week for the Downs, under the care of Mr. Davidson, senior pilot to her Majesty, who conducted the squadron on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Scotland. She arrived safe in the Downs, and anchored during the same night. On the next morning the signal was made, weighed and chanae. against a strong westerly wind. All seems to have gone on well up to midnight on Friday week, at which time she was off Dungeness. In beating up the Sussex coast, it appears that Mr. Davidson, presuming the ship's well-known excellent sailing qualities, must have run too near the shore, as a quarter past one on the following morning the soundings were taken at the rate of ten not appear to have attracted any particular attention. About half-past the next cast the vessel was discovered to be in shallow water. The pilot instantly put the helm down, but before the track of the vessel could be influenced by it she struck heavily, and soon after became firmly imbedded in the sand. The sea was running very high at this time, and blue lights were burnt, and other signals fired, to attract attention and show their distressed situation to any of the coast-guard who might happen to be on shore. The ship made no water, but thumped heavily for two hours. At three o'clock, a.m., Lieutenant Ralph came off to their assistance, with a boat's crew, on the life boat, from Rye. Captain Richardson at once determined on committing to his care the passengers, Mr. Vince Paris and Mr. Cairns, together with Mr. Guildford Richardson and Mr. Emsworth, who were mere's accompanying Captain Richardson. After a quarter of an hour's have left the ship with the pilot. There being no longer any hope of saving her, the boats were ordered to be lowered, and so marked was the attention and discipline of the crew, that within five minutes after the order was given they were in the water. Captain Richardson then ordered all hands to embark, and having satisfied himself that no person remained on board, got into the boat. Within five minutes after the crew had pulled over the deck of the ill-fated Arundel. The escape of the crew, under the circumstances, seems to have been miraculous. They were more than three hours in reaching the shore, although the distance scarcely exceeds a mile and a half. They were, however, fortunately, at length successful, and on their arrival found Lieutenant Ralph awaiting them on the beach. The indefatigable zeal of this gentleman, in his endeavours to save the ship, is spoken of in the highest terms by Captain Richardson. The Arundel was, we know, as one of the finest vessels belonging to the Royal Yacht Squadron, and was built by the late Duke of Norfolk, from the timber on his own estate. At the sale of the late duke's property, she was purchased by Captain Richardson, who intended her for the local trade in China, her peculiar build and extraordinary sailing qualities adapting her for that service especially. She was laden with general merchandise, partly on the owner's account and partly on private merchants. She carried out only two passengers, Mr. Cairns and Mr. Vince Paris

TOTAL LOSS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY'S WAR-STEAMER ARIADNE.—By a private letter, received on Monday, as regret to announce the total loss of the splendid war steamer Ariadne, in the service of the Hon. East India Company, attended with melancholy consequences, which occurred at about eleven o'clock at night, on the 23rd of June last, near the entrance of Chusan harbour. The Ariadne was an iron built steamer, about 400 tons burthen, with two powerful engines. She was constructed upon a new principle, for the purpose of navigating the Chinese rivers. The draught of water was very considerable, and about 50 feet from one paddle-box to the other. She carried two swivelled guns of large calibre on deck, and the other before the mast. The British fleet in China, during the late war, rendered the most valuable service from the Ariadne and four other small steamers belonging to the navy of the Hon East India Company. The rock upon which she struck was not before known, and was within a very short distance of the position taken up by the Algerine. It is sharp and ragged, and has not more than three or four feet cover at the time she struck. The bottom of the steamer was completely perforated, and the compartment in which the engines instantly filled with water Prompt assistance was directly rendered by the squadron, and all the cargo and her bottom, which, in some measure, stopped the leak. She was afterwards taken in tow by the Algerine, and conveyed to Chusan, and placed upon a dock. From several letters which have reached this country, it appears that the steamer afterwards set off the bank upon which she had been hauled on necessity, and the water rapidly flowed into her hold and different compartments. The boats were s.. instantly launched, and they succeeded in saving the officers and all on board, excepting three Chinese. These poor fellows went down with the vessel, and perished. Extract of a letter, dated "H. M. S. Cornwallis, October 24.—The Ariadne is, I regret to say, irretrievably lost. The attempts made to raise her have proved unsuccessful. She went down with 9 fathoms water." Upon inquiries at the East India House, we ascertained that the above was perfectly correct Despatches had been received from Sir William Parker confirmatory of the fact. It was supposed that the vessel was insured for the value of the steamer; she was not insured. The officers are reported to have been since conveyed to Bombay, to undergo examination before a court-martial.

LOSS OF A GREEK BRIG BY RAME HEAD, NEAR DEVONPORT. The Greek brig Taxarcos, Carlo Vafiopulo master, was wrecked on the Rame Head, near Mount Edgcumbe, on Friday night week, under the following truly strange and provoking circumstances:—She was from the Danube, and had a cargo of bones, with which she was bound to Hull. She put in at Falmouth, and took a pilot on board to navigate her on the coast. He having occasion to go below, gave directions for the vessel to be steered south-east. Her course, however, was steered by mistake to the north-east, and it was a fair wind, and hazy at the time, and the brig having her studding-sails set, she sailed over a considerable distance in a very short time, and was almost high and dry on the rocks on the south-east side of the headland before any one on board knew of their locality. The crew and pilot, finding danger approaching, saved themselves, only one man sustaining serious injury. The vessel is fast breaking up, and very little will be saved from her. A box, containing money and some valuable articles, was picked up on Sunday on the opposite side of the coast off the Yealm. It is supposed to be the property of the captain of the unfortunate Taxarcos

A letter has been addressed to the Chamber of Commerce of Havre, from the head of the marine department of that town, containing the statement of a person named Careon, the master of the fishing-smack, the Mercenne, of Honfleur, relative to the foundering of two vessels on the 13th inst.—one a three-master of about 600 tons, and the other a brig, both appearing to be English. Cardon states that this occurred off Beachy Head. He tried to assist the brig, but the weather was so exceedingly rough that he could not succeed in his intentions as rapidly as he wished. He picked up a cotton jacket, probably belonging to one of the men, and as the vessel went down he could perceive a sort of sun, and the letters WOU.. painted on a yellow ground.

SONNET

I often follow in the wake of Time
To mark the shipwrecks of his stormy wing
He cares not if a joy have reach'd its prime,
Or if it be but in its infant spring!
One only seems his ever-anxious toil,
And that's to be buoyant for
To everything of beauty—aye, to spoil
Wnate'er in this poor man's estate may grow
Like desert-flow'rs to cheer him 'mid the waste!
And then I ask of cruel Time to know
What kind of joy or pleasure can he taste
In laying e'en earth's fairest children now?
To which Time answers, with a ghastly glare,
"I love to strew the grave with sweets most rare!"—W

PHILOSOPHY OF HEAT.

"Well, my little fellow," said a certain professor to a sucking philosopher, whose mamma had been teasing the learned knight to test the astonishing abilities of her boy, "what are the properties of heat?" "The chief property of heat is, that it expands bodies, while cold contracts them." "Very good, indeed: can you give me a familiar example?" "Yes, sir: in summer, when it is hot, the day is long; while in winter, when it is cold, it becomes very short." The earned knight stopped his examination, and was lost in amazement that so familiar an instance should have escaped his observation.

INCOME TAX

The following is the return to the Income Tax Commissioner, by a village surgeon, residing in the county of Devon:—

I'm sorry to make so sad a confession
Of the profits that emanate from my profession;
But the fact is, that most of the villages round
With surgeons, quack doctors, and druggists abound;
So much so that I am unable to clear
The sum of a hundred and fifty per year.
It would give me much pleasure could I return double,
And save myself all this additional trouble;
But opponents and bad debts beyond all redemption
Compel me to fill out this claim of exemption;
And what makes the matter so very much worse,
I've a wife and three children, and no private purse
So from these sample facts the collector must see
He can gather no tax upon income from me

VERY NECESSARY AT THESE TIMES

When a man is always talking of his solicitor and suits of law, I suspect him of being a fool or a knave. When a tradesman writes up his name in small letters, adding 'from Flint's, or as Flint's, &c., to appear as if the shop belonged to Flint, &c., suspect him of having very little capital and connexion. When a man talks largely of the bargains he has made, the goods he has shipped, or the extent of his trade, suspect him to be in the high road to bankruptcy.

A PROFLIGATE.

The Morning Post, publishes at Cincinnati, relates the following anecdote of a young gentleman of that city, who had expended a large fortune, money, lands, negroes, everything, in a course of intemperance and profligacy. He had just paid a last year's grog bill of 800 dollars. One day he was walking in the street very scarcely, when, seeing a physician on the opposite side, he called out to him, saying he wanted him to come over "Doctor," said he, "I wish you'd just take a look down my throat." "I don't discover anything, Sir," said the doctor, after looking very carefully. "You don't," said he, "why that's strange, will you be kind enough, sir, to give another look?" "Really, Sir," said the doctor, after a second look, "I can discover nothing." "Well," said he, "doctor, there is a farm, 10,000 dollars, and 20 negroes gone down there!"

A CONSCIENTIOUS DISSENTER.

An amusing scene occurred at the late sessions at Durham. A witness was called into the box, and was told that he must take the oath in the usual form, as it was thought, to be sworn. But when told, as usual, to kiss the book, he demurred, on the ground of "conscientious" objections, when the following colloquy occurred: Clerk: Are you a Quaker?—Witness: No; I am a Baptist. Clerk: You must kiss the book, sir.—Witness: This book tells me I am to swear not at all. Clerk: You must kiss the book, or you will not be allowed to give evidence. These words seemed like music to the "conscientious" Dissenter, his scruples immediately vanished, and he hastily rammed the book to his lips, amidst roars of laughter from the whole court.

SECRET, OR INVISIBLE WRITING.

Procure some very thin stance, with which write with a quill pen (which should be used for nothing else) any thing that fancy may dictate. After it is dry perfectly; examine the paper upon which you have written, and not one letter can be distinguished by the naked eye, however acute the power of vision may be; but, to ascertain it with a microscope, and be the instrument ever so delicate you will not discover the slightest trace of writing, nor will it appear by heating. Procure a little iodine, which is an elementary body, dissolve it in water, and, with a camel's hair pencil, or any other convenient article, dipped in the solution, slightly run the paper on the side which has been written upon; the writing will instantly appear as distinctly visible as if written with the finest ink that ever was invented.

OH! SHALL WE NE'ER SING, LOVE, TOGETHER AGAIN

For music—by Mrs. Edward Thomas.

Dost remember the song, in affection's young day,
We sang, while the violets flung perfume around;
As screen'd from the fervour of noon's ardent ray,
We spent the fleet hours in autumn's deep profound.
Life then was a vision, we knew nought of pain,
Oh! shall we ne'er sing, love, together again?

Since that time—Oh, what changes! the world cuvies me,
And it thinks with each treasure of fortune I'm blest;
But I'm beggar'd in joy, since I sang, love, with thee,
Of the treasures of hope that then earner'd my breast
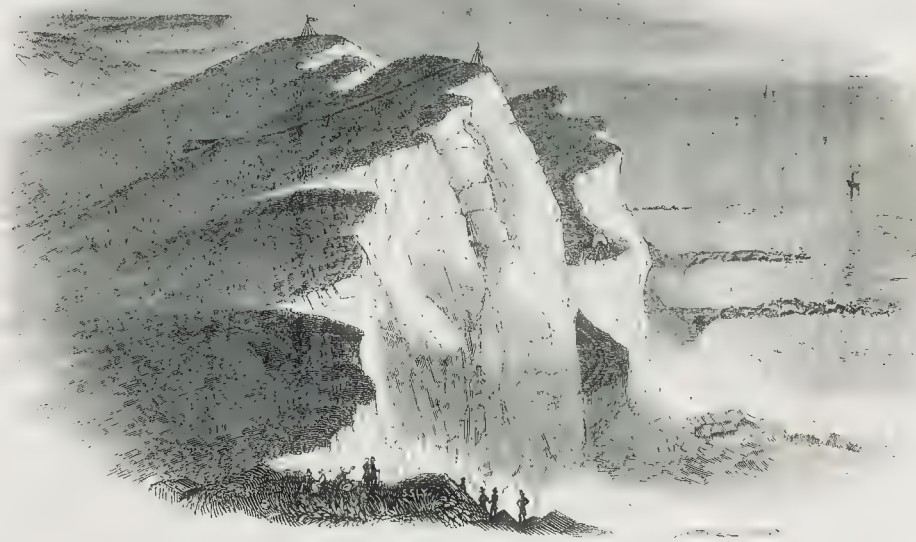
Vast for youth's musings, so easy, so vain;
Yet, shall we ne'er sing, love, together again?

SUNDAY TRADING.

We are indebted to the Liverpool Chronicle for the following morceau, illustrative of the present inefficient state of the law regarding Sunday trading:—On Monday last, a diminutive and sickly-looking boy, of about twelve years old, who gave the name of Peter Priggins, was brought up before Mr. Rushton, charged by policeman 42 with attempting, on the previous night, to pick a gentleman's pocket at the Post office. The policeman stated that he observed several boys mingling amongst the gentlemen who were receiving their letters, and that he at last detected the prisoner inserting his hand into a gentleman's pocket. The boy, however, finding himself observed, endeavoured to escape, but was pursued and captured by witness The worthy magistrate, after commenting in his usual impressive manner upon the heinousness of the offence, and more especially on the additional guilt incurred by its having been committed on the Lord's day, was about to pass sentence, when he was interrupted by a somewhat singular looking individual who stood up, and addressing himself to the bench, stated that the prisoner was "the boy of a respectable tradesman, and, besides, was in the employ of Mr. Robson, a tailor, in Bold-street." "Why, then, the policeman was following his lawful calling on the Lord's day (here he referred to a newspaper which he held in his hand), and if he hadn't no business to be following his ordinary calling, he had no business to be takin' the boy, and consequently he takin' was illegal. Here's the hand (and he held forth the newspaper and read the quotation from the act, 'that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever, shall or do exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their ordinary calling on the Lord's day,' and then he continued) now, everybody knows that a peeler ain't a tradesman, or a labourer, or anything so respectable, but it is clear that he is a 'other person whatsoever.' As to what is said about 'juden generus,' I don't know what that means; but a peeler can't be a 'judens generus,' coz he is a peeler."—Mr. Rushton said that the point was raised with considerable ability by the applicant, and he felt great difficulty in knowing how to deal with the case He thought that if the policeman were excluded from Lord Testerden's meaning of 'judens generis," the taking was illegal, and he felt disposed, in this instance, to give the boy the benefit of the doubt, and he would do so the more readily if the applicant would promise to look after the morals of the boy in the future. He should like to know who was the applicant's occupation. Applicant: "Occupation? I belongs to the profession."—Mr. Dowling observed to Mr. Rushton that the applicant was well known to the police as a notorious and successful burglar, but that he had hitherto escaped conviction. Here the applicant looked Mr. Dowling steadily in the face, and then brought the end of his thumb in contact with the point of his nose.—Mr. Rushton hoped that he would not make any disrespectful signals in that court.—The applicant replied that "he didn't mean nothing, but he knowed the hacts of Parliament too well to get convicted."—Mr. Rushton (to the boy): "What, are you brought up as a professed thief?"—Boy: "To be sure I is."—Mr. Rushton: "Then I fine you 5s. for carrying on your ordinary occupation on the Lord's day."



ROUND DOWN CLIFF (THE SHAKSPERE IN THE DISTANCE), VIEWED FROM THE DIRECTORS' PAVILION.

GREAT BLAST ON THE LONDON AND DOVER RAILWAY.

DESTRUCTION OF THE ROUND DOWN CLIFF BY GUNPOWDER.

"Archimedes, the primitive engineer, is said to have boasted he could lift the world if he were provided with a lever long enough, and a fulcrum adequate to the mighty occasion. The greatness of his genius is seen in the boldness of the conception. This, however, was a "vain imagination;" and such was the character of most of the splendid chimeras of antique philosophy. But, guided by the spirit of our immortal Bacon, it has become the exclusive attribute of the modern engineer, to plan only that which his experience tells him to be practicable, and to bound his brightest fancies by the principles of working science. Hence, his movements, however far they may be in advance of customary labours, cease to bear the character of experiments. It is in this way we have lived to witness "a mountain cast into the sea," with as little apparent effort as the "twinking of an eye"—with the proverbial precision of an eclipse, and, at the same time, with a gentleness which, in its calm sublimity, is only comparable to "the outgoings of the morning." The glory of this miracle—its conception, its arrangement, its triumph—belongs to the celebrated engineer, William Cubitt; and the memorable locality in which it was performed is the proudest of those proud cliffs, whose "high and bending heads look fearfully" in those narrow seas, of which we hold the perpetual sovereignty.

The occasion which calls us to make these remarks is the destruction of the Round Down Cliff, Dover, on Thursday, 26th January, by gunpowder. We were present, and were so charmed by the scientific victories of the day, that for the gratification of our "million" readers, we unhesitatingly went to the expense of having a series of drawings made for their exact, as well as pictorial, illustration. These we shall now proceed to exhibit and describe.

The announcement that an explosion of 18,500 lbs. of gunpowder was to be made in the Round Down Cliff drew to that romantic spot a congress of our most eminent scientific men, a vast assemblage of the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood, besides a numerous sprinkling of continental travellers "en route," and curious Frenchmen from the adjacent coasts. The lower orders of Dover, terrified by the broadside "CAUTION:" bills with which the town was posted, watched the anticipated destruction of their windows at home, or, with their children, took up their positions at respectful distances on the distant hills. Many ladies were present, and an enthusiastic curiosity led them to the "very brim" of those dizzy cliffs, from which, even on a summer's day, they would have shrunk with terror. We are not quite sure that, as the moment of explosion approached, and the hearts of the valiant waxed faint, numbers of the gentlemen who, in the courage of early dawn, had betted "not a bonnet would be present," were alone kept from running away by their brave example.

Round Down, rising 375 feet above the level of the sea, is the central and highest point of the celebrated range of chalk cliffs which run from Folkstone to Dover. On the west, towards Folkstone, the line is terminated by Abbot's Cliff, and on the east, adjoining Dover, by the well known Shakspere's Cliff. These hills are separated from the main heights by a shallow valley, through which winds the bye-road to Folkstone. Ascending from the vale they slope upwards by gentle curves to their escarpment, which presents a majestic front to the ocean of about five miles in extent, and an average height of 350 feet. This front is nearly perpendicular; but varied here and there by bold projections, which divide the beach at their feet into corresponding spaces. One of these protruding rocks—the head and front of the Round Down Cliff—it was the business of the day to remove; but to understand the reasons which prompted this noble undertaking, we must make our readers acquainted with the works now in progress for continuing the south-east railway from Folkstone to Dover.

At Folkstone, between Cheriton Downs, and East Wear Bay, the valley is to be traversed by a viaduct of great height and length. This is to be succeeded by a tunnel, called from a martello tower near it, the Tower Tunnel, one third of a mile in length. Then follows, in a line parallel with the base of the main-land hills, as they approach the sea, a deep cutting though the chalk and superincumbent strata, two miles in length, called, after a neighbouring eminence, Warren's Cutting. Then comes the Abbot's Cliff Tunnel, one mile and a quarter in length, and now half finished, although only commenced on the 16th of August last. From the Abbot's Cliff Tunnel the railroad will be under the cliffs, close to the sea, and protected from it by a strong wall of solid masonry two miles long, and with a parapet of such a height as will not preclude passengers from the splendid marine view which lies under them. This sea-wall will support the railway to the point at which it enters the Shakspere Tunnel. But it was found, that its direct course was stopped by the projection of the Round Down Cliff, and that this must in some way or other be removed. To tunnel it was impracticable; to dig it down would have cost £10,000, and an expenditure of twelve months' time. It was resolved by a single blast to take it out of the way—the resolution has been successfully effected, and its ruins are at present spread smoothly on "the unnumbered idle pebbles" of the shore, to form, by a fortunate accident, the platform of a grand Channel Pier for the Company.

Our readers will now be able to picture clearly to themselves the scene of action, and the general character of the difficulties to be overcome. We shall proceed to narrate the events of the day in the order of their occurrence, together with such technical details as may be necessary. The scientific visitors, the directors, the reporter of the Times, and our artist, Mr. Stephen Sly, accompanied by Mr. William Cubitt, the engineer, and Mr. John Whitehead, secretary of the company, and their friends, assembled at breakfast at the Ship Inn, and proceeded shortly after ten o'clock to view the Shakspere Tunnel, in which a blue light was fired to make the unique peculiarities of its situation and arrangements visible. This noble soutterraine is rather more than three-quarters of a mile in length, divided throughout, in the manner of the Thames Tunnel, by a pier 10 feet thick, each tunnel 12 feet wide and 30 feet high. This duplication of structure, together with the parabolic form of its arches, adds immensely to its strength. They are ventilated by seven shafts, which pass upwards to the surface of the cliff, their average height being 190 feet, the highest 207 feet, and by eight galleries, which run from the southern tunnel to the sea, the longest about 600 feet in length. Through these galleries the chalk was conveyed during the progress of excavation. The whole of the south tunnel is faced with brick, and most of the northern, except where, from the extreme hardness of the chalk, it was considered unnecessary. Our engraving of the Shakspere Cliff exhibits the line of towers on the top of the ventilating shafts, and the section of the tunnel, with the relative proportions of its parts. The company in their progress through the tunnel were greatly delighted by the magical effects produced by the reflected lights thrown from an efflorescence of nitrate of lime, whose crystals everywhere bedecked the walls.

On emerging from the tunnel, the huge rampart formed by the projecting cliff of the Round Down was seen at about two hundred feet in advance, bestriding the beach, and opposing an impassable obstacle to the passage of the railway in that direction. The company were then conducted to its base, and the arrangements for its destruction by the dreaded blast explained. These we shall now describe. A small arched drift-way, or tunnel, 300 feet in length, running from east to west, was pierced through the bottom of the cliff; from this, at nearly equal distances, three well-like shafts were sunk, and from these again proceeded three horizontal galleries. At the end of each gallery a chamber was prepared, with a box for the gunpowder. The centre box contained 75 barrels, and the eastern and western 55 each, making in the whole the unparalleled charge of 185 barrels, or 18,500 lbs. The gunpowder was placed in upright bags, the mouths open, and powder sprinkled very thickly between them. Two bursting charges were placed in each box, by which ignition in two places in each charge was produced at the same instant, and the simultaneous action of the whole charge very much facilitated. These charges were placed 70 feet from each other, the centre one (the point of greatest resistance) 90 feet, and the lateral ones 70 feet from the face of the cliff. The apparently dangerous work of packing the powder and inserting the firing-wires in the bursting-charges was completed in three hours, on Tuesday afternoon, by Mr. Hodges, the assistant engineer, and Corporal Rae, of her Majesty's Sappers and Miners. The chambers and contents were then carefully examined and approved by General Pasley and Lieutenant Hutchinson, and the galleries and shaft closed up with tightly rammed chalk and sand. The chalk to be scattered by this latent power was calculated at about 500,000 tons; but the quantity actually removed has proved to be upwards of 1,000,000 tons.

The directors and their visitors, having had these points fully explained, together with some very interesting narratives of various preliminary experiments, took a last circuit round the base of the cliff, and proceeded by a zigzag stair, cut in an adjoining cliff, to the downs at top, and thence to the battery, to inspect the apparatus for generating and conducting the galvanic "fire" to the charges. On the slope of the cliff a wooden shed was constructed, in which was placed a triple set of immense compound batteries, each one consisting of three sets of Daniel's batteries of six cylinders each, and two plate batteries, of twenty plates each. From each of these batteries a wire was conducted over the cliff to a powder chamber, where it terminated in a bifurcated point of platina which the galvanic fluid, as it passed over them, heated to an intense white heat, to ignite the powder. These wires were composed and formed of stout copper wires placed round a rope, to which they were firmly attached by a coil of spun yarn, and the whole again wound round and covered by well-tarred yarn. These wires were about 2200 feet in length. Five large charcoal fires, to dissipate damp, completed the arrangements. By this time a multitude of distinguished visitors, including the officers of the Dover garrison, had reached the downs, and, joining the directors and their scientific friends, were shown to a commodious pavilion, built for their reception on the edge of the cliff, at about a quarter of a mile from the point of explosion. Among the number we noticed Sir John Herschell, Professors Sedgwick, Barlow, and Gregory, Professor Airy, the astronomer royal, Rev. Dr. Cope, Principal of Addiscombe, General Pasley, Colonel Rice Jones, Mr. Rice, M.P., Lady Herschell and her son, Mrs. Airy, and, we believe, several fair members of the Radnor, Filmer, and Knatchbull families. Curiosity was now at its height; admiration—in which, if Burke on the Sublime be true, fear is an essential ingredient—thrilled in every nerve; speculations of the wildest, funniest, and most fearful character, struggled with each other for common audience. "What," said Professor Sedgwick, "what, if there should be a concealed fissure, a blunted chasm in the cliff beneath us? A smart vibration might throw it open!" "What then?" cried a ghastly querist. "We shall be swallowed up," groaned one. "Swallowed down!" sighed another. But still still the fascination of the cliff and its eighteen thousand pounds of gunpowder was irresistible; and, though many fidgetted to be gone, no one budged an inch. At this time three steamers, gaily dressed with flags, passed the fated field, fired a few popgun salutes, and prudently retired to an anchorage a mile off. Half an hour of funereal suspense succeeded, when a prodigious movement was excited by the discharge of half a dozen thumping blasts on the face of Abbot's cliff. The multitude bowed their heads like corn before the breeze; every one looked, and looked, and smiled—but there was "no speculation in their eyes." What on earth had happened? and, worse still, what was about to happen? Eighteen thousand pounds of gunpowder was the visible thought stamped upon every countenance. The cause, however, of the alarm was soon discovered, and, as the smoke rolled past, the workmen were thanked for their politeness.

To prevent, as far as human precaution could prevent, the possibility of accident, a certain portion of the summit of Round Down Cliff was marked out by striped red and white flags, and the police and the privates of the Artillery (of whom a company was present) were empowered to let no person intrude within the line so marked out. The following bill was also conspicuously placarded in all parts of Dover, and in the roads and streets leading to the cliff:—

BLAST AT THE ROUND DOWN CLIFF.—CAUTION.

Persons are particularly cautioned and requested to keep on the outside of the ground marked off by the range of flags; a nearer approach to the blast being considered dangerous. The cliff under which the powder is placed will be distinguished by a red flag, which will be taken down five minutes before the blast takes place.

January 26, 1843. JOHN WRIGHT, Resident Engineer.

At nine o'clock this morning a red flag was hoisted directly over the spot selected for the explosion. The wires were then tested by the galvanometer, the batteries charged, and every arrangement completed for firing them.

It was arranged that the explosion should take place at two o'clock, and, in order that the public might be prepared for it, the following account of the signals to be used was very generally circulated on the ground:—

SIGNALS. January 26, 1843

1st. Fifteen minutes before firing, all the signal flags will be hoisted—2nd. Five minutes before firing, one gun will be fired, and all the flags will be hauled down.—3rd. One minute before firing, two guns will be fired, and all the flags, except that on the point which is to be blasted, will be hoisted again.

Two o'clock came, and all persons were ordered to leave the battery-house, except Lieut. Hutchinson, who undertook to fire the centre battery; Mr. John Wright, the resident engineer, and Mr. Hodges, the assistant engineer, who respectively took the western and eastern batteries. The general interest now became painfully intense—a dead silence prevailed.

"The choughs and crows that wing the midway air" were heard to chatter with a horrid distinctness. At ten minutes past two Mr. Cubitt ordered the signal-flag at the directors' pavilion to be hoisted, and that was followed by the hoisting of all the rest. The air was still, the sea was calm, the murmuring surges gently laved the cliff's huge foot. Was this fair scene to be the prelude to disaster? A quarter of an hour passed in waking dreams—a year-long minute succeeded, when a shell with a lighted fuse was thrown over the cliff, from which it bounded to the beach, and burst with an astounding report, followed by echoes from the hills, which had the effect of sharp fusilades of musketry. All the flags were then hauled down. Four minutes more passed away; two guns were fired, and all the flags except that on the point to be blasted were again hoisted. The "one minute before firing" was reached: it passed in exquisite courage-screwing tumult. "Now! now!" shouted the eager multitude, and at precisely 26 minutes past two o'clock a dull, muffled, booming sound was heard, accompanied for a moment by a heavy jolting movement of the earth which caused the knees to smite. The mines were fired! In an instant the bottom of the cliff appeared to dissolve, and to form by its melting elements a hurried sea-borne stream. The superincumbent mass, to the extent of 500 feet, was then observed to separate from the mainland, and as the dissolution of its base was accomplished, to sink without subsidence, to the beach. In two minutes its descent and dispersion were accomplished. The huge volleys of ejected chalk, as they swelled the lava-like stream, seemed to roll inwards upon themselves, crushing their integral blocks, and then to return to the surface in smaller and coalescing forms. The mass seemed to ferment—to be splitting—expanding, fleeing, under the influence of an unseen but uncontrollable power. There was no roaring explosion, no bursting out of fire, and what is very remarkable, not a single wreath of smoke, for a mighty agent had done its work under an amount of pressure which almost matched its energies: the pent-up fires were held in their intensity till all smoke was consumed, and when their "dogs of war" were actually let loose they were even then compelled to "do their spiriting gently." A million tons of weight and a million tons of cohesion held the reins. When the turf at the top of the cliff had risen nearly to the level of the beach, the stream of debris had extended a distance of 1200 feet and covered a surface of more than fifteen acres! The moment the headlong course of the chalk had ceased and the fruition of every one's hopes accomplished, a simultaneous cry was raised of "Three cheers for the engineer!" William Cubitt was then honoured with as hearty a huzza as ever burst from the lips of a grateful people. An epoch in our history had passed; a precedent had been established whose effects on future time no one could forebode; it had been demonstrated that the most powerful, the most mysterious, agency in nature was under computable regulations and the easiest control. The people felt this, and in their generosity called for "one cheer more." These congratulations penetrated the gloom of the battery-house and dissipated the fears of the operators, for we have it on their own authority, "so slight was the noise or the shock that the impression on their minds was the fire had failed until the cheers of the spectators undeceived them, their situation preventing them from witnessing the result."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BAIL COURT.

LAST DAY OF TERM.

THE BARON DE BODE v. THE QUEEN

The Attorney General applied to the court upon the part of the Crown, for a rule calling upon the Baron de Bode to show cause why the present case, which stands for trial at the sittings after the present term, should be stood over to a period to be fixed by the court, upon showing cause against the rule. The case is an issue from the Court of Chancery upon the subject of the Baron de Bode's claim for compensation, the forfeit which have been made upon an affidavit of the assistant-solicitor to the Treasury, who deposed that he had been, up to a very recent period, employed in the investigation of documents, and that, in consequence of the necessary extent of his inquiries, it would be impossible to be sufficiently prepared upon the part of her Majesty, if the trial were to come on at the time for which it was at present appointed. It would be necessary for the decision of the case to take into consideration questions of French and of German law in reference to the treaties by which the Baron de Bode had become an alien subject in respect to which the controversy had arisen. Questions of great importance and difficulty respecting the construction of treaties between this country and France would also arise at the trial, as well as questions connected with the particular municipal law of France, in reference to which it would be necessary to produce upon the trial some eminent members of the bar in that country—The application was granted.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—WEDNESDAY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Evans)

WILLIAMS AND MOTTRAM'S BANKRUPTCY.

This bankruptcy, which has been so often before the public, was finally disposed of on Wednesday. The bankrupt Mottram applied for his certificate, supported by Mr. Wright as his counsel. The certificate was opposed by Mr. E. James, on the part of the assignees. The case seemed to excite considerable interest, the court being very much crowded throughout the proceedings.—His honour, on coming to this case, said that it was one in which the person applying for a certificate had, in conjunction with his partner (Williams), embraced a large quantity of goods immediately before the issuing of the fiat. He afterwards presented himself before that court, and on his oath twice denied the fact. He was, however, ultimately compelled, by the admissions of his partner, to acknowledge the truth. That was a material feature in the case about to be discussed. Mr. E. James then proceeded to detail the facts of the case. There were a few salient points in the case to which he would call the attention of the court. The estate had paid a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the pound. There was no private estate of Mottram, because he had paid his private creditors with the sums received from the joint estate. The bankrupts commenced business in January, 1840, with a capital lodged at Smith, Payne, and Smiths, of £21,000, the most part of which was, however, borrowed money and accomodation bills. From that period they continued in business down to their bankruptcy in 1841. The firm was insolvent in the November which followed the commencement of business.—His honour said it was within his own recollection that such was the fact. Williams made the only reparation he could make in giving up his share of the money taken, but Mottram retained his part of the bankrupt (Mottram), evidently labouring under considerable excitement, then proceeded to address the court. He said he had been twenty-five years known and respected in the City, and during that time capital to the amount of £20,000,000 had passed through his hands without the least imputation of his integrity. He had unfortunately been inveigled by two men, whose connexion had placed him in his present pitiable condition. He hoped that no distinction would be drawn in his case and that of Mr. Williams, who had received his certificate. He could assure the court that he had not intentionally wronged any one, and he challenged the world to prove the contrary. Williams had given up £7,000 out of the £75,000, but Mr. Williams had only one child to support, while he (Mottram) had thirteen. He could not leave them to starve, feeling as he did, that, both by the laws of God and his country, he was bound to provide for them. The bankrupt concluded a long address by repeating his prayer for merciful consideration, and apologising for the excitement he had exhibited.—His honour, after some discussion, proceeded to deliver his judgment. He said he could not look on the case with any leniency, because the bankrupt must have known that, in taking the money of his creditors, he was pursuing a course which could not be regarded by that court. There were certain circumstances in the case which went against the bankrupt; among the rest, his having lived in a style completely beyond his means. Under all the circumstances, he could do no other than adjourn the certificate for three years.—The bankrupt, on hearing this judgment delivered, turned to the learned commissioner, and with great vehemence said—I defy you to prove what you have asserted; but you will soon appear before a court where honesty of heart will not pass. I am an honest man, and my heart tells me so, and I feel it, and therefore scorn the reproach attempted to be cast upon me. By the termination of this adjournment I shall perhaps appear before another commissioner, when you shall have gone to your last account. I am an injured man, with a wife and thirteen children to support.—The proceedings here terminated.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The 100th session since the establishment of the court, and the 4th during the present mayoralty, commenced on Monday last before the Lord Mayor, Recorder, Sheriffs, and other civic functionaries. The grand jury having been sworn in, the Recorder proceeded to deliver his charge. He said, upon a perusal of the calendar, and a careful consideration of the facts contained in the depositions which had been transmitted to him in reference to the persons charged therein, it did not occur to him as being necessary that he should address any particular observations to them upon the nature of the offences charged, with one exception. The ordinary charges were founded on matters of fact upon which they could come to their own conclusions without any instruction from him. There was, however, one cause of no light importance—namely, a charge of murder committed in the public streets of London in the open day; and as it was committed under circumstances which did not, on the face of the account they gave of it, appear to the person charged with that crime, it might be expected that he should address to them a few observations upon the law affecting a charge of murder. He would preface those observations by saying that in order to set up should be real or alleged insanity, it would not be their province, in determining the question whether they ought or ought not to return a true bill against the party charged, to enter into the question of the plea of insanity. He prefaced his observations with these remarks, because it was highly necessary to the ends of justice that the party accused should be put upon his trial. The case might involve the question, whether, at the time of committing the offence, the prisoner was incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, by reason of idiotcy or lunacy. But the point to which their attention would have to be addressed was, whether the offence charged had been committed, apart and distinct from any consideration as to whether the act was committed by a person under the influence of insanity or not. He was speaking now from the authority of one of the learned judges in a very important case—namely, that of the Queen against the will of John Hodges, who was charged with the murder of her own child. The grand jury in that case went into court and stated that they had thrown out the bill after hearing evidence to show that the party charged was insane at the time of committing the offence. Mr. Baron Alderson, on hearing this, said, "There, gentlemen, is the warning you ought not to try that question. If the offence charged amounted to murder, it was your duty to find a bill; otherwise you afford no security to the public by the confinement of insane persons." Thus, let it be borne in mind, was no hard ship to the party accused, because, under the provisions of the 39th and 40th of George the Third, if when the party was arraigned, or at the time of trial, it appeared to the satisfaction of the jury that the court might direct the jury to try the question of his insanity, and if he were found insane, then to order him to be kept in custody during her Majesty's pleasure. By the same provisions provision was likewise made for both the individual and the public. The question of insanity they would see, therefore, was not one to be disposed of by the grand jury, but by another tribunal, for which reason he (the learned judge) would not call their attention to the nature of the offence charged as defined by law. Lord Coke defined murder to be "where a person of sound memory, and of discretion, unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being and under the king's peace, with malice aforethought, so that that person die of his wound within a year and a day after the same. Murder cannot be committed by an idiot, by a lunatic, or by an infant (to be age so to be testify) incapable of the act of mutting such a crime." And with regard to infancy, Lord Hale stated that 14 age to be under seven years. Although it was laid down that insane persons could not be held to be guilty of crime, the same protection was not shown on

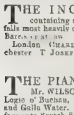
MUSIC IN "THE LADY OF THE LAKE."



THE PIANIST, for FEBRUARY, No. 26, says the "Cavonade" has had before its readers this month the most popular music in "The Lady of the Lake." There is a rich gem from the fascinating talent exercises in conducting the work. The editor at once seizes upon all the finest points of an opera as a lapidary would a casket of diamonds, and presents its most perfect gems in all the freshness and beauty of a new composition. Thus we have, in the "Pianist" for February the most attractive pieces, not only in "The Lady of the Lake," as played at Covent-garden Theatre, but also those in "La Gazza Ladra," performed at Drury-lane. This is the characteristic power which has made the "Pianists" what it is—the most popular and most amusingly useful for musical families in England.

"There are many bad imitations of the 'Pianists,' but they contain no more of its spirit than the ass in the lion's skin did the lion when he attempted to resemble."—Times.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 29th January, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—One of the greatest changes which the present year has produced is the revival of the fashion of necklaces, the wearing of which is now becoming extremely general. We have lately remarked many of these very beautiful articles on the persons of our most exalted fashionables; which, whether regarded in the light of richness or elegance, deserved mention, more especially those composed of emeralds and fine pearls. With these are worn elastic bracelets, which embrace the arm at any part, and which have the further convenience of never becoming unfastened or being lost by reason of the failure of snaps, as they adapt themselves to the size of the arm on whatever point they may be placed. At the Ambassadress of Austria's ball, which took place on Monday last, we remarked some very beautiful dresses, and, amongst others, one which, for its extreme beauty, deserves especial mention. It was a robe with triple and quadruple bouffants (a description of puffing) of tulle, interspersed with narrow ribbons issuing from rosettes; the corsages are pointed, descending upon the hips, with very short draperies, and sleeves trimmed with pipses (plaits) of tulle; the whole forming a remarkably pretty toilette. The lightness and the freshness of these trimmings, when applied to heavy stuffs, imparts to them some portion of their own airy appearance. There was another robe at the same party, if possible, still prettier than the above. It was a simple robe of tulle, with two rosettes upon the front of the skirt, and fixed upon it by bouquets of flowers. But the great triumph of the evening was a robe of rose-coloured taffety covering a petticoat of moiré of the same colour, open in front, attached to the point of the corsage, and draped at the sides; the petticoat was covered with two large volants (a sort of deep flounce) of point lace, which, in fact, gave it the appearance of a robe of lace. The corsage, which was brought to a point, descended upon the hips; the upper part of it was surmounted by a turn-back collar of two rows of lace; the one lying flat upon the border of the robe, and the other gathered around it. In many of the toilettes at the Opera and the Italians I have remarked that beads are much worn in head-dresses. Coiffures, forming a sort of light sprinkling of pearls, or of black or blue stones, and, with necklaces of large pearls, are very fashionable. The berthes, also, are trimmed with beads, fringes, and ribbons, &c.; and the gloves, worn with bracelets richly ornamented, have also a grand effect. Some of our ultra fashionables have lately patronized what are called Algerian slippers, which are certainly not a little remarkable for their rich, as well as their very uncommon appearance. They are made of stuffs, embroidered with gold and pearls, and are fastened with a gold lace terminated with a tassel. Sometimes they have round the slipper a slight turning back of the lining of a similar stuff, trimmed with gold or silk fringe. Adieu, mon ami.

HENRIETTE DE B.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE MR. E. DRUMMOND.

The mortal remains of the above lamented gentleman were on Tuesday last consigned to their last resting-place, in the churchyard of Charlton, near Woolwich, Kent.

In accordance with the expressed desire of the deceased's relatives, the funeral was conducted in the most private manner, and the mourners consisted solely of members of the Drummond family.

The mournful cavalcade left Grosvenor-street at the early hour of eight o'clock on its way to Charlton. The procession moved onwards in the following order:—

Mutes.
Page, bearing the plume of feathers.
The hearse,
Drawn by four horses, containing the body of the deceased, and supported by eight hearse pages as bearers.
Mourning coach,
Drawn by four horses, containing the following members of the deceased's family:
Col. Berkeley Drummond, Rev. Arthur Drummond,
Mr. Charles Drummond, Mr. C. Drummond, jun.
The private carriage of the deceased.

The route taken was over Vauxhall-bridge, by Kennington and Camberwell to New Cross, thence to Deptford, and over Blackheath to Charlton, at which place the procession arrived about ten minutes past eleven. On reaching the churchyard, the body of the deceased gentleman was met by the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Boscawen, vicar of Wotton, near Dorking, Surrey, who commenced reading the service for the burial of the dead. The church was fully attended by the most respectable inhabitants of the neighbourhood, all of whom appeared to be much affected by the scene. The coffin having been placed in the centre aisle, the mourners took their seats, and the ceremony proceeded. At the conclusion of the service, the mournful cavalcade moved towards the vault prepared for the reception of the body at the eastern extremity of the churchyard. The scene at this moment was of the most painful character. The melancholy circumstances under which the deceased met his death had an evident effect on those assembled, and the greatest sympathy was manifested by all present. The three brothers of the deceased were very much affected, and, when the coffin was lowered into the vault, the feelings of Colonel Drummond were completely overcome. The prayers being ended, the brothers took their last look on the coffin containing the remains of their deceased relative, and soon after left the spot under feelings of the deepest emotion.

The coffin was covered with black furniture, and surmounted by a brass plate bearing the following inscription —

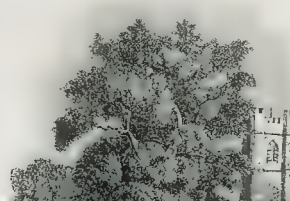
"Edward Drummond, Esq.,
Died January 23, 1843,
Ætatis sum, 50."

The great respect entertained for the deceased induced a large number of his friends to request permission to pay the last tribute of his remains by attending the funeral, which was prevented solely on account of the numerous applications made. Their Royal Highnesses the Duke of Cambridge, and Duchess of Gloucester, and Princess Sophia, and the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Robert and Lady Peel, were among the many distinguished individuals who were desirous to testify their esteem on this melancholy occasion; but, in accordance with the wishes of the members of the deceased gentleman's family, their attendance was gratefully declined.

The vault in which the deceased is interred is a very ancient one, having been erected more than 200 years since. It had fallen into decay, and was advertised some time since. No person coming forward to own it, the vicar, Mr. Drummond, has appropriated it to his own use, and the deceased is the first member of his family whose body has been deposited therein.

The whole of the arrangements of the funeral were under the direction of Mr. Newson, of Grosvenor-mews, New Bond-street, and reflect much credit upon that gentleman.

It is a most curious coincidence that here lie the remains of Spencer Percival, who was shot by Bellingham. Thus two parties connected with the government, and slain by assassins, lie togeth er in Charlton Church.



CHARLTON CHURCH.

Charlton Church is a picturesque object; its square tower being surrounded by trees—their foliage relieving the weather-stained turrets of the old building. To the geologist Charlton is well known and oft frequented. Its extensive pits afford, in addition to a knowledge of the surrounding strata, a variety of fossils most prized by those who best know them. Charlton Wood is also prized by botanists, as affording several rare plants. The scenery around is varied and romantic.

There, with pendent boughs,
The thick shrubs cling, and straggling oaks protrude
Their pollard trunks, with ivy close enwreath'd;
While slender saplins o'er the stony brow
Bend their grey stems, and quiver in the breeze.

Near the church is a building erected in princely style by Sir Adam Newton, and with which is connected a curious story. It is said that it contained a chimney-piece so exquisitely polished that Lord Doune saw reflected in it a robbery committed at Shooter's Hill, and that he was able, in consequence, to despatch his servants so promptly as to secure the delinquent.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our report on this day se'nnight, the receipts of English wheat up to our markets, coastwise and by land carriage and sample, have been tolerably good, but not to say extensive, while the general quality of the samples, arising from the prevailing humid atmosphere, has proved rather inferior. On each market day the demand for all descriptions has proved very inactive, and the quotations have suffered an abatement of 1s per quarter. In foreign wheat so little has been doing that the rates have been nominally unaltered. Good sound barley has supported its value, but other sorts have been purchased on easier terms. Malt has mostly gone off as it has come to hand, yet the currencies have been with difficulty supported. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have been dull, but without any further abatement in prices.

Arrivals.—English: wheat, 3770, barley, 2910, oats, 7860, and malt, 3730 quarters; flour, 1730 sacks; Irish: oats, 6140 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 53s; ditto white, 54s to 58s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 22s to 26s; malting do., 28s to 31s; Chevalier, 33s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 2s to 24s; potato do., 22s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s, white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 56s. In Bond.—Barley, 30s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 30s to 26s; peas, 32s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—We have had a few transactions in clover seed; but in other kinds next to nothing has been passing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 43s to 46s; hemp, seed, 35s to 46s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 33l per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s. to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 8d; barley, 27s 8d; oats, 2s 0d; rye, 30s 8d; beans, 37s 10d; peas, 30s 4d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 11d; Barley, 26s 9d; Oats, 17s 1d; Rye, 29s 1d; Beans, 28s 0d; Peas, 30s 3d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 10s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 1s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 6d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea.—We have had but few parcels offering privately since our last. The demand continues tolerably firm, and good common Congou cannot be had under 1s 3d to 1s 4d cash. No public sales have been yet declared.

Sugar.—This market has again ruled inactive. The finest descriptions of sugar, however, have realised full prices; but the middling and inferior kinds have fallen 1s per cwt.

Coffee.—Although the value of this article remains very low, dealers are operating with much caution; hence a very small amount of business has been done this week.

Cocoa.—West India is in fair demand, at full rates, with a full average supply on offer.

Pepper.—160 packets white have produced at auction 3½d for very ordinary, and 6½d for fair quality.

Jute.—300 bales have gone off publicly, at £16 to £16 2s 6d per ton.

Saltpetre.—This article is rather declining. 827 bags Calcutta have sold at 26s to 28s 6d for 11lbs refraction; 26s to 26s 6d for 7½ ditto; and 27s for 12lbs refraction.

Cochineal.—We have very little inquiry for cochineal. 110 bags Mexican have changed hands at 4s to 4s 9d for good fair blacks; and 3s 8d to 3s 11d per lb for good fair and good silvers. Using a decline of 2d.

Spelter.—Sales are reported on the spot at £23 per ton.

Tallow.—The market is quiet, with little doing. The latest quotation is 45s 3d on the spot, 44s 6d to 45s for forward delivery.

Potatoes.—On account of the prevailing fine weather, the demand for potatoes still rules heavy, and the present rates are from 30s to 60s per ton.

Hops.—The best yearlings, both in pockets and bags, are selling at full prices; but otherwise the demand is in a sluggish state.

Coals.—Adair's, 18s 6d; Chester Main, 16s; New Tanfield, 14s 6d; Ord's Redheugh, 14s; West Wylam, 16s; Hotspur, 17s; W. E. Lambton, 19s 6d; Stewart's, 19s 9d; Adelaide, 19s 3d per ton. Ships arrived, 80.

Smithfield.—We have had but moderate supplies of fat stock on offer here this week, yet the demand has ruled excessively heavy, and prices have had a downward tendency. Beef, from 3s to 4s 2d; mutton, 3s to 4s 2d; veal, 4s to 5s; and pork, 3s 10d to 4s 8d per 8 lbs, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The arrivals of slaughtered meat up to these markets, from Scotland and various parts of England, have amounted this week to nearly 4000 carcases, which have produced a very heavy general inquiry, at the following quotations:—Beef, from 2s 10d to 3s 6d; mutton, 3s to 3s 8d; veal, 4s to 4s 8d; and pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d per 8 lbs., by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The information received from the manufacturing districts since our last publication has been more satisfactory than for some time past. In Coventry and its neighbourhood the silk trade is undergoing a visible improvement although the consumption is considerably interfered with by French silk goods, to a considerable extent supplied by smugglers). The inquiries now in progress into the Custom-house relaxed manner of collecting the protective duties on the importation of foreign manufactures will, it is expected generally by the silk trade, end in the entire suppression of the illegal introduction of French silk goods in particular into this country, and then our silk weavers at home, by increasing the manufactures within the sweats of the great body of consumers to pay for them. From these causes there can be no doubt but a very favourable respecting the greatest but slow reaction in the silk and shawl trades to which we have latterly had the satisfaction to allude. The transactions of the week at Leeds, Rochdale, Gloucester, and other places wherein woollen goods are manufactured, have been again rather considerable for the season of the year, and the raw materials is gradually rising in value.

In the cotton trade the operations at the present time of the year seldom attract much of the public attention, but, after the late violent fluctuations in the great department of our manufacturing industry, it is a pleasing task again to have the opportunity of repeating that, in Manchester, Glasgow, and other places concerned in this branch of our commerce, the labourers continue to be productively employed.

In Mincing-lane and Mark-lane the demand for colonial and Indian produce has continued dull, and sugars of all descriptions are again lower. The brokers generally are disposed to make their sales for cash, and cannot be done to any great extent on the present state of the trade. Of teas, some private sales have been effected during the week, at what are called full prices. The larger public sale, however, is advertised for the middle of this month, the result of which will probably go far to tone to the market, and, if the prices ruled higher than they latterly have been. In the drug market, and more particularly in the article of Turkey opium, the dealers seem to be in command of the late Indian sales, now hourly expected, before they venture to extend their operations, and in prices, consequently, little or rather no alteration can now be noted. Business generally is becoming more legitimate than it latterly has been; it is now settling down into moderate transactions for consumption.

In the corn trade the demand is exceedingly dull, and it is difficult to obtain even the prices of the previous week.

The greatest difficulty in the City at the present moment is the profitable and safe employment of money. There is no difference at present in the prices of Consols for money and those for the time settlement, and the fluctuations in them throughout the week have been confined to quarters about ¼ per cent., 94¼ to 94¾ being a high price to pay for an annual income of 3 per cent, but such is the present contraction in the actual value of money. In mining and railroad shares considerable activity still continues to be exhibited, but no further improvement in their prices has occurred during this week. On the Foreign Stock Exchange very little enterprise is discernible on any foreign bond transactions, and nothing worthy of attention in the late value of them can be noted, with the exception of Mexican bonds, which have declined nearly 1 per cent. The half monthly time account on the exchange was arranged in the beginning of this week, without any defaulters having been declared.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

There are few subjects of more importance to this country, or indeed to any of the countries of Europe, than those which are involved in the substance and purpose of commercial treaties, and the publication of one or two of these diplomatic documents during the present week naturally inclines us to bring them under the reflective consideration of our readers. They are, as it were, official papers confirming some of the best communications of the speech from the throne.

The entire question of the value and sacredness of treaties is more than ever opened up to the contemplation of moral philosophy in the present startling position of events in France, upon which all thinking men, all men alive to the confidence and honesty of religious obligation and diplomatic faith, are truly and tremblingly sensitive; less on account of the interests involved, mighty and gigantic as they are, than for the sake of a great principle in which the benefit of all mankind is comprehended—in which brotherhood, fidelity, and all the bonds of faith between the vast family of the entire human race are inevitably and unquestionably merged. A fairly-conducted and honourably-confirmed treaty may almost be regarded as an oath sworn solemnly by nations before the world. It is generally ushered into form in a name which the contracting parties would account it blasphemous to take in vain. It is prefaced with some religious aspiration—some appeal to a witness from heaven—some anxious trust for fulfilment in a watching power from above. There is a national perjury in the abrogation of an unexpired treaty in time of peace. It was but a few days past that Guizot, the far-sighted and fine-minded prime minister of France, had upon a question of Christian philanthropy to propound this important truth to his impetuous and unscrupulous opposition. "There are two ways of abrogating treaties—one is by the mutual consent of the contracting parties; the other is by the sword!" This was incontrovertible, and all other abrogations must be at the expense of honourable feeling, religious responsibility, and national truth. It is lamentable to find a want of this conviction in the headstrong war-party of France; it is still more dreadful that the unprincipled doctrines which that party urges should tend directly to obstruct civilization, and uphold the horrors of slavery—to keep forged fetters for the human race, and to overthrow and bow down all those lofty aspirations after pure and genuine freedom, upon which your French patriots of all times have founded the justice of their revolutions, and their plea of sacred redemption from the blood they dared to shed. This degrading inconsistency is to be mourned by all moral men; but on the other hand, it is glorious to behold the virtuous Guizot standing with energetic dignity in the midst of the storm, and in spite of all the fiery elements of party discord—keeping the state vessel bound steadily for the harbour of peace. He may fall and be abandoned by his crew, but such a pilot will be a mark for the veneration of all future time—good, just, courageous, and full of honour, he is gathering the greenest and the brightest laurels that have ever struck their roots downwards among the enduring foundations of the Temple of Fame.

This our humble testimony to the merits of a wise and great minister, who is adding around his shoulders the worthy mantle of the respect and gratitude of Europe, has been evoked from us by the question of "Treaties," and their value as bonds of faith between nations. For it will be observed with gratification, that just as restless and revolutionary France seems ready to incur the crime and odium of despising these signs and compacts of solemn engagements between countries, other powers emphatically express their sense of the inviolability of such obligations by involving in them—by a mutual interchange of concessions—the very dearest and most urgent interests of the inhabitants of the countries for whom they engage.

The treaty of commerce and navigation between her Majesty and the Emperor of all the Russias must give universal satisfaction. It could not have been published at a more à-propos moment. It strengthens England—it rebukes France—it marks the diplomatic opinion of Russia upon an important point in the balance of affairs in Europe, and it prophesies commercial advantages to this country (which we are not so ungenerous as to wish or believe otherwise than mutual) of the very highest moment in the present crisis of mercantile depression. The treaty, as we have read it, seems invaluable for the perfect spirit of liberality in which it is framed, and for the business-like and honourable confidence which it implies to exist between the two powers. The reliance is really that of private friends, and displays a fair bargain, without any of the finesse of jealous diplomacy. The treaty is described by a contemporary as being what all treaties ought to be—a specimen of the best sort of reciprocity, likely not only to prove advantageous to the commerce of the two nations, but to confer generally even higher and more important benefits. Thus we have Russia preserving the balance of power, and weighing in the scale against Gaul—although we must not forget that Sir Robert Peel has indicated a disposition on the part of the Guizot Government (if the abandoned treaty-despising party do not drive it from power) to develope and confirm the commercial treaty so long projected and desired between England and France. Should it be effected, may it never experience the vicissitudes of the slave treaties of 1831 and 1833.

The second publication to which we alluded has respect to China—but it is not the treaty itself—only comprising a series of imperial edicts issued by the Brother of the Sun and Moon to his Celestial subjects, and evincing very peculiar constructions of the negotiations to which we have driven him at the point of the sword. The edicts confirm in their spirit all the advantages about to accrue to English commerce from the opening of the Chinese ports, and this as a business matter is all we want. Even the insincere Chinese Emperor is better than Monsieur Thiers and the spurious honour of La jeune France. But in another respect the Imperial edicts are gems. If laughter maketh fat, they should be publicly interpreted as a sort of pabulum for the consumptive. No man could starve under them. They are the purest specimens of the absurd, the humorous, and agreeable we ever perused. They are not fit for a newspaper; a comic annual or almanack is their legitimate sphere. The phrases "Respect this!" "Pay an implicit and awe-struck obedience!" drop like manna into the gaping mouths of the bewildered subjects of the Emperor. They are told how long peace had made them forget the arts of war, so that the "barbarians" were enabled to make them remember their coming; but now they are to train themselves against the recurrence of any such dilemma; all is, by command of the Emperor, to go on happily till they are so trained; that is, the treaty is to be solemnly complied with until they delude themselves into a belief that they are able to break it. And, in the meanwhile, with regard to the droll official document itself, there is a direction to "Hurry on this edict at more than a rate of 600 le a day," and to order some great functionary to "inform himself of its contents," with the final injunction of "Respect this!"

May we venture to echo his Imperial Majesty, with a request to our readers that, of all articles upon the subject of commercial treaties, they will "respect this."

WELLS CATHEDRAL.

RESTORATION OF WELLS CATHEDRAL.

The beautiful Cathedral of Wells, in Somersetshire, is about to be "restored," under the superintendence of Mr. Cockerell, the architect, whom the Dean and Chapter have selected for that purpose. It is hoped that no change beyond that of "restoration" will be made in this venerable edifice, which is one of the finest specimens of religious architecture in England. It was founded A.D. 924, by Wolfelmus, the second bishop of Wells; has been raised, improved, and adorned by succeeding prelates. It is in the form of a cross, and in various styles; but the western front, built in the 13th century, by Bishop Jocelyn, is one of the most splendid examples existing of the light and highly-ornamented Gothic; it is flanked by two small towers, as shown in the engraving from Mr. Britton's unique history of the cathedral. The length of the edifice, from east to west, is 380 feet, and its breadth 130. Between the transepts rises a large quadrangular tower, 160 feet high, the base of which rests upon four broad arches, and contains five bells. The length of the nave is 190 feet, and it is separated from the two side aisles by clustered columns, supporting pointed arches. The length of the choir is 108 feet, and behind it is the chapel of the Virgin, which is much admired. There are several other ornamented chapels in the aisles; in one of which is the celebrated clock, the work of Peter Lightfoot, a monk of Glastonbury. It has an astronomical dial, around which are mounted figures of knights at tournaments, which are whirled round with amazing rapidity. The cloisters were built in the 15th century; and the chapter-house is an exceedingly elegant octagonal structure, 52 feet each way, the roof being supported by a clustered column, gracefully rising from the centre.

Wells Cathedral is rich in ancient tombs and modern monuments; and among the latter is one of Chantrey's finest works. The exterior of the west front presents one of the earliest and most interesting monuments of sculpture we possess: apostles, kings, queens, popes, bishops, and cardinals are placed in niches and under canopies supported by slender columns of polished marble; and one whole line of this front displays a grotesque view of the Resurrection: in short, its alto-relievos, as works of art, are not to be surpassed by any contemporary productions in Europe. It was finished two years after the birth of Cimabue, the restorer of painting in Italy, and in the time of Nicolo Pisano, the Italian restorer of sculpture; and, according to Flaxman, "it is the first specimen of such magnificent and varied sculpture united in a series of sacred history that is to be found in western Europe;" and we trust that so superb a specimen of antique skill will be reverentially preserved in the projected "restorations."

We have ascertained on the spot that the subscription for the restoration of the interior of the cathedral originated with the Dean of Wells and Archdeacon Beyney, one of the canons of that church, the latter having given £1000, and the former £500 for that purpose. Most of the members of the cathedral, and many of the influential proprietors in the county of Somerset have contributed various sums to the fund. We trust that this work will prosper under the able hands into which it is entrusted; and that those who have benefited by their family ties with this cathedral will come forward to the completion of the noble design. It is just to add that the Dean and Chapter have restored many important parts of the exterior of their church during several years, and have followed altogether the plan and pattern of the original work.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

SPAIN.—Letters and journals from Madrid have reached us; but, beyond the fact that the editors of the Pabellon Espanol, Heraldo, and the Postdata, prosecuted for libel by the Government, had been acquitted on the preceding day, they contain no political news.

Madrid papers of the 31st ult have come to hand. El Sol of that date contains the following passage:—"The contest between the French and Spanish Governments is drawing to a crisis. We learn from a source we may trust, that the French Charge d'Affaires has verbally notified his ultimatum to the Spanish Government. He is stated to have added that if, within the rigorous delay of eight days, the reparations demanded by France regarding the consul at Barcelona were not yielded, he would demand his passports, and a complete interruption of the relations between the two countries would be the consequence. The day before yesterday a courier left the French embassy who, no doubt, is the bearer of this news."

The Heraldo states an address, signed by various eminent persons and large landowners of Spain, to have been communicated to the Regent, the object of which was to obtain a compensation for such of the inhabitants of Barcelona as have suffered from the bombardment. The address also protested in strong language against the contribution, of forty per cent, inflicted on property in the same city. According to the same print, Urquidi, aide-de-camp to the Carlist General Urbistondo, had just been condemned to death at Burgos

CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 11. Despatches have been received at the Porte from its envoy at Bucharest, Sa'het Effendi, giving details of the election of the new Prince of Wallachia. The choice has fallen on George Bibesco, brother to Sir Bey.

The Russian embassy does not appear hitherto to make head against the Porte in the servian affair. The Sultan insists that, having kept within the prescribed terms of treaties, no Cabinet, however authorised it may be to protect, can with propriety interfere in a matter of his internal administration. Russia may, in the exercise of what she considers her rights, persist in her opposition to the present order of things in Servia, but she will never be satisfied, because she has thereby seen wrested from her hand an instrument by whose means she evidently sought to reconstitute Bulgaria, but who would trust her forbearance, should she be able, by subtlety, again to regain her lost power in Servia? Should she succeed, it will not be for the purpose of protecting the rights of almost independent provinces, quite free, and who are menaced only by Russia herself, who would use them solely for her own purposes.

On the 13th her Majesty's steamer Stromboli was to receive on board the Ottoman ambassador, Nourri Effendi; Colonel Daniese, the Russian commissioner; and Captain Williams, of the Artillery, British commissioner, who is to be accompanied by Mr. Rassam, a talented young interpreter, hitherto in the Ottoman service, and now, for the time being, a British dragoman. She will then convey them to Trebisonde, whence they proceed to Erzeroum, there to meet the Persian ambassador, who will, it is hoped, enter with him into discussion on the subject of the dispute between Turkey and the Persian, which, it is hoped, they will speedily bring to a suitable and satisfactory conclusion.

There was very stormy weather, and several maritime losses have occurred. Fortunately there were few ships in the Black Sea at this season, or they would have been more severely tried. Few have come ashore near the Dardanelles, and of 87 passengers and a crew of 12 not one was saved. Other serious disasters of the same nature had occurred in different directions.

JAN. 17.—To-day the Ministers of the Porte are engaged at the Sultan's palace, on what business I cannot learn in time for the present opportunity. The new prince of Wallachia must have been duly confirmed by this time, or will be.

The Austrian commercial steamer from Beyrout, due several days ago, is missing, and we have no public intelligence from that quarter. English, French, and Austrian government steamers are continually on the move between that place and Smyrna, as if something extraordinary were going forward in that direction. Whatever it may be, we shall soon learn the broad facts.

EGYPT. ALEXANDRIA, Jan. 23.—The Pacha returned to Cairo from his excursion to the upper country, on the 13th instant; he now proposes to go again to the Delta to inspect the various works at present in progress there, and, by his presence, to encourage the agricultural operations of the quarter. Preparations are being made for the construction of a double lock at Atfe, the point at which the Mahmoudieh canal joins the Nile, the object of which is to allow a free navigation between Cairo and Alexandria, without subjecting boats to the necessity of unloading at Atfe, whence they largoon are at present transhipped by another boat to Alexandria.

It is rumoured that the Pacha is preparing a military expedition to Darfour, that Hassan Pacha is about to leave Cairo with two regiments, to join a force of some 8000 men already in the upper country. Whether or not there be any truth in this I cannot say, neither can I ascertain what the proposed object of the expedition may be.

The Belgian Ambassador, Baron de Tuyr, whose arrival I mentioned in my last, goes to England by the Oriental steamer, and from thence he returns to Belgium on leave of absence; his stay in Egypt has been shorter than he intended.

Commander Malcolm returned by the Oriental on the 19th inst., with the ratification of the Chinese treaty, and proceeded on the same day to join the Indian steamer at Suez.

Hall and Co. have brought out from England a small iron tug-steamer for the canal, to be used instead of horses for towing the passage boats betwixt this and Atfe. She made her first trip on the 19th with the passengers of the Oriental, when she performed the passage in eleven hours.

SYRIA.—Letters from Beyrout of the 8th ult. announce a dispute already between the two Druse and Christian Lieutenant-Governors of the Lebanon, as to the comparative extent of their powers. One of these gentlemen, Ahmed Reslan, had been dismissed from his post and sent to prison by Assad Pacha. Unfortunately, however, the Pacha could find no one willing to replace him.

RUSSIA.—Accounts from Semlin state that the Russian Government had been deceived by Prince Milosch and his ministers, and that it had resolved that the existing Government should be maintained. Prince Alexander had been formally recognised by the French Government—a course which would, it was believed, be followed by the other European powers.

WEST INDIES, &c. The West India steamer, Solway, arrived at Falmouth on Monday, at midnight, from St. Thomas's, Jan. 10; Bermuda, 19; Fayal, 30; our freight about 60,000 dollars, and 276 bags of cochineal. The City of Glasgow, steamer, sailed hence on Dec. 7th, and the Solway on the 17th; the latter arrived at Madeira, 24th, and found the City of Glasgow had left on the day preceding; the Solway arrived at St. Thomas's on the 7th Jan., and left on the 10th, without any account being received of the City of Glasgow. At St. Thomas's was the United States' corvette Marianne, on a cruise.

The admiral sailed from Bermuda on the 19th of January, for the West Indies, to hold a court-martial on Captain Elliot; the Warspite, Pique, Hornet, Pickle, and the Simoon transport remaining.

The Christmas holydays in Jamaica passed off quietly, except a slight fracas. An attempt had been made to fire the town of Savannah-la-Mer, but had failed.

Lord Elgin has prorogued the House of Legislature of Jamaica to the 7th of February, then to be further prorogued until the [illegible]. His speech on [illegible] was received with some satisfaction to the improving state of the island, and gave strong assurances that the immigration fund should be most attentively employed for the good of the island. One of the most remarkable measures which received his sanction was the Capitation Tax, to be raised by the justices and vestries, for the repairs of the different roads. The accounts of the exports and imports of British manufactured goods, paying an ad valorem duty, have been laid before the House of Assembly.

The transport-ship Numa, which sailed from Bermuda on the 31st ult. for England, returned to port the following Saturday, having sprung a leak on the day after her departure; she had proceeded but 150 miles. Though the leak was not great, four inches per hour, yet it was deemed advisable to bear up. The Numa experienced a heavy gale of wind on the previous Tuesday night, from the north-west, and was compelled to scud.

Dates from the city of MEXICO are received to December 25th, and from Vera Cruz to the 27th inclusive. From these we have important news of another movement having taken place, doubtless under Santa Anna's direction. On December 18th, in order to prevent the new constitution being further discussed, the garrison of the city of Mexico, which might reckon against the Congress, and took possession of the building; the declamation was supported by all the authorities, and (of course) by the Government; the object in view was to dissolve the Congress, and that the Government should appoint a number of persons to form a constitution. No bloodshed took place on this occasion. Troops were placed along the avenues to the palace, to prevent the members meeting at the parliamentary house. The commission nominated included the Archbishop of MEXICO and other leading personages.

The Government had decreed the paper notes of credit to be suspended, and a new fund of 45 per cent. to be formed, from which the former were to be redeemed: of course the English bonds, 16 per cents, were not interfered with. A decree had also passed for an additional duty to be put on manufactured cotton goods. The British minister remonstrated against the imposition—making the average duty in all 50 per cent., and not succeeding, he demanded that the decree being the period for the commencement of its coming in force should be six months instead of three months from the date thereof.

We have learned from the American papers of the sortie of two United States vessels of war on the California coast; now it appears that the sum of 15,000 dollars and 500 suits of clothing for the soldiers are to be paid by Captain Jones.

Business was very dull in MEXICO; the rate of exchange 45d.

On the 30th October last the American naval squadron in the Pacific, consisting of the frigate United States, of 50 guns, and sloop corvette Cyane, of 24 guns, under the orders of Commodore Thomas ap Catesby Jones, took forcible possession of Monterea, in Upper California, and after retaining it three days, again ceded it to the Mexicans, whose flag they hauled, and moreover agreed to pay 15,000 dollars, 500 suits of clothing, and a set of instruments for a military band, by way of satisfaction. Very detailed particulars of the circumstances were published in the Siglo Diez-y-nueve paper, published at the city of MEXICO, on the 20th December, so that there is no doubt of the occurrence: and a great feeling of animosity towards the United States had been evinced in the capital, and witnessed by a gentleman who has arrived in the States direct from that republic.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Her MAJESTY'S answer to the address of the House of Peers was read to their lordships by the Lord Steward, and ordered to be printed.—Lord CAMPBELL gave notice of a motion for a copy of a memorial presented to Government on behalf of the General Assembly of the Scotch Church; also for a copy of the answer thereto. LORD BROUGHAM gave notice of a debate on the negotiations with America in 1783 and 1784, and on the state of the London corporations.—A conversation on the Poor-law in Ireland ensued, upon a motion of Lord CLANRICARDE for returns relative to the operation of the law. The noble marquis made several complaints of the law, the chief of which seemed to be, that the relief received by the poor was in no way commensurate with the burden inflicted on the rate-payer. He wished to ask the noble duke whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure on the subject of Poor-laws in Ireland?—The DUKE of WELLINGTON said he had no objection to the production of those papers, excepting, perhaps, the length of time which would be required in order to make them out. The last return he did not object to, though, as it related to the employment of the constabulary and troops in putting down any resistance to the Poor-laws, it might be considered confidential. Her Majesty's Government had already taken measures to acquire information upon all the points on which it appeared that the last petitions were unsatisfactory or failed to produce the good effect expected from it. This information, it was hoped, would be obtained before long, when it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to propose a bill for the alteration of the law. (Hear, hear.) All he could say was, that no exertions would be spared to render the proposed measure as useful and as beneficial to the country as possible. (Hear, hear, hear.)—Lord CAMPBELL had on the table two bills relating to the law of debtor and creditor, and to that of arrest for debt; and the Lord Chancellor also stated, in reply to Lord Campbell, that, among some of the important objects the Government had in view, in improving the law, was the improvement of the administration of the law in the Ecclesiastical Courts; and a bill was prepared applicable to that extensive, important, and complicated subject, which would shortly be laid before the house. Another measure was one corresponding with that introduced last session, for the establishment of local courts with respect to claims of a small amount, and another object was connected with the law of bankruptcy, and the administration of that law.—Lord CAMPBELL said he felt great satisfaction at the statement of his noble and learned friend, and all that he was now desirous of doing was to intimate that the measures would be introduced in the house as quickly as possible, as the most serious inconvenience arose during the last session, in consequence of the late period at which several of the bills were introduced. With respect to the Bankruptcy Bill, he had hoped that commissioners to hold courts in different places in their districts would have been appointed.—The Lord Chancellor said, with respect to the Bankruptcy Bill, it was impossible that there could be sufficient time for full discussion, and went down to the other house, where it was fully discussed; so with respect to the bill for the establishment of county courts, that measure was also fully discussed. As to the question of bringing the whole subject under the consideration of a select committee upon stairs, he should not find himself called upon to enter into any discussion on the subject.—After a few words from Lord Brougham, the Lord Chancellor said that he should continue to give to the bill of his noble and learned friend the cordial support which he had given to it last session.—The bill was then read a first time.—On the motion of Lord Montcagle, certain returns connected with the Post-office were ordered.—Their lordships adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter to four o'clock.—Various petitions were presented, and notices of motions given.—Sir ROBERT PEEL refused to answer a question by Mr. Cobden as to the intentions of Government respecting the sugar duties, and stated that he should take the same course if questions were asked relating to other articles of the tariff.—The Premier afterwards stated, in answer to Lord Palmerston, that, after negotiating, Brazil had acquiesced in the interpretation put by the British Government on that term, for which the commercial treaty is to last, and that the treaty will, therefore, continue in force till November, 1844; that a convention is on foot for a new treaty; and, lastly, with respect to the question of the Sund dues between the country and Hanover, that no definite settlement had yet been come to.—Mr. LABOUCHERE, in having called a question as to the progress of commercial negotiations pending with France and Portugal, and desirous upon the urgency and inconvenience occasioned by the suspense and uncertainty on the subject, Sir ROBERT PEEL, in reply, expressed a doubt whether it would not be better to break off the correspondence with Portugal altogether, rather than submit to the evils arising from delay. Within the last few days the Government had received a communication which led him to think that the time would soon arrive when it would be necessary to terminate the negotiations altogether, or make some new arrangements. But, with respect to France, he hoped that such an arrangement would be made as would, politically as well as commercially, be promotive of friendly and beneficial relations between the two countries.—In reply to Captain Pechell, Sir ROBERT PEEL gave explanations in reference to the arrangements for the suppression of the slave trade, the most important of which was that this country had entered into no engagement limiting the number of its cruisers, and that there must be some mistake in a report attributing any such statement to Mr. GLADSTONE.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER informed the house that the result of the inquiries made by the commissioners on customs frauds would soon be laid before the house.—Sir ROBERT PEEL then informed Mr. Roebuck that the papers relating to the Affghan war, to be laid before the house previous to the proposal for a vote of thanks to the army and the Governor-General, would be confined to such as might enable Parliament to form a judgment of the skill and valour of the troops and their leaders, and of the policy of the withdrawal from Affghanistan. Inquiries on the same subject were subsequently made by Lord John Russell, to which Sir R. PEEL replied that he should not invite discussion upon the policy itself, but he believed the information afforded by the papers would be as ample as necessarily to throw light upon the policy of the withdrawal of the troops, although it would not go so far back as the commencement of the war. Mr. ROEBUCK then rose, and remarked that there could be no doubt of the propriety of the vote of thanks for the conduct of the officers and troops, but, with respect to the Governor-General and his policy, there might be a difference of opinion, as the policy of that noble personage was connected with the proclamation which had been the subject of so much remark. He wished to know whether the vote of thanks would include that proclamation? He quite agreed, for his own part, with the Governor-General, so far as his information went, and would be prepared to support the vote of the principle of the proclamation in question, because a further conversation took place on this subject, in the course of which Sir R. PEEL explained that the vote of thanks would be wholly confined to the public operations. Mr. WALTER having been informed that the Post-office bill would not be introduced by Government within the next fortnight, gave notice of a motion on that topic for Monday week next.—The royal answer to the Commons' address was brought in and read.—Colonel REICHENBACH declined pressing his motion for the issue of a new writ for the borough of Sudbury; and a motion by Mr. TUFFNELL, that the Speaker do not issue his writ before the 28th of March was agreed to. The latter hon. member then moved for leave to bring in a bill for the disfranchisement of the borough.—The motion was met by Mr. BLACKSTONE with one for inquiry. But Sir ROBERT PEEL and Colonel WYNDHAM, as well as Mr. DUNCOMBE, having expressed their intention of supporting Mr. Tuffnell's bill, leave for its introduction was carried without a division.—Several resolutions relative to the Post-office business of the house were proposed by Mr. HAWES, and rejected on a division by 84 to 2[illegible]. Mr. HAWES and Mr. BROTHERTON's returns of offences against the [illegible] act, and those of Sir ROBERT INGLIS, for the abolition of the Ecclesiastical Duties Commission, were agreed to, and the house adjourned at seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The house met at five o'clock.—Lord MONTEAGLE gave notice that on the 27th of February he should move for a select committee to inquire into the operation and effect of the Corn-Law Bill of last session. He also gave notice that on Thursday he should call the attention of the noble duke relative to the intentions of the Government respecting the charter of the Bank of England, and the general system of banking in this country. The noble marquis moved for certain returns relative to the introduction of corn into Canada, which were ordered.—Lord ASHBURTON said it was important before the noble lord brought forward his motion, that all the information which could be obtained respecting the operation of the new measure should be laid on the table of the house.—The Earl of RIPON said he believed that all the necessary information on the subject would be on the table in abundant time for the discussion.—Certain papers relating to the Church of Scotland were ordered, on the motion of Lord CAMPBELL.—Lord BROUGHAM, in a remarkably able and eloquent speech, called the attention of the house to the fact that in the year 1833 a proposition including far more stringent rights of "search" than those which are now in question between England and France, had emanated from the United States, and had been presented to England by the ambassadors of the leading European powers. A treaty, founded on this proposal, had been signed, and all the preliminaries completed. The only reason that prevented its final consummation was that it included American ports and places liable to search. The noble lord therefore contended that M. Dupin and others of the "popular" members of the French Chambers were altogether wrong in objecting, on the right of search, on the ground that America was opposed to the principle of the practice. The noble and learned lord observed that if he (Lord Brougham) were wrong in the statement which he made to their lordships, the president, at the very same moment, his honourable and learned friend was making his contrary statement in the French Parliament, of which he was a member, and a most distinguished ornament—if he could not prove the communication that sent out by the United States did not refuse to touch the question of the right of search under any form on account of its supposed inconsistency with the honour of the flag and the independence of the States not only of search, but they refuse to adopt the principle of the right of search under any form in which it might be presented, but that the Senate of the United States volunteered the question, and pressed without an universal remonstrance of the House of Representatives, then of the Senate, the Upper House—an unanimous resolution embodying the public opinion of America in the question—embodying the feeling of national independence and honour. The noble lord was the author of the flag of America as connected with the right of search, and that that all but unanimous resolution of the American Congress called on the President, and he (Lord Brougham) believed that the President had entertained some lingering prejudice respecting the flag and the right of search, but public opinion in America, as represented by the people's representatives, and by property generally, by both houses of Congress, had unanimously pressed on the President and overcame his scruples, and called upon him to press the resolution of Congress in the ministry of this country. (Hear, hear.) He (Lord Brougham) denied any one who spoke the words of Congress, or the state papers which had passed in the course of the negotiations, to gainsay or contradict, or in the most minute particular alter, or affect, the plain and unequivocal statement he made to the house. The proposition came over not in the form of a despatch merely, but of a despatch enclosing the draft of a treaty, and which draft had previously been agreed to by the Senate of the United States. (Hear.) Their lordships were well acquainted with the American constitution. The Executive did not represent the country, as it did here; for here the Executive represented the community, in making peace or war, and Parliament had only the power of ratifying by vote that which the Executive had done. But in the United States the senate, as well as the President, must ratify a treaty. The Executive was, as it were, in communication with the senate. It required two thirds of the Senate to render vand the ratification of a treaty. Well, that senate, exercising that power, sent over here the draft of a convention, which was laid before our then Secretary of State, a late right hon. friend of his (Lord Brougham's) now no more, and a gentleman, a most able negotiator, who was now employed in the service of his country, the present Sir Stratford Canning, then Mr. Stratford Canning. And that was that persons ignorant of the subject on the other side of the water had dared to say was proof, that the Senate of the United States had never consented to ratify any treaty which had been signed by their minister here, was never. He (Lord Brougham) would read from that convention a passage bearing upon the question:—"That the cruisers of each party may detain," &c.—[detail of the treaty]—"and a strong word of search, capture, and deliver over for trial vessels carrying the flag of the other party." Now that was the proposal of the Senate of America, which was adopted by the convention signed on the 29th of November, 1824; and then sent back to America for ratification. It was signed by the American plenipotentiary, Mr Rush, and on the part of Great Britain by Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Stratford Canning. When the treaty returned to the United States it was ratified, with no alteration. The bounds within which the right to be examined was to be exercised were, by the proposal of the senate itself adopted by the treaty, as follows:—"The West Indies, including the Spanish Main, Brazil, and America." The President of the United States, who had been an old stickler against the right of search, but whose opposition had been overcome by the unanimous voice of his countrymen, objected to America being included, on the ground that, as the slave-trade was no longer carried on in America, the Americans might as well claim the right to search vessels in the Thames and Medway as that the English cruisers should claim the right to search vessels in the James River, Baltimore, New York, &c. America was accordingly struck out of the treaty, and when it was brought back to this country to be accepted, our foreign minister unfortunately refused to accept it with the alteration, and the consequence was one proposed by the Americans themselves, and that they should have thought of the alteration before. But for that unfortunate refusal, for the last nineteen years we should have had an extensive and stringent treaty in force. To show those who still hankered after putting an end to the treaties of 1831 and 1833, no zealous were the Americans on the subject—so universal a crusade did they make in favour of the right of search against the slave-trade—and he was sure the cross was never more appropriately exhibited on any banners, or the Christian region ever more honoured, than by the exertions of the votaries in such a cause—nor the spirit of the gospel of "peace and good-will amongst men" more fully embodied in outward and visible signs than by such a crusade,—in short, he repeated, were the Americans on the subject, that they not only sent the draft of a treaty to England, but also to their ministers at Brussels, at St. Petersburg, at Vienna, at Berlin, at Denmark, at Lisbon, and even at Columbia. The draft was also sent to the minister plenipotentiary at Paris, and in the course of the negotiations which afterwards took place between the French and the British Governments on the subject, M. de Chateaubriand, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, said that the two countries had so nearly been at daggers drawn—there had so recently been victories which had led to the occupation of a portion of France by hostile forces, that there was a soreness of feeling both in the Chamber of Peers and the Chamber of Deputies on the subject, and he, therefore, would not propose the right of search at that time, because it would be considered an additional concession (the very word now used in America), an additional concession of France to England—and therefore, he repeated, it was upon that ground he wished to postpone it for the present. The noble and learned lord, after the receiving the American despatches, and he would venture to express a hope that they should no longer hear our neighbours across the Channel sheiter themselves behind the example of America, and maintain that they could not ratify the treaty of 1841, which was only a sort of extension in point of space of the treaties of 1831 and 1833. But they would not carp at these treaties, or call upon us to alter or repeal them on the ground that the United States of America were irreconcilably hostile to slavery in the right sense. He, was the patience, the pro- [illegible] considered as a motion for the previous question, unless the motion to which his motion referred were already in the possession of the house—to the motion of Lord Dudley, for the [illegible] second time, and ordered to be committed on Thursday.—Adjourned till Thursday.

DUNGENESS LIGHTHOUSE.

The importance of this lighthouse is obvious from its position at nearly the narrowest part of the English Channel, and its frequent mention in connexion with the recent shipwrecks on the French coast renders it an object of immediate interest.

By reference to the chart in our paper of last week it will be seen that the lighthouse of Dungeness (or Denge 'Ness) occupies the termination of a tongue of land towards the south-western extremity of the county of Kent, and upon which, at about two miles from the sea, is the decayed town of Lydd, a member of the cinque port of New Romney. From the neighbourhood of Folkestone the coast begins to get lower than hitherto, until it forms the extensive tract of Romney Marsh, the coast-line of which extends south-west to Dungeness, a point nineteen miles south-west of the South Foreland, and from thence westward six or seven miles to the border of the county of Sussex.

There appears to have been a lighthouse nearly at this point for a very considerable period; and the late Earl of Leicester (then Mr. Coke), in memorializing the Lords of the Treasury, in 1825, set forth that the lease of this lighthouse had been held by him and his ancestors, since the 31st year of the reign of Charles II. (by whom it was granted to Richard Tufton Earl of Thanet, whose daughter married Thomas Earl of Leicester), at a rent of £6. 13s. 4d. per annum, with power to collect a duty of one penny per ton on all vessels outward and homeward bound. The lighthouse was continued in the same situation from its first erection to the year 1790; and, probably, it was lit with a blazing fire upon the summit. At this period, in consequence of the continual decline of the sea, and the excessively thick fogs peculiar to that part of the country, the situation of the lighthouse became so ineligible as to render it necessary to erect a new one in another situation pointed out by the Trinity Board. The present lighthouse was accordingly erected at Mr. Coke's expense, under the superintendence of Mr. James Wyatt, partly on the model of the Eddystone Lighthouse. Its height is 110 feet; and the point is defended by a small fort and batteries.

In the year 1821 the building was extensively damaged by lightning, when, in addition to the necessary repairs, various improvements were made in the building.

In 1825 Mr. Coke memorialized the Treasury for a renewal of his lease, at its expiration in 1828, to which the Trinity Board objected on the ground of the recommendation of Parliament in 1822, to transfer this and other private lighthouses to the management of the board. The Lords of the Treasury accordingly refused Mr. Coke the renewal, but they relaxed in their decision in 1826, when they granted him a lease of 21 years, at a rent of £20, on condition that he reduced the toll to one halfpenny, divided the surplus dues equally with the Crown, and at the end of that lease in 1849 conveyed the land on which the lighthouse stands, and the buildings connected with it, to the Crown in fee.

This lighthouse was a source of great emolument to Mr. Coke; for, during five years of the old lease, he netted, on an average, £7,723 yearly; and, in four years of the renewed lease, his annual profits averaged £3,218. In 1832 the light dues produced £2,066 to the Crown, and the same sum to Mr. Coke; but the select committee of the House of Commons on lighthouses, in 1834, considered this result of grave importance, "as the granting an annuity of £2000 a year, payable by the trade of the country, is a most unnecessary grant, in addition to the enormous sums the family of the lessee have received from the shipping and trade of the country during the last 150 years."

The Dungeness is a fixed light, of Argand lamps, with parabolic reflectors—the method by which the majority of the coast of Great Britain is lighted, but which our neighbours have lately abandoned. The Dungeness establishment is not an expensive one, the great item of expense being the oil, which, in one year, costs £220, and £300 for salaries and allowances; but the commission for collecting the dues exceeds £700. An agent at Lydd provides the oil, &c., and attends to repairs, for which he receives £40 a year; and there is but one light-keeper, whose solitariness reminds one of the cure for misanthropy—"Go and keep a lighthouse for a fortnight." Men of average intellect can scarcely be found to become light-keepers: the celebrated Drummond (or lime) light was impracticable in lighthouses by the persons found to fill these situations; and, unfortunately for the cause of humanity, Lieutenant Drummond died, ere, by simplifying the apparatus, he put the finishing hand to his splendid discovery.

On the point of Dungeness is a spring of fresh water, which is covered by the sea every tide. The bay, though very open, is of great service in sheltering shipping when the wind sets violently from particular quarters.

The lighthouse at Dungeness, at the death of the Earl of Leicester, during the past year, descended to the present earl; but in January 1849, or within six years, the entire property will, according to the terms of the lease, fall to the crown and the management of the Trinity Board.

NEWPORT TOWN-HALL.

The accompanying description and engraving of the Newport Town-hall are both from an amateur 'correspondent:—Some time since we presented our readers with a sketch of the opening of the new dock at Newport, Monmouthshire. We now have the pleasure of introducing to them from another pencil the front elevation of the new hall lately erected in that rapidly-increasing and flourishing town. It is a fit accompaniment to the above-mentioned grand undertaking. This elegant and commodious Doric building was after the designs of J. H. Langdon, Esq., to whose good taste many of the recent improvements in the town must be attributed. The figure on the pediment is merely suggested by the artist as an appropriate and desirable embellishment. It occupies a central situation in the main street, and is a great ornament as well as a public benefit. In the grand feature of the building, the spacious hall, which, it is estimated, will contain 2000 persons, the great public meeting was held of the proprietors of coal and iron works of Monmouth and the shires adjacent, to consider the propriety of forming a railway to communicate with the iron and coal districts—a magnificent scheme, which (from the known spirit and enterprise of its projector) will most certainly be carried out to the incalculable advantage of the town and neighbourhood. The credit of the erection is due to the corporation, without whose energy and zeal for the public good the Newport which aspires to be the metropolis of Wales would still be without so desirable an edifice for the transaction of public business. It was opened on the 31st January with a ball and supper, which was attended by many of the leading families of the county, and the élite of the town and neighbourhood. The assembly on this occasion exceeded in brilliancy and beauty any of former times. Among the company so happily brought together by this event were Sir C. Morgan, Bart.; Charles Morgan, Esq., and lady; Sir C. Salusbury, Bart.; Octavius Morgan, Esq.; Colonel Miilman, Colonel Love, and the officers of the 73rd Regiment, the magnificent band of which was kindly allowed by Colonel Love to be present. We have to express a hope in conclusion, that we may "see it's like again" before long; that this, our Town-hall, may be the means of assisting other charitable institutions, to the additional enlightenment and well-being of the community.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXX.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

Contemporaneously with the publication of the Overland Mail—which will be found in another part of our paper—we devote a column to a sketch of Lord Ellenborough, the Governor-General of our Indian empire:—

The office of Governor-General of India is one of the greatest prizes that can fall to the share of any of those who are ambitious of political distinction. To what higher position among the possessors of earthly power can one, not "born in the purple" of royalty, attain? To have sway over an empire of almost boundless extent, to rule as subjects the hundred nations which compose the "dusky millions" of India—there is a grandeur in the ideas connected with the office, even though the power be but delegated, which makes the sitters on the petty feudal thrones of Europe who bear the title of princes look very insignificant in the comparison. Much as the increased intercourse of modern times, and the clearer knowledge of Indian affairs it has produced, has tended to destroy the illusions—once as strong as superstitious—of the wealth and splendour of the "exhaustless East," there is still something of that obscurity which is one of the sources of the sublime about Indian affairs. The European cannot comprehend much that the press brings before him from those distant regions, as regularly as the news from an English county. Merchants ruling the dominions of a Tippoo Sultan, and English subaltern officers, in the character of "residents," disposing things pretty much according to their own fancy in the very palaces of the successors of the Great Mogul; all we meet with wears an air of strangeness; many of our ideas are there reversed, most of them confounded. Human life nearly disregarded, and the life of animal nature almost worshipped; hospitals built for cows and monkeys by the same race who look unmoved on their fellow beings crushed beneath the car of Juggernaut. Everything there seems on a scale more vast than that which can be applied to the continent of Europe. Is the empire afflicted with a famine, it involves whole races in the calamity; do its jungles and morasses breed some new form of disease, it sweeps away millions, and traverses the earth, bearing death upon its wings. Its mountains and rivers make those of Europe sink into mere hills and streamlets. Its past history is at once mysterious and magnificent, its present condition anomalous, its future not altogether discouraging, though pregnant with much that a philanthropist may regard with fear. Such is the empire, such the people whose destinies and interests are to a considerable extent in the hands of Lord Ellenborough, the subject of our present sketch.

Lord Ellenborough is the son of one of those strong-minded men who "achieve greatness," making the law the ladder to political station; as in the present instance, it often happens that the next generation fall into the possession of political power without undergoing the labour of the former one; what the first win by force of talent, the second inherit by right of birth. His lordship is the second baron of the title, which was bestowed on his father, the celebrated judge, in 1802. The present possessor of the dignity is not unknown to the world as a politician, having actively exerted himself on behalf of the Conservative party during the chilly period of its exclusion from office. He has also sat in the House of Commons. Some circumstances of his private life have brought his name more prominently before the public than might be wished, but with this part of the subject we have nothing to do. His talents are above the average; but there seems a general impression that he is rather showy than sound, and a doubt may be permitted as to whether he would ever have worked his way up to his present sphere, had he not been "born so high." He has filled the office of President of the Board of Control; but the routine duty of such a post is scarcely a test of any one's powers as a statesman and a ruler. They will be put to a much severer trial in his present exalted and most responsible position. Up to the present time opinions are much divided as to his conduct: thus, the re-advance of the troops into Affghanistan, after the dreadful disaster of last year, by which the release of the prisoners was obtained, and the honour of the British arms redeemed, and their subsequent evacuation of the country when these important results were secured, have been very generally approved. On the other hand, his celebrated proclamations, which are now exciting the attention of Parliament and the country, are strongly condemned by all parties, and scarcely defended by his own. In such things, the step between the sublime and the ridiculous is very short, and his lordship appears to have got to the wrong side of the boundary. The "gates of the temple of Somnauth," carried from Hindostan to beyond the Indus, some time anterior to our Norman Conquest, might well have been left to rot where they were placed by the successful invader. Among a people so utterly indifferent to the past, so devoid of any associations that make the past of interest, there is no feeling of pride to appeal to by bringing them back again to their ancient locality. The "insult of eight hundred years" is to them no insult at all; and small care have they whether it is avenged or not. Of infinitely more importance to them are the prospects of the next rice harvest. But far graver questions are involved in the transaction than could be affected by a mere violation of good taste. The triumph—if it be one—afforded by the restoration of the gates, conveyed across the plains of India with all the pomp, pride, and circumstance of war, must be a triumph to the Hindoo only to the adorers of Brahma. By as much as they are glorified, the numerous Mahometan population must be degraded and insulted. In the total indifference with which the whole affair will probably be regarded by both, there is hope of safety from evil consequences; but no statesman should ever risk the chance, however remote, of exasperating one race against another. There is also a large body at home, who look on the act as a serious compromise of Christian principle—and formal participation in, and countenance given to, an idolatrous and impure worship. The Duke of Wellington, in the course of the debate on the address, gave his decided approval to all the military movements of Lord Ellenborough (the orders for which were, in all probability, suggested by the duke himself), but he was silent as to the proclamations and the gates. This, and the attack of Sir R. H. Inglis in the House of Commons, are significant. The transaction is censured by the press both of England and India condemned, irrespective of politics—both by Churchmen and Dissenters. It only wanted a doubt to be thrown on the trophies themselves to complete the business, and this the last arrivals from India have furnished. The published letter of an Indian officer—smacking rather of military licence in its language—says, "Devil a bit of sandal-wood is there in their whole composition; they are decided deal, and terribly worm-eaten."

THE RIGHT HON. SHAW LEFEVRE,

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

We this week redeem our promise with regard to the omission of the portrait of the Right Hon. Shaw Lefevre, the Speaker of the House of Commons, from the last number of our journal, to the letter-press published in which we now refer our readers for the article which should properly accompany the present illustration.

THE WELSH RIOTERS.

Our readers are already aware of the existence of a band of midnight legislators, who infest Carmarthenshire and the contiguous districts of South Wales, under the somewhat mysterious appellation of Rebecca and her Daughters, the object of whose confederacy seems to be an unmitigable crusade against union workhouses and turnpike-gates. So far this formidable tribe have evinced no more selfish dispositions than making (as they call it) "good terms for the poor," for, although well equipped for the most predatory and marauding expeditions, they have as yet cautiously abstained from committing themselves by any burglarious enterprise. On each of these excursions the troop consists of a large number of men and boys, all of them well mounted, and most of them dressed in women's clothes, and nearly all armed with guns, pistols, pitchforks, hay-knives, reaping-hooks, crow-bars, or some other weapon, and are invariably headed by Rebecca, who is described as being a remarkably strong tall man, well disguised, and who appears to have unlimited authority over the lawless crew, who term themselves her children. It is confidently stated that this mysterious individual is no less a personage than a county magistrate; and a correspondent informs us that Rebecca is frequently replaced by another, and is not the same on the night of each outrage. It is not the least remarkable circumstance in this extraordinary movement, that when the troops appear in one part of the county, Rebecca invariably appears in another, perhaps fourteen or fifteen miles distant. The most extraordinary feature in this insurrectionary movement—for it is an insurrectionary movement, though at present, perhaps, not very formidable—is, that neither the civil force nor the military, nor the yeomanry, have been able, not only not to put it down, but even to succeed in apprehending a single offender. Thirty veteran pensioners went down from Carmarthen to St. Clear's on Tuesday week, and a troop of lancers are daily expected on the spot. Judging, however, from the past abortive attempts to suppress the lawless movement, people are not very sanguine in their expectations of a speedy restoration of the supremacy of the law. Indeed, the Captain Rock-like proceedings in Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire seem, from all we can learn, to assume daily a more threatening complexion.

THE WELSH RIOTERS.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The ordinary monthly express from Marseilles, in anticipation of the overland mail from India, was published at Paris on Friday se'nnight, and was received in London on Sunday; and we have since received letters and papers which bring intelligence up to the 3rd of January. The intelligence from China is of the following dates:—Macao, Nov. 19th; Hong Kong, Nov. 15th; Chusan, Oct. 31st.

The news thus received, though not of the exciting interest of some mails of last year, is satisfactory, as proving that the peace and tranquility so much desired in our eastern possessions have been thoroughly established.

The different corps of the army under the command of General Pollock had crossed the Sutlej, and, after their fatigues and their sufferings, their campaigns and their battles, the soldiers were about to enjoy their triumphs and their rewards.

On the 17th, the garrison of Jellalabad crossed the river, several of the ladies formerly prisoners having preceded them. At one end of the bridge over the Sutlej a pavilion had been erected, where Lord Ellenborough stationed himself, with his secretaries, while the troops passed. He politely raised his hat and bowed low to Lady Sale and some other ladies on elephants, who led the column. On General Sale crossing, the Commander-in-Chief rode up and shook him warmly by the hand, which pleased him much. The Europeans of her Majesty's 13th came gravely into camp, but the sepoys of the 35th, more keenly feeling the intense pleasure of returning, after so long an absence from friends and home, or less used to suppress emotion, could not conceal the joy they experienced. They were saluted as they passed along the lines. Altogether a more joyful scene could not have been presented. A flood in the river having threatened to carry away the bridge of boats, finery and all, General Pollock crossed on the 18th, a day sooner than was intended, and the rest of the force followed; so that all were encamped within our own territory by the 20th.

The batta promised, and the medals, were about to be distributed with a liberal hand, and general rejoicing appeared to be the order of the day. Various exaggerated reports had been circulated about a sort of plague resembling the smallpox having broken out in one of the corps, but the correct version shows that the malady was of a mild form, and committed no ravages. Several officers, however, had died on the march; amongst whom we regret to record the names of Lieut. R. F. Frere, of her Majesty's 13th; Capt. T. Pender, and Lieuts. K. Y. Sayers and Tritton, her Majesty's 31st; Capt. A. Webster, 43d Native Infantry; Capt. J. Hoppe, 16th Native Infantry; and Capt. White, her Majesty's 3rd Dragoons.

There were rumours about jealousies and bickerings stated to prevail among the generals, and it excited general regret that those who had fought so well together should disagree while returning from the scene of their exploits. The old jealousy between Generals Pollock and Nott appears to have revived; as General Nott tendered resignation of the command of his division, which, however, the Commander-in-Chief refused to accept. A quarrel also took place between Brigadier Wild and Colonel Moseley, and the latter gentleman was for some time under arrest. The matter, however, was eventually settled by General M'Caskill.

The absurd idea of erecting a triumphal arch for the passage of the army of Affghanistan had been abandoned, and Lord Ellenborough had determined on providing for the sepoys the more substantial gratification of £2000 worth of "sweetmeats."

The whole of the "Army of Reserve" had encamped in two lines, one fronting the north, the other the west; the right of the first line is very near the spot where Sir Henry Fane's head-quarters were in 1838, and stretches along east and west thus:—1st division of infantry, artillery, cavalry; on the left of the cavalry, with their left brought a little forward, are the sappers. In line with the interval between the 1st and 2nd brigade of cavalry running south, is the 2nd division of infantry; head-quarters are east of the left regiment of this division, and west-south-west of the town. The Governor-General is encamped south east of head-quarters, north of the race-course, and north-west of the cantonment.

We have no programme of the entertainments with which it is proposed to celebrate the return of the troops at Ferozepore; but all parties who write from the scene of the intended festivities speak with confidence of a long series of dinners, balls, soirees, and other amusements calculated to gladden the hearts and enliven the spirits of the guests. The only apprehension is, that the large expenditure of public money which Lord Ellenborough's merry-making will involve may be deemed by the home authorities as an unwarrantable piece of extravagance.

The "Army of Reserve," it is positively asserted, will be broken up on the 3rd of January. This report may have had its origin in the invariable desire to mystify which marks the proceedings of Lord Ellenborough; and if the interview between his lordship and the Maharajah be really to take place, there is some foundation for the belief that the "Army of Reserve" is, after all, intended for service in the Punjaub. The next mail will, no doubt, convey some decisive information on the subject.

It is reported that, on the conclusion of the festivities at Ferozepore, Lord Ellenborough will proceed to Delhi, and afterwards pay a visit to Agra. One account states that, on his progress to the former city, he will be accompanied by 8000 troops; another, that the whole "Army of Reserve" is to follow him thither.

A demand had been made upon the Ameers of Scinde for their assent to a treaty, by which Kurrache, Tatta, Sukkur, Bukkur, and Roree, with a strip of land of no great breadth all along the line of the Indus, so far as their territory extended—that is, for a distance of 500 miles; together with the free navigation of the river, should be entirely ceded in perpetuity. The town of Sukkur is a large one, on the bank opposite to Hyderabad, but 170 miles higher up. Bukkur is a fort on a strong rocky island in the middle of the stream, connecting Sukkur with Roree on the right bank, and so opening a free communication from our principal posts into the Talpoor territory. Shikarpore is meant to be made over to the Bahawulpore Rajah, on condition of his removing the whole of the toll levies from the river, in so far as it passes along his frontier. The Ameers appeared at first eager to make a determined resistance, but the presence of the British army under the command of Sir Charles Napier had diminished that eagerness. Major Outram, who was removed in November from the political agency at Hyderabad, had early in December received orders from the Governor-General to resume those functions, as his knowledge of the inhabitants and their rulers was likely to prove advantageous. He started from Bombay on board a steamer on the 16th of December, to proceed to join Sir Charles Napier, and to conclude the arrangements by which it was expected would be speedily effected to the satisfaction of the parties. Meer Loobdar, to whom Kurrachee belonged, agreed to do anything the Governor-General wished. He is to have an equivalent in territory given to him for Kurrachee. Meer Morad Alli was also friendly inclined, and offered his assistance to the British authorities. This is the Ameer with whom Sir Charles Napier had an interview, and ordered out all the troops at Sukkur to show off before him; the rapidity of the movements of the troops, and the independent firing kept up for some time, astonished him; he had never witnessed such a continued rolling fire of musketry in his life, and exclaimed, "Wonderful soldiers are these (some 5000) being able to keep it up so long. Notwithstanding the professions of the Ameers, however, and their expressions of servility to do all that the Governor-General required, they were collecting troops at Hyderabad in the beginning of December, and were to proceed with an escort to Peshawur, where he was to reside for some time, under the protection of the Sikh government. The intention of the Governor-General to observe neutrality on the subject of the Cabul government was avowed explicitly.

The victories in Affghanistan and Chun had produced the effect of quieting even the most disturbed parts of the Bundlecund district. It was asserted that some documents had been discovered which tended to implicate the deposed sovereign of Hindostan, or, as he is called, the descendant of the Great Mogul, in those disturbances. The existence of the government had, however, neutralized all attempts on his part, and on that of his abettors, to create confusion in India.

The great event of the month undoubtedly was the publication of the Governor-General's address to the princes of India, on the restoration of the gates of Somnauth. The gates, whose recovery appears from the proclamation to have been the principal object of the war, were taken, according to a dubious tradition, some forty years before the date of the Norman conquest, from the temple of Somnauth, in Guzerat, where, for 400 years, a mosque has existed, and where the population is now entirely Mahomedan. For 800 years they had been attached to the tomb of Mahmood of Ghuznee; it is by no means certain indeed that they ever were anywhere else; the state of our knowledge of the history of the region of Affghanistan will give some notion of the faith to be placed in the traditions in reference to Mahmood of Ghuznee—a contemporary king! These trophies are to be sent back to the place whence, it is said, they came; but that event is now complete. A temple must be built, and a portion of Hindoo worshippers collected in the heart of an entirely Mahomedan country before the gates can find a post of rest. About 15,000,000 of the best disposed British subjects in India are Mahomedans, who look upon the desecration of the tombs of their ancestors as the most intolerable injury that can be inflicted on them. Mahmood of Ghuznee, whose sepulchre has been despoiled, is regarded by them as the great light and pillar, the champion and the pride of the Mahomedan faith in India, and by all of them must Lord Ellenborough's gate proclamation be viewed as an indignity. It is regarded as an ominous event by no one: the Hindoos know nothing whatever of the tradition of the gates—it is referred to by none of their historians, and should we urge them to wipe off the insults of 800 years, we may put them in mind of others of more recent date, which they have to avenge. Lord Ellenborough, after the Ferozepore festivities are over, proceeds to Delhi, taking with him a body guard of 8000 men! The resolution at the close of the proclamation of the 20th of October, announcing the determination to set the Affghan prisoners, has been departed from in so far as Dost Mahomed and the other chiefs are not required to present themselves at the Governor-General's durbar at Ferozepore. His lordship had an interview with the ex-Ameer at Loodianah, who proceeds to Lahore, and thence through the Punjaub, accompanied by an escort of British troops, to the frontiers of his own territory. An incident has occurred at Bombay which has caused a very general sensation, from an extreme application of a questionable cause of an Indian act; the government appearing to have exercised a very great stretch of authority in, very naturally, withholding information was sent in to government, it is said anonymously, to the effect that very large sums of money had been forwarded by the Guicowar to a native merchant called Dhackjee Dadjee, as a bribe to the Governor-General, of which these things Sir James Carnac had formerly partaken. A search-warrant, subscribed by all the members of government, was immediately issued, by virtue of which the whole of the business books, private papers, and current correspondence of Dhackjee Dadjee were examined, and nothing found to give the slightest colour to the allegations against any of the parties. It is said, moreover, that the Guicowar has threatened to withdraw his ambassador [illegible] away money whatever to the party inculpated, save what he owed him for merchandize received. The information appears to have been got up as a piece of spite against Dhackjee, in the case of his previously having been a favourite mode of manifesting native animosity. The steamer Hindostan, from England by the Cape, arrived at Madras on the 19th December, and sailed the day afterwards. She had probably reached Calcutta on the 26th December. She had been 59 days under steam, and made on an average 191 miles a day. She was detained in coming 97 days, having touched at Gibraltar, Cape de Verd, Ascension, St. Helena, the Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius, Ceylon, and Madras. The Calcutta people seem grumbling at the idea of her heavy charges. Dr. Wilson, head of the Scottish mission, and long President of the Asiatic Society, left Bombay for England, taking Syria and Palestine on his way. His departure is deeply regretted: he has long taken a leading place amongst the Orientalists of Western India, and no one could have discharged the sacred duties of his mission with more untiring or unslackening zeal and perseverance.

BOMBAY

FESTIVITIES AT PAREL.—A splendid party of upwards of 500 persons assembled at Government House, Parel, on the evening of Thursday, to a ball and supper, given in honour of Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, on the occasion of bestowing on him by the Governor a medal conferred by the British Government. We have seldom seen the magnificent apartments at Parel so crowded. Amongst the most conspicuous guests of the evening were the Baboo Dwarkanauth Tagore and suite, just arrived from England, and about to leave by the Carnac steamer for Calcutta; and General Ventura and staff, the magnificent dresses of the former of whom threw the other brilliant and varied uniforms and costumes of the party completely into the shade.

DINNER TO MAJOR OUTRAM.—On the evening of Tuesday, the 13th, a dinner was given in the British Hotel to Major James Outram. There were upwards of 100 gentlemen present, including the very cream and élite of the Bombay European population, the secretaries of Government, Sudder judges, the heads of the civil service, military and naval departments, with a great majority of the members of the mercantile community

THE FIGHT AT ISTALIFF.—A despatch from Major-General M'Caskill, omitted in his report of the operations against Istalif, has been published by order of the Governor-General for general information, by which it appears that the brunt of the action fell on the infantry corps and sappers of Brigadier Tailor's brigade, by which all of consequence was done. Sturdy right, of allowing him no respite or breathing time on that line, of aiding and completing the capture of the town, when its possession was hotly disputed from behind wall to wall, house to house, from court-yards, and winding streets built on steep declivities, is due to the regiment under Brigadier Stacy. His commendations were especially earned by Major G. Browne and her Majesty's 41st Regiment, for the share they took in these gallant efforts, and for the exemplary humanity displayed by the men towards the unfortunate families of the vanquished. That corps was seriously wounded and engaged on the 42nd Native Infantry under Major Clarkson, and the 43rd under Major Nash.

BUNDLECUND.—Colonel Watson had fallen in with a strong body of insurgents on the 8th, of whom he had made a severe example. Hugh Fraser, the principal assistant to the Sagor commissioner, who had been wounded in this affair, had since died of lock-jaw. On the 9th an express reached the camp at Maung from Jhansi Ooma, ordering back the troops under Colonel Blackall with all speed, in order that they might arrive at Sagor by the 14th. Colonel Watson was likewise ordered to march on, without delay, to Dumoor and Gollapoor, to watch and protect the valley of the Nerbudda. The reason assigned for these movements was, that upwards of 20,000 Bundelahs had assembled near Banda, and the Ghoand Shakoors were likewise on the eve of rising. Major Sleeman, who was surrounded on [illegible] side, had summoned troops from all quarters, and the 31st Bengal Native Infantry, a thousand strong, had left Sagor for the purpose of affording assistance. The Rajah of Hernpore had also made his appearance, and had fled to the Bhossal hills; but as these were strongly guarded on the opposite side by the Rohil lahs (or police), he had therefore little chance of escape. His wives and his suite, with all of consequence, were in

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1843.

The session has opened, but its first week has been more like the few intervals of suspense which elapse between the false starts upon a race-course, than a regular plunge into the full heat of the contest. The members are not well on upon their journey, and little or nothing has been yet done, although much has been written upon that little or nothing. There was a good stiff debate upon the address, so far as declamation went, and the result was a sort of party indication of Ministerial strength, pretty nearly equalled by Ministerial difficulty. The Premier does not see why he should be positively expected to come forward with a "great measure," nor, on the other hand, that he would be very likely to be beaten if he did. No manifesto, therefore, is yet issued, and we are in a sort of semi-satisfactory state of abeyance. We glean, however, from discussions in the Commons, that Sir Robert Peel will not cede one iota of the principle of the right of search, and this is a firmness which, like that of M. Guizot, is honourable and vindicatory of our national character. Meanwhile France insults her President of Council with allusions to Waterloo, and an uproarious scene of recrimination, which Marshal Soult can well afford to despise—while Brougham, avowing himself in the House of Lords the holder of the olive branch between England and that country, manages to meet in a spirit of brotherhood the complimentary expressions of French Ministers towards this—without, however, getting any better thanks for his generosity than they got for theirs. The French press is rabid against us, and the Thiers party monomaniacal in its struggles to foment discord and abjure peace. The debates of an English Parliament do not, however, address themselves to foreign politics with the vociferative eloquence of a French tribune. We are more calm—wear the air of people in the act of digestion—and talk of affairs at home more earnestly and happily than of affairs abroad. We do not grapple with words of foreign wars by words of declamation, which are wasted if the wars come not—but, allowing the bully to take his course of swagger, only notice him seriously when we find that he begins to fight. We are not so stirred with "sensation" within our Commons' House, because one of the best and noblest of Ministers that ever adorned the councils of France is worried and snarled at by an opposition which builds its strength upon the abrogation of every principle of virtue and of truth. We are content to hear Sir Robert Peel say that he will not yield those principles, in the name of the Sovereign whose councils he upholds. Upon the right of search Guizot and Peel are d'accord.

More of interest than French debating has been able to command from us has been manifested with regard to the administration of Government in our own colonies. The proclamation of Lord Ellenborough has aroused the indignation of the high churchmen, and the punishment of Canadian rebellionists has given rise to a discussion upon affairs in British America, which opens a wide field for reflection to those interested in the prosperity of the fine country which that able officer Sir Charles Metcalfe is going out—we venture to hope under the most fair auspices—to govern.

In all the Parliamentary intelligence of the week, however, the feature which best pleases us—which we alike honour Mr. Tuffnell for proposing, and Mr. Thomas Duncombe and Sir Robert Peel for supporting—is the suspension of the writ for Sudbury, the implied promise of punishment upon the wholesale and corrupt bribery and perjury which took place in that and many other boroughs of the constituency at the last election. We are quite beyond all party in our abhorrence of such infamous prostitution of the sacred rights of citizenship; and we have frequently given strong expression to our opinions upon this theme. We sincerely hope that Sudbury, and all localities of similar corrupt influence, may be disfranchised without palliation, compunction, or regret.

While we are yet writing the House of Lords is beginning the discussion of the most momentous topic that has yet stirred the Legislature during the present session—the distress of the country. This we regard as the first real onslaught in the battle of business; and this we will watch, record, and comment upon, with most anxious interest in the fate of the question and the welfare of the enduring millions whom it is agitated to relieve.

The lovers of peace and order will rejoice that the French Cabinet has gained a respite by the passing of the address, and although the feeling displayed in the Chamber of Deputies is anything but promising as to the future, we feel relieved from a great weight of anxiety which the events of last week had excited in our minds. It is terrible, however, to be kept in dreadful suspense by these periodical fits of passion in the French Legislature; and that no security can be felt for the next twenty-four hours—what new topic of excitement may not be found by our resolute neighbours on the other side of the straits.

Our Paris correspondent, who is in a position to watch the movements of all parties, entertains the opinion that the French Cabinet will not be able to weather the session. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. We trust that the great judgment, consummate tact, and oratorical skill of the intrepid Minister of Foreign Affairs may yet avert the evils attendant on a change of administration. The great misfortune of France has been in the non-durability of her Ministers. She requires a strong and lasting Government to inspire confidence amongst the great European statesmen, and it would be fatal to her interests, now that Continental Cabinets are so well disposed towards her, if rash and unprincipled men were again to return to the helm of affairs.

We are happy to assure our readers that they may dismiss any apprehensions provoked by many exaggerated statements as to the nature and position of the dispute between France and Spain. The English Government has assumed a becoming attitude in the affair, and if a reconciliation be not effected by its honourable mediation, at least no fears need be felt that France will be permitted to indulge in any family designs by an active intervention in Spain. The interest of Louis Philippe will prevent any attempt to pass the Pyrenees, after England has declared, "Thus far shalt thou go and no further."

FOREIGN POLITICS.

PARIS, Feb. 7, 1843.

Nothing is talked of but a probable rupture between France and Spain, and the greatest exaggerations exist as to the state of the affair. As I was the first to call attention to this dispute, I will briefly describe its nature and its exact position at the hour I write. After the Barcelona bombardment, the Political Agent of that town, Senor Gutierez, drew up a report, which was published in the Madrid Gazette. In this report the conduct of M. De Lesseps, the French Consul, was seriously impugned, as he was charged with having fomented the insurrection. The Spanish Cabinet, on the faith of the allegations in the report of their agent, transmitted instructions to Senor Hernandez, the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires in Paris, to demand the recal of M. de Lesseps. The note was drawn up in such violent terms that Senor Hernandez submitted it to Lord Cowley, our Ambassador in Paris, who immediately advised the Spanish agent not to deliver it; a course the more prudent, as the French Government had already demanded formally satisfaction for the insults to their own agent by false accusations. There is not the slightest doubt that, if the two Cabinets had been left to themselves, a very serious collision would have occurred; but Lord Cowley undertook, with great tact, the difficult task of mediation, and sent instructions to Mr. Aston, our Envoy in Madrid, to employ every conciliatory means. Unfortunately, before Lord Cowley's despatches reached Madrid, the Duc de Glucksberg, acting on instructions from the French Foreign-office, had taken a very high and offensive tone, and the peril of the dispute was therefore prior to the fresh instructions sent by M. Guizot. On the 29th of January the latter sent in his ultimatum by a special courier to Madrid, with injunctions to the Duc de Glucksberg to afford every possible latitude to the Spanish Cabinet to decide, and to wait a fortnight, if necessary. Lord Cowley, by the same courier, also wrote to Mr. Aston to lend his aid to terminate amicably the affair. It is quite false that the French Cabinet has sent orders to the frontiers for an increase of the troops. It is also quite incorrect that the Cabinet has ordered M. de Glucksberg and M. de Lesseps to demand their passports. The only question at issue is, whether the Regent of Spain will withdraw the charges brought against M. de Lesseps; and as the English Cabinet is of opinion that the satisfaction ought to be given to France, there is every reason to believe that Espartero will yield, as he must get the worst of a rupture with the French Government. But even in the event of a withdrawal of diplomatic agents between France and Spain, it would be the extent of the mischief; for, great as are the dynastic intrigues of Louis Philippe, he knows full well that his crown would not be worth a year's purchase if he attempted to pass the Pyrenees.

This Spanish question has eclipsed the right of search agitation. The debates in the British Parliament you will be glad to learn have produced a very wholesome effect here. I have heard several Deputies express their regret that journalism and the Chambers had so exaggerated the effect of the slave suppression treaties.

You must not hastily draw the conclusion that the Cabinet has been consolidated by the vote on the address. It is still in a weak and precarious state, and I still think will not pass the session. On three capital questions—namely, Spain, Syria, and the right of search, the Ministry has been either signally defeated or has received a great moral check. In the paragraph referring to Spain there was an alteration successfully proposed by M. Odilon Barrot of great importance. The original passage of the commission echoing the King's speech stood thus:—"In your relations with the Spanish monarchy you have only to keep in view the protection of our legitimate interests, and the preservation of faithful friendship for Queen Isabella." Now this has been changed into "sincere affection for the constitutional Government of her Spanish Majesty;" thus annihilating the dynastic meaning in the speech from the Crown, which, by the way, was written by the King himself (I mean the Spanish paragraph), against M. Guizot's consent, thus forcing the minister to accept the amended version of M. Odilon Barrot. On the address itself there were two divisions—one on M. Berryer's amendment, giving 206 against 203, a majority against the Ministry; and one of 278 against 101 on the ensemble of the address, giving a majority for the Ministers of 177. Now the first division is the real key to the strength of the Ministerial majority, because the vote on the address is purely a dynastic or anti-dynastic expression. The meaning of the 101 Deputies who are in the minority is—that they will upset, if they can, the throne of Louis Philippe altogether. It is a vote of Royalists, Republicans, Bonapartists, and Anti-Louis Philippeist Liberals. The Thiers and Odilon Barrot dynastic opposition voted in the majority. In short, the ensemble of the address is never looked upon as a trial of Ministerial strength. It is on the paragraphs that the real struggle takes place; and on these the Cabinet was defeated on the Syrian, and was obliged to accept the Spanish and right of search phrases, to prevent a defeat. I have explained to you, in my previous letters, that neither Count Molé nor M. Thiers was disposed to upset the Ministry on the question of demanding the abrogation of the 1831 and 1833 treaties; but their tactics have been directed to undermine the Ministry by side-winds, and one day, when it is least expected, you will hear of a defeat of the Cabinet, and of its resignation, when it may appear to you to be quite strong. M. Guizot, who of course knows the Parliamentary tactics, does not deceive himself as to his perilous position, and is anxious, therefore, to have the Ministerial question decided. He will, therefore (or, rather, the Minister of the Interior), introduce one day this week the bill for the grant of supplementary secret service money in the Chamber of Deputies, and it will be discussed next week. My opinion is that he will get a majority on that question; because Count Molé and M. Thiers contend that this vote ought to be refused to no existing Cabinet, and that it is not one which should be selected to upset a Ministry. This is strange reasoning, for certainly it is a vote of confidence; but the French like the tortuous in preference to the straight course in all affairs.

I have before me, and, as I think, exclusively, the Budget for 1844 of the Minister of France. It contains 897 pages, and I hastily supply you with some items of interest to English readers. The effective of the French army is fixed at 280,000 men; the troops in Africa are fixed at 60,000, instead of 33,000, as before. Supplementary credits are demanded for the port of Algiers. The French fleet is fixed at 160 vessels, divided into three categories, and the effective of the crews at 30,872 men. The fortifications of Paris are carried on with the greatest activity. The Consulate agents in the Levant are again increased.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—This morning her Majesty and Prince Albert took their accustomed walking exercise. His royal highness Prince Albert afterwards hunted with his harriers, attended by the Earl of Hardwicke, Colonel Wylde, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Mr. Anson. The royal party met at Mr. Mason's farm at Upton, where they soon started a hare, and had a capital run. In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert again walked out in the royal pleasure-grounds.

A Cabinet Council was held yesterday (Thursday) at the Foreign-office. The council sat an hour and a half. The Earl of Jersey had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street. Mr. Dehaney, Solicitor to the Excise, had also an interview with the right hon. gentleman. Baron Brunow, the Russian Minister, transacted business at the Foreign-office. Sir J. Graham had an interview with Sir R. Peel.

This day (Friday) is the third anniversary of her Majesty's marriage.

The Speaker commences his Parliamentary dinners on Saturday; they will be continued till Easter.

The Commercial treaty between Holland and Belgium has been formally ratified.

Several of the Cabinet Ministers had interviews with Sir Robert Peel this morning (Friday). Sir George Clerk and Sir Thomas Fremantle also transacted business with the right hon baronet in Whitehall-gardens.

The packet-ship South America has been telegraphed off Holyhead at 8 o'clock this morning (Friday), but as the wind is from N.E., it is scarcely possible for her to get up before to-morrow.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—The Court of Proprietors met again on Thursday to proceed with the adjourned debate relative to the case of the Rajah of Sattara. In the course of the proceedings Mr. Weeding moved the adjournment of the court, which on a division was carried, the numbers being, for the adjournment 46, for Mr. Lewis's motion 18.

DEATH OF LORD DUFFUS.—Intelligence has been received in town of the death of the above nobleman, the melancholy event taking place at the family-seat near Caithness, N.B. The deceased was born on the 28th of April, 1761, and married, in 1795, Miss Hannah M'Kay, daughter of Mr. George M'Kay, of Bighouse, N.B., by whom he has a family of two sons and a daughter. The late lord is succeeded by his eldest son, the Hon. George Dunbar, born on the 6th of January, 1799.

GREAT FREE-TRADE BANQUET AT MANCHESTER.

During the past week Manchester has been the scene of no ordinary excitement upon the absorbing topic of free trade; and meetings and banquets have been held in honour of the principle, and to forward the interests of the cause, upon a scale of unusual extent and grandeur. The animating picture which is here presented to our readers describes the festival which took place on Thursday, the 2nd inst., and it is one of those news-events which we deem ourselves bound to present to our readers. We made a promise in the outset of our career to reflect faithfully, both by illustration and letterpress, the passing events of the time; and it is in the spirit of that promise that we now record the great festivity which has of late been stirring the heart of busy Manchester upon the subject of free trade—above all in the article of corn. But while thus gratifying the natural curiosity of the public upon a mere event of news, we do not involve our own opinions in the discussion of the great question at issue, which we have already declared seems sufficiently agitated without our intervention or aid. We ventured, on a former occasion, during a period of public tumult, to hint our doubts of the good taste of the then measures of the Anti-Corn-Law League; but to the more peaceful earnestness of their recent agitation we have no feasible right to demur. The outspoken expression of opinion, and even organised advocacy of particular principles of legislation, is always one of the dearest—though often an abused—right of British subjects; and Heaven avert the hour when the free expression of fair and honest conviction shall be silenced or stifled by any tyranny of law. To such great public meetings as we here describe we have therefore no tenable objection; while, on the other hand, we have a right to decline a participation in the discussions themselves, and to leave the great public to its judgment upon the mighty interests involved.

This great banquet in the Free-trade Hall took place on Thursday the 2nd inst., when 3400 ladies and gentlemen took their seats in the body of the hall, and 400 in the galleries. The hall presented one of the most imposing spectacles the mind can well conceive, when the company had taken their seats. It is almost unnecessary to say that every seat was occupied, for the tickets had been at a premium for some days past. Twenty-one tables had been placed for the accommodation of the company in the body of the hall, of which four were on a dais at the western end, placed at different elevations, of which the chairman's and principal gentlemen's were the highest. The three others were occupied by deputies and the press. The remaining seventeen tables, each of which were upwards of 100 feet in length, were placed at right angles with the head tables, extending the whole length of the hall. The arrangements had been so admirably made, that the whole of the immense assembly took their seats without the least confusion. This was accomplished by simply lettering the tables and numbering the seats, and no ticket was issued to any of the company without having pasted at the back of it the letter of the table and number of the seat. The same arrangements were observed in the galleries. Another admirable arrangement was observable in the distances at which the tables were placed from each other, securing the comfort of the company, whilst the aisles, to secure the same objects, were kept entirely free from intrusion both at the the time of, and after, dinner. The decorations of the room were tasteful and elegant in the extreme, and of so profuse and varied a character, that a full description might occupy a volume. We can only notice a few of the principal ones. Assuming that our readers are acquainted with the internal construction of this vast arena, divided as it is into three grand compartments by two parallel rows of elegant Ionic columns, we may state that these pillars were cased with beautiful white fluted drapery, and around them were twisted spiral wreaths of evergreens and flowers. From the summit of each of these columns projected a small flag, the inscriptions on which were various and appropriate. Immediately over the centre of the chairman's table was placed a most elegant crimson velvet drapery, very tastefully arranged. Below it was exhibited a large silk banner, inscribed in large letters "Justice," and strongly illuminated by gas from behind. On each side of this were suspended small flags, bearing appropriate inscriptions. At the back of the gallery at the east end of the hall was placed a splendid banner, bearing the royal arms, with small flags projecting from each side. This portion of the east gallery, which was immediately opposite the chairman's seat, was occupied by a band, which played several favourite airs during the evening.

The doors were thrown open at five o'clock, a full hour before the commencement of the dinner; and by the judicious arrangements made for the admission of the company at four doors, and by the numbering of the seats and tickets, the most perfect order was maintained, and the whole of the vast assembly, near four thousand, were enabled to proceed to their places with the utmost facility. Probably on no occasion have such an immense number of persons been collected together with less of confusion or departure from the prescribed arrangements. The doors were thronged with coaches, cars, and vehicles of every description, until six o'clock, the hour appointed for the chair to be taken, and the crowd collected outside, both in Peter-street and Windmill-street, to witness the arrival of the company, was almost enormous, but the utmost order and good feeling appeared to prevail amongst them, as evinced by the readiness with which persons were enabled to pass through the crowd in crossing from one side of the street to the other.

The chairman and guests arrived shortly after six o'clock, and were conducted to their seats amidst the most deafening cheers, the whole of the company rising and testifying their applause.

Mark Phillips, Esq., M.P., occupied the chair. On his right sat James Kershaw, Esq., mayor of Manchester; Thomas M. Gibson, Esq., M.P.; R. H. Greg, Esq.; John Bowring, Esq., LL.D., M.P.; Joseph Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; Sharman Crawford, Esq., M.P.; the Rev. Thomas Spencer, M.A., Incumbent of Hinton Charterhouse, near Bath; Thomas Ashton, Esq., of Hyde; T. Ashton, jun., Esq.; W. R. Callender, Esq., of Manchester; Thomas Bazley, jun., Esq. of Salford; John Bright, Esq., of Rochdale; R. R. R. Moore, Esq.; Sir Valentine Blake, M.P.; H. C. Wright, Esq., of Philadelphia; and some other gentlemen, whose names we did not learn. On the left of the chair sat the following gentlemen:—The Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P.; Colonel Perronet Thompson, General Sir de Lacy Evans; J. Scholefield, Esq., M.P.; Henry Marsland, Esq., M.P.; William Aldam, Esq., M.P.; George William Wood, Esq., M.P., Sir Thomas Potter; J. Wilson, Esq., of London; P. A. Taylor, Esq., of London; J. T. Clay, Esq., of Rastrick; Thomas Cullen, Esq., of Bolton; and T. Kelly, Esq., of Liverpool. Mr. O'Connell arrived shortly after the repast had commenced. The festival passed off after the usual manner of public banquets, with many speeches, and as little disorder as could have been expected in so numerous an assemblage

THE NEW LAW COURTS.

Our readers have here an en avance representation of the new Law Courts intended to be erected in their gardens, under the superintendence of Mr. Hardwick, by the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, and for the commencement of which preparations have been during the week commenced. It would appear that a great portion of the fine terrace walk, which was raised in the time of James I., and also of the avenue of trees, which has so long afforded shade and ornament, must be demolished. From an article in the "Law Magazine" of the present month we collect the following particulars of the intended improvements:—The new buildings will consist of a dining-hall, a drawing-room, a council-room, and a library. The structure will be of deep red brick interlaced with bricks of a darker colour. The quoins and dressings will be of stone. The style of architecture which Mr. Hardwick has selected may be referred to about the middle of the Tudor period, more inclining to the highly decorated perpendicular of the time of Henry the Eighth than the Cinque-cento mixture of the reign of Elizabeth. In the adoption of the red brick, says the reviewer, Mr. Hardwick has shown good taste and judgment; for no material is so little deteriorated by the smoke of the eternal fires of the metropolis,—and according to general rumour there is no place smokier in all London than Lincoln's-inn-fields. The two principal façades will front Stone-buildings on the east, and Lincoln's-inn-fields on the west. Each will have some different features, which will possess an interest of their own. While the eastern front will differ from the west in exhibiting the entrances up terraced steps, the western front will have an elegant canopied turret terminating the northern end. The gable ends of the two chief buildings, the hall and library, will be unlike—that of the hall on the south end consisting of two square turrets with a large central perpendicular window, as in Westminster-hall; whilst the ends of the library, which will stand east and west, will terminate in bay windows. In both apartments the roofs will be formed of beams of oak, springing from corbels, with panels and pendents. The hall roof will be the more decorated of the two, and something like that of Hampton Court, though less elaborate. The dimensions of the hall will be 120 feet in length, by 45 feet in breadth, and 54 feet in height. The dimensions of the library will be 80 feet in length, by 40 feet in breadth, and 48 feet in height. The building will occupy about two years to erect.

FINE ARTS.

British Museum.—Exhibition of Marbles from Asia Minor.

What are the objects, advantages, and pleasures of an exhibition of fine art? A hundred years have not elapsed since the first one in this country was opened. The "adventure," notwithstanding the ignorance of the people and the apathy of the fashionable classes, was successful. Mrs. Salmon's wax-work and the monsters of Guildhall were eclipsed, and men of taste rejoiced. But while it was hailed by artists as a great and necessary step taken in our national civilization, it was fiercely decried by critics as beneath the dignity of reason, and destructive of the "poetic vein." Statesmen viewed the prodigy with alarm; moralists denounced it as puerile. "Surely (said Johnson) life, if it be not long, is tedious, since we are forced to call in the assistance of so many trifles to rid us of our time—of that time which can never return." Another grumbler, Dr. Tucker, the Dean of Gloucester, sneering at the popular movement, said, "A pin-maker was a more useful and valuable member of society than Rafaelle." Worthy descendant of the picture-abhorring Roundheads!—a pin's head, significant of his cerebral dimensions, should have been his monument. But he needed none, an answer, as immortal as his folly, was at hand. "That (rejoined the champion of British arts, Sir Joshua Reynolds), that is an observation of a narrow mind—a mind that is confined to the mere object of commerce—that sees, with a microscopic eye, but a part of the great machine of the economy of life, and thinks that small part which he sees to be the whole. Commerce is the means, not the end of happiness or pleasure; the end is a rational enjoyment by means of arts, sciences," &c. This view of the controversy was espoused by the people; the experimental exhibition of 1760 was repeated, and since that time exhibitions have gone on increasing in number and value, till, in our own day, they have become necessary to the animation of social order at home, and the tasteful supremacy of our manufactures abroad. The church no longer finds it convenient to dismiss the arts in the flippant language of a miserable lampoon, but adopts them as her able ministers. The Government, strong in its conservative instincts, "slow of heart to believe," and still more sluggish to conceive—to bring vague wants to be "debated" into niggard grants, but, casting aside its peasant prejudices, boldly heads the movement, and with a liberal spirit guides its resuscitated energies for the education of the people, the improvement of our industrial products, the commemoration record of our acts and heroes, and the general aggrandisement of the state. It has given us a National Gallery, the state collections of Windsor and Hampton Court, for the study of painting; a school of ornamental design for males and females (!) at Somerset-house, for architectural and manufacturer's decoration; the Tower and Greenwich Hospital, for national history; and the British Museum, for classic antiquity. Wise, also, in its generosity, these noble schools of study, have, with one exception, been opened to all the world without fee; admission is, as it should be, FREE. The people have not been slow in taking advantage of these privileges. The official returns of visitors to Hampton Court show that the numbers during the four years since the public have been admitted freely to that palace have increased above fifty per cent. In the month of July last year above 50,000 persons passed through the state apartments; and on Sunday, the 17th of July, 4,660 persons, being the greatest number on any one day, except Whit-Monday. The total numbers for the last year nearly reached 180,000. At the National Gallery upwards of 30,000, and at the British Museum more than 50,000 have been known on holiday occasions to pass through the rooms in one day. The importance of these artistic recreations cannot be too nighly estimated: they are the antagonists of drunkenness and sedition; they create healthy tastes in the minds of the poor; they have made the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, which the sagacious TIMES acknowledges to be "a sign of the times," a necessary adjunct to the family firesides of Great Britain and her dependencies.

But the question returns—what are the direct objects sought to be obtained by a public exhibition of fine art? What are the ends at which these Jobnsonian "trifles" aim? We answer—their object is to make us acquainted with the experience and modes of working used by the artists of all ages; to raise the standard of our tastes by a contemplation of their excellences, and to direct us in our studies of that "great nature" from which they drew all their forms, and from which we also must derive our own. Their advantages are found in the facilities they afford for a comparison of styles, and the materials they furnish for historic composition. By a continual contemplation, also, of great works, a sense of the higher excellences of art will by degrees be brought to dawn on the imagination; at every review that sense will become more and more assured, until the student comes to enjoy a sober certainty of the real existence of those almost ideal beauties; and he will then find no difficulty in fixing in his mind the principles by which the impression is produced; which he will feel and practise, though they are perhaps too delicate and refined, and too peculiar to the imitative art, to be conveyed to the mind by any other means. The pleasures afforded by the contemplation of objects of art are of the most elevated and lasting kind. The communion of ideal beauty is a high and holy thing—it is the intercourse with the mind holds with that absolute truth and beauty which the Creator has given only in portions—in separate degrees and features—to his individual works, but which may be collected from the several members of the family to which those partially endowed individuals belong, and embodied in one glorious creation of the imagination. The Venus and Apollo represent—not the portrait of any one man or woman—but the combined beauties of the human race. So that, upon the whole, the intention of all the arts is to supply the natural imperfection of things, and to gratify the mind by realizing what never existed but in the imagination. It is thence their dignified pleasures have acquired the appellation of "DIVINE."

In the British Museum an exhibition has this week been thrown open to the public of a collection of marbles made in Asia Minor by the celebrated classic traveller Charles Fellows, and presented to this country at the expense of the Government. We present a selection of them to our readers. They are called popularly the "Xanthian Marbles;" but this is not quite correct, as they come from various places besides the ancient capital of Lycia.

The country in which Mr. Fellowes has pursued his chief investigations is that portion of Asia Minor which lies between lat. 42 and 36 degrees and long. 26 and 32 degrees, including Lydia, Mysia, Bithynia, Phrygia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria.

The most interesting period of the history of this country was the time of its occupation by the Greeks, and the remains of their cities form now the chief attraction to the traveller. These cities, some of them of very remote antiquity, all had their origin prior to the conquest of the country by the Romans in the third century before the Christian era, after which time that people were nominally the possessors of the country, and the Roman taste was visibly encroaching on the Greek in works of art. The examples we have engraved exhibit the peculiarities of their styles.

The tract of country under consideration is covered with the ruins of ancient cities. It is, like Israel, "a land of hills and valleys," every mountain has its temple, every rocky platform its acropolis; the sides of the hills are tunnelled with chambers for the dead; the valleys and plains are strewn with ruined walls, blocks covered with inscriptions, prostrate arches, pedestals, and altars. Vaults and tombs, swarming with bats, lizards, and "doleful creatures," abound with a profusion which bears sad evidence of the countless character of that population to which Paul "held forth his hands" in vain.

In Lycia these tombs are objects of paramount interest. The rocks for miles round in many places are strewn with, in many frequently, some hundreds are in a comparatively perfect state, standing apparently unopened; but the greater number have been pillaged during the two thousand years which have elapsed since their construction. They have mostly Greek inscriptions. Many of them are monoliths, cut in the solid stone and of one piece with the rock on which they stand. Others are excavated in the face of cliffs; their entrance-ways very much resembling the mullioned windows of the Elizabethan age. They are curiously embellished, some with architectural decorations, others with epic bas-reliefs and sculptures.

Xanthus, whose costly ruins have become an object of solicitude to the artists of this country, is now little more than a vast mound of débris, piled on the banks of a river bearing the same name. Its remains appear to be all of the same date, and that a very early one. The walls of many of them are Cyclopean. The language of the innumerable and perfect inscriptions is like the Phœnician or Etruscan, and the beautiful tombs in the rocks are also of a very early date. The elegance of design and chasteness of decoration which characterize these precious works at once evince the talent of the Greeks; and the highly poetical subjects of their bas-reliefs, some of their figures blending many forms in one, probably to describe its attributes, are also of Greek character. The ruins consist of temples, tombs, triumphal arches, and a theatre; but the tombs are, from their novelty and beauty, those which claim the first attention. They are built of the purest white marble, and having been finely worked the polish has greatly assisted their preservation; but in many places Time has lent them the lightest of his stains—a blush of ruddy colour, or a tinge of faint yellow, being effused on their sides, while their roofs have been roughened and tinted with a mantle of clear gray. They are of all dimensions, from five to thirty feet in height, oblong in their proportions, having one, two, or more stories, with, in some cases, a pointed, somewhat Gothic, roof, bearing on the top or ridge-ridge, a narrow upright crest called the "hog's mane." The roof, ends, and sides are more or less decorated with sculpture. The bas-reliefs of one of the largest of the tombs of Xanthus are now in the Museum; they stand in the saloon between the Egyptian and Elgin Galleries, and are placed on a frame of the height, and holding the relative bearings of the original. Our engraved perspective view, and the separate detailed views of the bas-reliefs on the sides, will make the whole intelligible. The north side is divided into three compartments; in the centre one, a monarch dressed in the double tunic and mantle, bearing the paternal staff—the sceptre of antiquity—is seen, presenting a helmet to a fully accoutred warrior; in the end compartments appear the harpy-like figures, so common in Egyptian sculptures: they are in ascending positions, and bear in their hands and claws dead human figures, significant, we conjecture, of the entrance of the soul on a happy immortality. The south side is also disposed in triple tablets. In these the same harpy-like figures occur. In the centre a royal personage is seen, receiving the offerings of a female figure, who presents him with pomegranates and a pigeon. On the east side a venerable king, seated on a throne of state, listens to the address of a child, who presents him with a cock. Behind the chair stand the officers of state, and at the back of the child a man in the act, apparently, of seconding the representations of the supplicant. The western side exhibits two queen-like female figures, seated on thrones, in attitudes of reserved and formal state; between them three beardy dressed females, their long hair bound by a tiara, plaited and dishevelled. In front of the former figures a cow sucking a calf appears. The design of these groups, as there is no inscription on the tomb, is not known, but their general meaning is obvious. May they not be conjectured to represent the character of the deceased? Do we not see him in the northern sculpture, invested by the king—perhaps his father—with military command? And of the rest, may we not suppose that the southern tablet exhibits his wife, sacrificing, in his absence, an offering to propitiate the favour of the gods, and secure his peace; that in the eastern we see his martial boy, praying that courage, typified by the cock, may be given him on the day of battle; and in the western, that we see his family—his daughters, his wife, his mother, mourning him dead?

The character of these sculptures, although elevated, bears strongly the marks both of Egyptian and Assyrian art. The carving, in the harpies, and the lilies which many of the figures are smelling, are of the former; and the tie of the hair and folding of many of the draperies, the latter.

The other subjects engraved in our "exhibition" are the remains of two Amazonian figures, and the trunk of a male figure. The prevailing character of these fragments is Roman, of the best period. They have, however, a character of their own, of striking originality. In all those places on which the sculptor desired the light should fall roadily, the draperies have been expressed by lightly incised lines, while beyond the contour of the body, or where the action of a limb was required to be strongly marked, the folds are disposed with a simplicity, and cut to a depth, which we have never seen equalled. The sculptor of the pediment for our new Royal Exchange, as well as all artists engaged on similar works, would do wisely to consider, and in our opinion to imitate, these peculiarities.

It will be gathered from these remarks, we set a high value on the national exhibitions of the metropolis; to all of them, and to the British Museum especially, we shall give our frequent attention. Our next notice will be accompanied by a view of the old Montague-house buildings, now about to be removed for others of a more imposing style. S. S.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The trials of Feargus O'Connor and the other Chartists, upon the indictments against them, which were removed by certiorari from the late Special Commission, will be tried at Lancaster, and not at Liverpool. Mr. Spearman, the secretary to Earl Jersey, Master of the Horse, has, it appears, levanted, leaving the monetary affairs of that department in a sad state of confusion. He was a barrister of three years' standing, and had a salary of £700 per annum with the usual et ceteras.——The practice of multiplying witnesses in cases where the police are the prosecutors, for the sake of the expenses, has long been a subject of well-founded complaint, and we are glad to see that the Marylebone vestry have adopted a strong expostulation to the magistrates on the subject, which, if not attended to, will likely be carried to a higher tribunal.——The Royal Humane Society held their sixty-ninth anniversary at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, on Wednesday last, when Lord John Russell took the chair, and a liberal collection was made in aid of the funds. As the exertions of this institution are mainly directed to the resuscitation of persons immersed whilst skating on the Serpentine, thereby holding out an inducement to foolish persons to risk their lives, we are not without hopes that the Glacierium or artificial ice will in future supersede this popular pleas, and the winter amusement of the society will be able to extend more or their bounty towards unselfish and unpremeditated acts of humanity.——The second annual meeting of the Provident Clerks' Association was held at the London Tavern on Monday last, when J. A. Smith, Esq., M.P., took the chair. The yearly report gave a promising account of the progress of the society.——A retired butler, named Suddon, 70 years of age, who resided in Poland-street, threw himself from a second-floor window on Friday week under the delusion that he was chased by the police, and sustained such injuries that he died a few hours afterwards.——The twenty-fifth anniversary of the accession of the King of Sweden to the throne of that country was celebrated at the Swedish Church, Prince's-square, on Sunday last, when a sermon appropriate to the occasion was preached by the Rev. Mr. Carlson.——Colonel St. Quintin, of the 17th, in a letter to an evening contemporary, indignantly denies that the officers of that regiment were guilty, as had been stated, of a barbarous and cruel outrage on a female, and that there were no grounds whatever for the report.——The expense by the overland route to India is generally estimated at £134; viz., £4 from London to Paris, £10 from Paris to Marseilles, £22 from Marseilles to Alexandria, and £12 from Alexandria to Suez, whence the fare in the steamers to Bombay is £86.——The Rev. R. Montgomery preached an evening sermon at the church of St. Clement's Danes on Tuesday last, on behalf of the Hospital for Consumption, when a liberal collection was made in aid of the funds of this admirable charity.——On Wednesday last a poor fellow, named John Losser, who was employed in discharging the cargo of the Orwell steamer at Nicholson's wharf, slipped off the plank and was drowned.——A respectable-looking man named Steverton was committed from Guildhall on Wednesday to take his trial for conspiring with John Sydserff, a prisoner in the Queen's Bench, to defraud Mr. Hickenbotom, pawnbroker, Hackney-road, of a quantity of white lead, of the value of £270.——The Germanic Diet is about to enter on the question of the press in Germany. The conferences are to commence immediately after the arrival of Count Munch-Bellinghausen, the president. ——Mr. Bridger, the builder of Penchurch-street, and a Churchwarden of the parish of St. Catherine Cree (of which Church we gave an engraving two weeks since), was on Sunday evening last, thrown from his chaise, on his return from Loughton to town, and killed on the spot. During the period of his being in office it was found necessary to re-cast the church-bell, which was done, his name being placed upon it, as is customary, and the first time it has been tolled since then was upon the melancholy occasion of his funeral.——The houses and wharfs on the Vauxhall bank of the Thames were completely inundated last week, in consequence of the high flood and great northerly wind. The damage done to property was very great, but fortunately no lives were lost.——A meeting of the Yorkshire District Bank was held last week at Leeds, and numerously attended. The report of the directors expressed regret that they could not make so favourable a statement of the profits as they could have wished, but that, nevertheless, they were satisfied with it, inasmuch as it was the produce of the good working business of the bank.—— A sudden stop has been put to the further progress of the Artesian well forming at the head of the Chain Pier, Brighton. At the depth of 36 feet below the surface a stratum of rock was encountered which defied all the efforts of the workmen to bore through it.——Mr. George Poulett Scrope, M.P., has recently erected a monument to the memory of his brother, Lord Sydenham, the late Governor-General of Canada, in Castle Coombe Church Wilts.——A meeting of the Governors and friends of the Clergy Orphan Corporation, was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Saturday, when his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, who takes a strong interest in the welfare of the institution, took the chair. The report of the past year's proceedings was highly satisfactory.——Specie to a very large amount is now exporting from Liverpool to the United States.——On Monday information was received at the head police station, Great Scotland-yard, that John Thompson, a clerk in the service of Mr. Dimmley, of No. 11, Mark-lane, City, had absconded, taking with him upwards of £600 which he had received on account of his employer.——The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have it in contemplation to effect considerable improvement in Windsor Great Park. Already an ornamental palisading has been commenced in lieu of the iron fence which divided the park from the long walk.

A new patent omnibus of most ingenious construction has just been launched by Mr. Weyburton, of the New-road. The vehicle is of the usual length, and has a coupé, over which the driver has his seat. Immediately behind the coupé is a sort of railway carriage, with room for four persons, and fitted up in such a manner that it is the peculiar pleasure of those seated in it, be made into four isolated compartments, each having its window on the side of the carriage. The hinder part is precisely the same as the common omnibus. The fare in the carriage portion is 8d., and in the coupé and the hinder part 6d.——A young woman, named Sarah Ann Anning, was charged at the Thames police-office with stealing a gown valued at £2. The case excited some interest from the fact that a policeman had compounded a felony, who is at present unable from illness to appear. The prisoner, in the meantime, was allowed to enter into bail.——William Joliffe Cooke, a gentleman in independent circumstances, was finally examined at Worship-street, on a charge of having intermarried with Amelia Hockins, he having two former wives living at the time. The prisoner was discharged on the ground that the marriage having been performed in a private house, by a Protestant clergyman, without license or bans, it was not valid.

—On Sunday evening last as the Rev. C. Rawlins, Wesleyan minister of Shrewsbury, was drawing near the conclusion of his sermon he suddenly stopped, looked very fierce around him, and vehemently exclaimed, "Now those who have made up their minds to go to hear and sing," when three-fourths of the congregation stood up, and the other part had considerable difficulty to refrain from laughing at this disgusting freak.——The official return of the exports of bullion from the port of London during the week ending Thursday last is as follows:—Silver coin to Hamburg, 6000 ounces; to Rotterdam, 6000; to Bombay, 1,512; silver in bars to Bombay, 10,601; gold coin to New York, 1250; to Ceylon, 663.——In consequence of the scarcity of naval officers applying for the coast-guard stations the Treasury and Admiralty have made arrangements so that the most deserving chief boatmen may be placed as chief officers with increase of pay.——At a meeting of the Primitive Methodists of St. Ives, a few days back, one of the members, on narrating his religious experience, expressed his grief at his continual backslidings, and compared himself to a sprat on a gridiron, constantly liable to slip between the grips into the flames below.——We have to state that recent accounts from Yorkshire give a frightful description of the diabolical incendiarism nightly perpetrated in that district, by which an immense amount of property has been given to the flames. ——A watchman, employed on the premises of Messrs. Miller and Ravenhill, engineers, Poplar, was found dead on the floor of the porter's lodge, with the lamp alight in his hand. It is considered that the death was attributable to natural causes.

IRELAND.

The writ for the College election has been received by the Provost, and yesterday was the day appointed for holding the election. As it was understood that Mr. George Alexander Hamilton would walk over the course, there was but little interest excited on the subject.

Extract of a letter from Galway:—"A large barque, the George, of Belfast, with cotton, from New Orleans for Liverpool, is on shore at Lettermullen, about 30 miles to the westward of this town. She is going to pieces. The cargo was worth £30,000."

Discontent at the operation of the Poor-law system appears to pervade the country from one end to the other. In Tipperary, Tyrone, Fermanagh, Dublin, Mayo, Limerick, Clare, Cork, and elsewhere, meetings either have been, or are about to be held, with the view to the amendment of the law. The nobility and landed gentry are crying out for some modification in the system as well as the peasantry. Some of the workhouses are about to be shut for want of funds, and the guardians are unwilling to lay on a rate for the payment of the large debts contracted by the commissioners. The ratepayers complain of the unequal pressure of the poor-rate, and in some districts a collector has not attempt to levy it, while all are unanimous in the feeling that the commissioners, sub-commissioners, and other officials, are paid extravagantly, without any material benefit being conferred by the law on the poor.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the whole of the court, attended divine service in the private chapel within the castle. The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell officiated. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards walked out in the royal pleasure-grounds, attended by the whole of their suite. The Right Hon. Sir R. Peel and Viscount and Viscountess Villiers arrived at the castle yesterday afternoon, on a visit to her Majesty.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their accustomed walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards went on a rabbit-shooting excursion in the neighbourhood of Swinley, and had excellent sport. Lord Grenville Somerset and Sir Henry Wheatley arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty. Viscount and Viscountess Villiers took their departure, as did also Sir Robert Peel. Lady Peel, who was invited to the castle with the right hon. baronet, did not arrive, although she was expected. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent did not take her usual airing, in consequence of a slight indisposition. Her Royal Highness consequently did not dine at the castle this evening. The royal dinner-party included the following personages (covers were laid for 14): The Countess of Charlemont, the Hon. Misses Stanley and Hamilton, Lady Fanny Howard, the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord Grenville Somerset, Col. Arbuthnot, Col. Wylde, Sir Frederick Stovin, Sir Henry Wheatley, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius. The band of the Grenadier Guards was in attendance.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert took their usual walking exercise. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards took equestrian exercise in the ride-school, attended by Colonel Wylde. The royal dinner-party included the following personages:—The Countess of Charlemont, the Hon. Misses Stanley and Hamilton, the Earl of Hardwicke, Major-General and Lady Isabella Wemyss, Miss Garney, Sir F. Stovin, Colonel Wylde, Colonel Arbuthnot, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.

WEDNESDAY.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, after accompanying her Majesty in her usual morning perambulations, took equestrian exercise in the riding-school, attended by Colonel Wylde. His Royal Highness Prince Albert visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Frogmore, in the afternoon. The royal dinner-party included the following personages (covers were laid for fifteen):—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Countess of Charlemont, the Hon. Misses Stanley and Hamilton, Lady Fanny Howard, the Earl of Hardwicke, Sir Frederick Stovin, Colonel Wylde, Colonel Arbuthnot, Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and Dr. Pretorius.

We understand that early in the approaching season it is the intention of his Royal Highness the Duke De Montpensier, son of the King of the French, to visit this country, when the royal duke will stay about three weeks in this metropolis.

The Earl of Aberdeen has completely recovered from his indisposition. The noble earl was enabled to attend to business on Friday. The whole of the diplomatic corps resident in this capital made visits at Argyll House.

THE THEATRES.

ITALIAN OPERA.

Musical bigotry, we regret to observe, finds too many proselytes in this country. The true musicaan or genuine amateur ought not to tie himself down to any particular school; he should be a cosmopolite. We would despise the ear that was insensible to the mountain melody, and could only be accessible to the scientific combination. Painting has various schools and styles, and music likewise. Are we not to gaze on a Claude because we are fascinated by a Rubens or a Rembrandt? And why should we pledge our faith unreservedly to Bach or Beethoven, Mozart or Meyerbeer, Rossini or Bellini? Chacun à son affaire, and commend us to music when we are pleased we know not why, nor care not wherefore. In England we have the opportunity of hearing all masters. There are the Ancient Concerts, the Philharmonic, the madrigal societies, the great musical festivals, the Exeter-hall performances, the English operas, the illustrations of national music of Scotland, Ireland, and the Purcell commemoration for the old English school—and, finally, there is the Italian Opera. Now bigots may pick and choose, if they please, out of all these varied sources. Quant à nous, we vote for her Majesty's Theatre and her Majesty's taste. We propose to confine our fine enthusiasm for the present to the Italians, the children of melody and passion. The note of preparation has been sounded, and the musical herald of the day, who wields the destinies of the Italian Opera-house, has returned from his continental mission. Lumley has scoured southern climes to pounce upon the richest available talent, and within a month the gloom and silence pervading her Majesty's Theatre will be replaced by the brilliantly-lighted salon, the finely-combined orchestra, and the rarest collection of the human voice divine that Italia can contribute. Ha! ha! all hail! say we to the illustrations we already know, and to those who are promised too. Right welcome thou great and stupendous artist, Lablache, with thy voice—the lowest depths deeper still and thy artistical skill and power. Lablache will again appal us by his overwhelming tragic force, and enliven us by his inimitable buffo qualities. Are we to have Rubini? Diplomatic Lumley respond. We heard of you in Trieste, in Venice, in Milan, in Naples, in Turin; but have you been to Berlin, or is there any secret emissary on the way to St. Petersburgh, to snatch from Russia's snows our Rubini. Is he destined to warble his sweetness on the desert bears of the north, or is he to come again to soothe the roaring lion? But Lumley gives no reply, but points to his programme. Well, Mario! He has a nice voice, certes; and then Conti, a tenor of Peninsular fame—a Donzelli redivivus—will be here. These must console us. And your new barytone, Formassari, what is he to do? He has the reputation of being a fine actor. And so Brambilla, the contralto, is to be restored to us. Excellent! She is one of the cleverest actresses we have ever seen. Her Sanguard Boy in "Linda," her Orsino in "Lucrezia Borgia," and her Pippo, are all perfect performances. There is so much soul about her, and her own story is so touching. Brambilla had attained European fame, and in its zenith she captivated an Italian nobleman. Against the consent of his family, he was resolved to wed the cantatrice. The day of the union was fixed, and the wedding party was even assembled, when the bridegroom was seized and carried off by a band of men in masks. To this day he has never been heard of, and is supposed to have been placed in a convent or lunatic asylum. Poor Brambilla was forced to renew her vocal career, and it was in Vienna that she created such a prodigious sensation in "Linda," written for that capital by Donizetti, transferred to the Italian boards in Paris, and in due course will be represented here, with Persiani, the great vocalist of the day, as the heroine. Whilst one set of admirers will revel in Persiani's marvellous method, the amateurs of strong passion and excitement will have the superb Grisi to startle them from their propriety. The Druidical priestess—the Norma—with her storm of jealous love, may be contrasted with the Grisi of the Gazza ladra, in the one, we shall have the outbreak of a voice unequalled for its roundness, power, and even wire-drawn sweetness; and in the other, we shall have the most astounding execution that the organ can possibly develope. Your band will be directed by Costa, one of the most despotic of conductors, and yet the most highly respected of men—such is the natural influence of real talent and genuine worth. He has drilled his instrumentalists into an ensemble that finds no equal in Europe.

We are not precisely acquainted with the state of the negotiations as to the danseuses who will appear during the season under Perrot's management; but we believe we may calculate on the triumvirate—Taglioni, Fanny Elssler, and Cerito. Nay, it is whispered that the three, or two of them, will be seen flitting together; but this we take to be impossible. If the entrepreneur gives them individually, c'est déjà beaucoup. Guy Stephan and that exquisitely beautiful Adèle Dumilatre are, however, to bound their hour on our boards. Tant mieux: Lumley has a true genius for the omnibus rebus; and we feel assured that the ballet will be well pitched, and, odd as it may seem, fore-stalled au combie. But to be grave, as one ought to be on such an event as the opening of the Italian Opera, where royalty, rank, and fashion most do congregate, we are panting for the hour when the curtain will be commenced—when the continental celebrities will be congregated. Charge! Costa! charge! On! Lumley! on! Our artists are all anxious for the illustrations; and if the director does not cut us, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS proposes to cut the opera; and with this cutting remark we take our farewell for the present.

COVENT GARDEN.

On Wednesday evening an adaptation of Auber's ballet, "Le Dieu et la Bayadère," as a hybrid opera, was produced at this theatre, and we regret to say, for the management's sake, with very questionable success. The production of anything verging upon the very name of opera on the same boards where, on alternate nights, we have such delicious singing, was in itself dangerous; but when music, expressly and eloquently written to describe pantomimic or ballet action, is pressed into the service of inappropriate words, of being vocalised against its will, and then served up as an opera, or even operatic piece, it is ridiculous, and not to be endured for a moment. Why not have produced the ballet at once? It is evident that the piece has been got up for the introduction of Madame le Comte, who is a graceful dancer, and excellent pantomimist; but why risk her undoubted abilities in a thing which, but for her, would have instantly failed, and which, with all her exertions, must soon be withdrawn, it is to be hoped to make room for something more worthy of her decided merits? An 'vente, the less that is said the better until M. le Comte learns to pronounce English, he will not have a chance of being attended to, whatever may be his talent otherwise. Mrs. Alfred Shaw continues to delight in the meagre part of Malcolm; and Miss Rainforth goes on with such a rate of improvement, that we shall shortly be at the pleasant loss of finding her superior.

LITERATURE.

LIFE IN MEXICO, DURING A RESIDENCE OF TWO YEARS IN THAT COUNTRY. By Madame C — de la B —. In two parts. Chapman and Hall.

Mexico has long been, in many respects, a terra incognita, and a good account of it has been anxiously desired by all persons possessed even of only a moderate share of curiosity. In Humboldt's "Geography of New Spain" ample details of its physical construction, topography, and productions are to be found, but its political condition, the aspect of its social relations, with the state of manners, morals, and civilization, have hitherto been very imperfectly known. This especially applies to the period which has elapsed since the Mexicans threw off the yoke of Spain. The revolution made many changes of which the progress and effects remained almost entirely concealed from us. A more interesting field for observation, or one less trodden by the explorer, could not be pointed out. Ward's "Travels in Mexico," and one or two other books of the same kind, are meagre and unsatisfactory in their information, whetting without gratifying curiosity.

The authoress of the work whose title we have given above is Madame Calderon de la Barca, wife of Don Angel Calderon, a Spanish gentleman, bearing the name, and we believe descended from the great dramatic poet of Spain, several years ambassador of her Catholic Majesty at Washington, and afterwards, in 1839, appointed the first minister to Mexico, since the recognition of her independence by the mother country. It consists of a series of letters written to members of her own family, in which she relates the results of her travelled observation and experience. Mr. Prescott, the well-known author of "Ferdinand and Isabella," prefixes a preface, in which he states that they are made public at his own recommendation, and that they were really not intended originally, however incredible the assertion, for publication; although the fair ambassadress, as usual, has graciously acceded to the "request of friends."

An ambassadress, it may be supposed, enjoys ample opportunities of studying the character and composition of society. Nor need her range of observation be confined to the very highest sphere; public places, the church, the theatre, the promenade, the market-place, afford sufficient insight into the manners and pursuits of the less elevated classes. The great attraction of the book accordingly lies in its pictures of society. Female writers generally excel in the tact and discernment required to catch the light sketchy style adapted to paint the manners as they fly. These qualities Madame Calderon possesses in as high a degree as any of our modern authoresses, and her book is perhaps more amusing than any of theirs, not only from the advantages of the subject, but from the graceful and unaffected liveliness which marks her style. There is perhaps occasionally too much striving to be pointed and epigrammatic, but this is of little moment. The style is more natural and various, with less of fine writing and sentimentalism than in the "Letters from the Baltic;" every subject which she treats she views with gay, but delicate and feminine humour. Speculation has been rife as to whether she is English or American; she appears evidently, however, from several passages in the book, to be of Scottish extraction.

Madame Calderon and her husband sailed from New York to Havannah in October, 1839, and, after a stay of ten days, proceeded to Vera Cruz. Her sketches of the life of the Havannenese, their luxury and festivities, afford us a tempting glance at the capital of Cuba, "the most precious pearl in the crown of Spain." After a sea-voyage, of which the languor, the monotony, and misery are well described, the sandy coast of Mexico greets the eyes of the passengers. Take the following view of VERA CRUZ.

Anything more melancholy, désolé, and forlorn, than the whole appearance of things as we drew near, cannot well be imagined. On one side, the fort, with its black and red walls; on the other, the miserable black-looking huts, with here and there a large black bird, called zopilote, hovering over some dead carcass, or lying heavily along in search of carrion. Still, at the end of our voyage, even its dreary aspect was welcome; and the very hills of red sand on which it is surrounded, and which look like the deserts of Arabia, appear inviting.

To me nothing can exceed the sadness of aspect of the city and of its environs—mountains of moving sand, formed by the violence of the north winds, and which, by the reflection of the sun's rays, must greatly increase the unbearableness of the temperature. The scene may resemble the ruins of Jerusalem, though without its sublimity. The houses are all blackened by fire; there is not a carriage in the streets—nothing but the men with the white trousers slit up the side of the leg, immense hats, and blankets, or sarapes, merely a closed blanket, more or less fine, with a hole for the head in the centre, for the wearer to put it over his head, and the short cotton skirts of the women, with their straw slippers, and their long coarse black hair. Add to this, the zopilotes cleaning the streets—disgusting but useful scavengers. These valuable birds have black feathers, with grey heads, beaks, and feet. They are only in the towns, and never in the trees. They are not republican, nor do they appear inclined to declare their independence, having kings, to whom it is said they pass on their first visit of one of the royal family, at the same time with a plebeian zopilote, in sight of a dead body, the latter humbly waits till the sovereign has devoured his share, before he ventures to approach.

GENERAL SANTA ANNA.

In a little while entered General Santa Anna himself; a gentlemanly, good looking, quietly-dressed, rather melancholy-looking person, with one leg, apparently somewhat of an invalid, and to us the most interesting person in the group. He has a sallow complexion, fine dark eyes, soft and penetrating, and an interesting expression of face. Knowing nothing of his past history, one would have said he was a philosopher living in dignified retirement, one who had tried the world and found that all was vanity, one who had suffered ingratitude, and who, if he were ever persuaded to emerge from his retreat, would only do so, Cincinnatus-like, to benefit his country. It is strange how frequently this expression of philosophic resignation, of placid sadness, is to be remarked on the countenances of the deepest, most ambitious, and most designing men.

MEXICAN MANNERS.

In the evening here, all assemble in a large hall; the Senhora de — playing the piano; while the whole party, agents, dependentes, major-domo, coachmen, matadors, picadors, and women-servants, assemble, and perform the dances of the country jarabes aforados, enanas, palanos, sapateos, &c. &c. It must not be supposed that in this apparent mingling of ranks between masters and servants there is the slightest want of respect on the part of the latter: on the contrary, they seem to exert themselves, as in duty bound, for the amusement of their master and his guests. There is nothing Republican in it—no feeling of equality: as far as I have seen, that feeling does not exist here except between people of the same rank. It is more like some remains of the feudal system, where the retainers eat at the same table with their chief, but below the salt. The dances are monotonous, with small steps, and a great deal of shuffling; but the music is rather pretty, and some of the dancers were very graceful and agile; and if it were not invidious to make distinctions, we might particularize Bernardo the matador, the head coachman, and a handsome peasant-girl, with a short scarlet and yellow petticoat, and a foot and ancle à la Vestris. They were all very quiet, but seemed in a state of intense enjoyment; and some of the men accompanied the dancers on the guitar.

The perusal of the work has given us so much pleasure, and it is so superior to the catch-penny tours of the day, that we shall return to it again; especially as, from our not having received the second part in time, our extracts have been all taken from the first. We should not omit to state that the book forms one of a series in the Foreign Library of Messrs. Chapman and Hall, which is to consist apparently of original, as well as translated works.

THE HAND-BOOK OF SILK, COTTON, AND WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES. By W. C. Taylor, L.L.D. of Trinity College Dublin. Bentley and Co.

This very useful volume has for its object to furnish a succinct and plain history of the rise and progress of the manufacture of the principal textile fabrics. The author traces them from the earliest period, and after such information as to the state of these arts among the ancients in Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and Rome, he hastens to relate their introduction, progress, and diffusion in Britain. The book is full of information in regard to all the branches of this universally interesting subject. The steps by which these manufactures arose to their present state of perfection, the curious and wonderful processes by which labour is abridged, and produce indefinitely augmented, are fully and clearly explained, with many particulars relative to the history of the various discoveries and the career of the discoverers. Dr. Taylor has attacked and refuted with success several popular fallacies as to the effects of machinery. It is a vulgar error to suppose that the employment of machinery diminishes the field for the employment of human beings, or that it operates for the reduction of wages. Dr. Taylor says:—

The history of the cotton manufacture in England is without a parallel in the annals of any age or country. In the beginning of the reign of George III. it gave employment to forty thousand persons, and the value of its goods produced was £600,000; it now employs not less than fifteen hundred thousand persons, and the value of the goods produced exceeds thirty-one millions. It is difficult to form a conception of the extent of such a manufacture; but the following calculations may help our readers to an intelligible idea of its vastness. The cotton yarn annually spun in England would, in a single thread, girdle the globe 203,775 times; it would reach 51 times from the earth to the sun; and it would encircle the earth's orbit eight times and a half. The wrought fabrics of cotton exported in one year would girdle the equatorial circumference of the globe eleven times. The cotton manufacture furnishes one half of British exports, employs one eleventh of our population, and supplies almost every nation in the world with some part of its clothing. The receipts of the merchants and manufacturers from this single branch of industry equal two thirds of the public revenue of the kingdom.

The folly of the opposition to machinery was never so forcibly displayed as in the history of the cotton trade: at this moment, when machines have been invented which enable one man to produce as much yarn as three hundred men could have produced at the accession of George III.—which enable one man and one boy to print as many goods as a hundred men and a hundred boys could have produced then—when steam-engines perform the work of 33,000 horses, and water-mills of 11,000 horses—so far is manual labour from being superseded that the number of operatives has increased from forty thousand to one million and a half. Nor has this increase been accompanied by diminution of comfort to the families of the operatives; the amount paid in wages among the whole of the old operatives (40,000 in number) was but £220,000—that is, little more than 2s. a-week each. Let the state of things be compared with the following estimate of the annual expenditure for cotton manufacture, which was made in the year 1838:—

Consumption of Cotton in	..	..	1838 £19,094,166
Wages paid
Operatives in spinning factories	..	..	8,659,593
Power-loom weavers	..	..	3,945,060
In bobbinet and hosiery trade	..	..	1,650,000
Printers	..	..	9,360,000
Hand loom weavers, 280,000, 12s. gross	..	..	8,596,000
Repairing machinery, 8 years taken at the rate of increased capital			4,312,500
Interest on increased capital, £2,250,000			3,100,000
Add for all other charges, viz. 20s. flour, clerks, counting-house, &c. &c., say 9000 capitalists or masters, at wages, chief workmen, say £75 per annum, yearly			675,000
			12,087,560
Yearly expenditure			£42,893,259

There is too much uncertainty in the data which we possess to hazard a conjecture respecting the number of operatives between whom these eight millions and a half of wages were divided; but in 1835 we calculated, from documents no longer in our possession, that the number of operatives had been increased thirty-seven fold since the commencement of the reign of George III., and the rate of wages paid to each individual workman more than quadrupled.

The author thus sums up the argument on this interesting question:—

The operations described in the preceding chapter are conducted in factories or mills, which may be defined "buildings in which machines of great power are at work to facilitate and abridge human labour." The first great error vulgarly committed respecting factories, is the supposition that the employment of physical labour is in any way identical with diminution of employment: wherever there is any use made of mechanical contrivance, a necessity is created for mental superintendence—a demand is produced for intelligence more than for physical strength, and, consequently, employment is varied, but not diminished. It is an undeniable fact, that the number of persons employed in the cotton manufacture has been increased in the proportion that machinery has been improved, and that the general rate of wages, on an average of years, has increased, while the cost of production has been diminished.

A question often asked by the ignorant and unthinking deserves some portion of our consideration. They ask whether the demand for labour would not be greatly increased if the operations of machinery were suspended and hand-labour employed to produce the present amount of fabrics. The plain answer is, that in such a case nothing like the same amount of fabrics would be produced in England, for their price would not remunerate the manufacturer, even though he should pay his workmen the lowest possible rate of wages. The English hand-spinners of cotton could never compete with the Hindoos in the production of fine yarn; with the Egyptian fellahs in the manufacture of coarse threads; with the African negroes in common products of the loom; or with the Indians of North America in cheap articles of dress. English artisans would starve on the same rate of wages which would support life in a country less heavily taxed, and no higher rate of wages could they obtain so long as there existed one foreign competitor to meet them in the market. It is a great but neglected truth, that machinery sustains wages; for it is by means of machinery that so large an amount of spun and woven fabrics is produced; it is in consequence of the magnitude of this amount that the British manufacturer can hold so cheap, and it is in consequence of their superior cheapness that these articles find purchasers. The sad example of the hand-loom weavers, to which we have already referred, shows the utter inability of British artisans to sustain competition with the foreigners when they are not backed by the support of machinery.

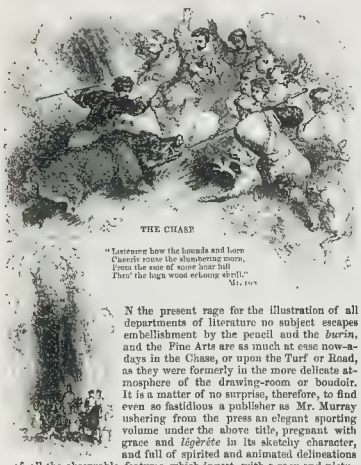
THE MAGAZINES.

"Blackwood" contains some powerful articles. The review of Arnold's "Lectures on History" will afford pleasure to all who love to expatiate in the great field of historical speculation. In the article on "Reynolds' Discourses" Sir Joshua's theory of art is minutely examined, and a series of elevating and instructive views on the fine arts unfolded. The continuation of "Caleb Stukely" does not flag. The present number of the series of the "World of London" is vigorous and acute, but in parts too much written for effect. Landor's "Imaginary Conversation between Oliver Cromwell and his Uncle Sir Oliver" is by no means equal to what we should have expected from him on such a theme.

"Frazer" is amusing and varied in contents as usual. The first article "The Pleasures, Objects, and Advantages of Literature indicated," is a pleasant and gossiping paper of literary chit-chat, containing many hints useful to the student of literature. It may be doubted whether the examples herein quoted of the course of study and living adopted by several celebrated men will be of so much practical utility, although the information is interesting in itself. "Reminiscences of Men and Things" contains the writer's recollections of Guizot and David, two of the most celebrated Frenchmen of their day. The feeling with which it is written is good, "Jack Moriarty and his Contemporaries" gives sketches of the fun-loving and riotous life of the Dublin students as it existed in all its glory. "Fashion and Famine" "The Magical Monmouth" contains some curious anecdotes of the doings of the students of the black art. The paper on "Romish Missionaries" furnishes details of the system and proceedings of the disciples of the Propaganda, and examines the claims which have been put forward in their behalf, the only efficient instruments for the dissemination of Christianity. The article on Holland gives a graphic sketch of the features of that interesting country. The biographical sketch of the late Mr. Sydney Taylor is a well written account of his life, which will form a valuable memorial to the friends of that amiable and lamented person. The reviews of Mr. Borrow's works and of the poems of the De Veres do full justice to the subjects of the notices.

Publishers must send us their magazines and periodicals regularly, if they wish us to take any notice of them.

THE CHASE, THE TURF, AND THE ROAD. By NIMROD. 1 vol-post 8vo. pp. 258. London, 1843. John Murray.



THE CHASE

"Listening how the hounds and horn
Cheerily rouse the slumbering morn,
From the side of some hoar hill
Thro' the high wood echoing shrill."
MILTON

IN the present rage for the illustration of all departments of literature no subject escapes embellishment by the pencil and the burin, and the Fine Arts are as much at ease now-a-days in the Chase, or upon the Turf or Road, as they were formerly in the more delicate atmosphere of the drawing-room or boudoir. It is a matter of no surprise, therefore, to find even so fastidious a publisher as Mr. Murray ushering from the press an elegant sporting volume under the above title, pregnant with grace and légèrête in its sketchy character, and full of spirited and animated delineations of all the observable features which invest with a racy and picturesque beauty the life scenes of the Turf, the Chase, and the Road. The advantage of a popular name, too, is well brought in to crown the interest of the volume, and in the present instance this immediate production of Nimrod's is about the very best that ever emanated from his pen, and certainly did more originally for his reputation than any other of his lucubrations. Most of our readers will remember the papers which are here reprinted as having appeared in the "Quarterly Review," and excited very uncommon attention—sensation almost -by the felicitous manner in which they made important disclosures and practical information upon their several subjects blend, and fall in with a thousand piquant anecdotes of men and things—a pleasant sparkling harmless personality — and a lively aptitude at description, peculiarly illustrative of the writer's management and tact. In their old guise they thus became long preserved themes of conversation, and in their new form they now assume an aspect doubly attractive. The volume in which they are enshrined is really beautifully got up, with Vizetelly's typography, an appropriate fox-hunting binding, characteristic devices gilt upon the exterior—and within a host of brilliant sketches of all sorts of "moving accidents by flood and field." The initial opening to the present article will show how prettily the vignette feature is brought into play, and below we give one of the dashing scenes of the road in the olden time, when such a turn out as the "Comet" was the life and glory of the travelling of England. Steam, alas! has almost converted it into a thing of the past; but even so it is to be admired and regarded with a sense of its busy and exhilarating influence. But here let Nimrod write for himself:—

May we be permitted, since we have mentioned the "Arabian Nights," to make a little demand on our readers' fancy, and suppose it possible that a worthy old gentleman of this said year—1742—had fallen comfortably asleep, à la Dodswell, and never awoke till Monday last in Piccadilly? "What coach, your honour?" says a ruffianly-looking fellow, much like what he might have been had he lived a hundred years back. "I wish to go home to Exeter," replies the old gentleman, mildly. "Just in time, your honour, here she comes—them there grey horses; where's your luggage?" "Do n't be in a hurry," observes the stranger; "that 's a gentleman's carriage!" "It ain't! I tell you," says the cad; it 's the Comet, and you must be as quick as lightning." Nolens volens, the remonstrating old gentlemen is shoved into the Comet by a cad at each elbow, having been three times assured his luggage is in the hind boot, and twice three times denied having occular demonstration of the fact.

However, he is now seated; and "What gentleman is going to drive us?" is his first question to his fellow passengers. "He is no gentleman, sir," says a person who sits opposite to him, and who happens to be a proprietor of the coach. "He has been on the Comet ever since she started, and is a very steady young man." "Pardon my ignorance," replies the regenerated; "from the cleanliness of his person, the neatness of his apparel, and the language he made use of, I mistook him for some enthusiastic bachelor of arts, wishing to become a charioteer after the manner of the illustrious ancients." "You must have been long in foreign parts, sir," observes the proprietor. In five minutes, or less, after this parley commenced, the wheels were round, and in another five the coach arrived at Hyde Park gate; but long before it got there, the worthy gentleman of 1742 (set down by his fellow-travellers for either a little cracked or an emigrant from the backwoods of America) exclaimed, "What! off the stones already?" "You have never been on the stones," observes his neighbour on the right; "No stones in London now, sir." "Bless me!" quoth our friend, "here 's a noble house! to whom does it belong? But why those broken windows, those iron blinds, and strong barricade?" "It is the Duke of Wellington's," says the coach proprietor, "the greatest captain since the days of Scipio. An ungrateful people made an attack upon his life, on the anniversary of the day upon which he won the most important battle ever fought in Europe." Here a passenger in black threw out something about Alcibiades, which, however, the rattle made it impossible to understand. "But we are going at a great rate!" exclaims again the stranger. "Oh no, sir," says the proprietor, "we never go fast over this stage! We have time allowed in consequence of being subject to interruptions, and we make it up over the lower ground." Five and thirty minutes, however, bring them to the noted town of Brentford. "Hah!" says the old man, becoming young again; "what! no improvement in this filthy place? Is old Brentford still here? a national disgrace! Pray, sir, who is your county member now?" "His name is Hume, sir," was the reply. "The modern Hercules," added the gentleman on the right; "the real cleanser of the Augean stable." "A gentleman of large property in the county, I presume," said the man of the last century. "Not an acre," replied the communicative proprietor: "A Scotchman from the town of Montrose." "Ay, ay; nothing like the high road to London for those Scotchmen. A great city merchant, no doubt, worth a plum or two." "No such thing, sir," quoth the other; "the gentleman was a doctor, and made his fortune in the Indies." "No quack, I warrant you." The proprietor was silent; but the clergyman in the corner again muttered something which was again lost, owing to the coach coming at the instant, at the rate of ten miles in the hour, upon the vile pavement of Brentford.

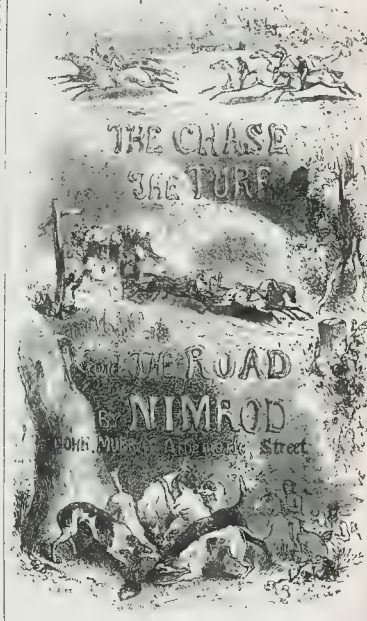
In five minutes under the hour the Comet arrives at Hounslow, to the great delight of our friend, who by this time waxed hungry, not having broken his fast before starting. "Just fifty-five minutes and thirty-seven seconds," says he, "from the time we left London! —wonderful travelling, gentlemen, to be sure! but much too fast to be safe. However, thank Heaven, we are arrived at a good-looking house; and now, waiter! I hope you have got breakf——!" Before the fast syllable, however, of the word could be pronounced, the worthy old gentleman's head struck the back of the coach by a jerk, which he could not account for (the fact was, three of the four fresh horses were bolters), and the waiter, the inn, and indeed Hounslow itself ("terraque urbesque recedunt"), disappeared in the twinkling of an eye. Never did such a succession of doors, windows, and window-shutters pass so quickly in his review before—and he hoped they might never do so again. Recovering, however, a little from his surprise, "My dear sir," said he, "you told me we were to change horses at Hounslow? Surely, they are not so inhuman as to drive these poor animals another stage at this unmerciful rate?" "Change horses, sir," says the proprietor; "why we changed them whilst you were putting on your spectacles, and looking at your watch. Only one minute allowed for it at Hounslow, and it is often done in fifty seconds by those nimble-fingered horse-keepers." "You astonish me!—but really I do not like to go so fast." "Oh, sir, we always spring them over these six miles. It is what we call the hospital ground." This alarming phrase is presently interpreted—it intimates that horses whose "backs are getting down instead of up in their work"—some "that won't hold an ounce down hill, or draw an ounce up"—others "that kick over the pole one day, and over the bar the next"—in short, all the reprobates, styled in the road slang ho-kickers, are sent to work these six miles, because here they have nothing to do but to gallop—not a pebble as big as a nutmeg on the road; and so even, that it would not disturb the equilibrium of a spirit-level.

The coach, however, goes faster and faster over the hospital ground, as the ho-kickers feel their legs, and the collars get warm to their shoulders; and, having ten outsides, the luggage of the same ten, and a few extra packages besides on the roof, she rolls rather more than is pleasant, although the centre of gravity is pretty well kept down by four not steuer insides, two well-laden boots, and three huge trunks in the slide. The gentleman of the last century, however, becomes alarmed—is sure the horses are running away with the coach—declares he perceives by the shadow that there is nobody on the box, and can see the reins dangling about the horses' heels. He attempts to look out of the window, but his fellow-traveller dissuades him from doing so:—"You may get a shot in your eye from the wheel. Keep your head in the coach; it's all right, depend on't. We always spring 'em over this stage." Persuasion is useless; for the horses increase their speed, and the worthy old gentleman looks out. But what does he see? Death and destruction before his eyes? No: to his surprise, he finds the coachman firm at his post, and in the act of taking a pinch of snuff from the gentleman who sits beside him on the bench, his horses going at the rate of a mile in three minutes at the time. "But, suppose anything should break, or a linchpin should give way and let a wheel loose?" is the next appeal to the communicative but not very consoling proprietor. "Nothing can break, sir," is the reply; "all of the very best stuff: axletrees of the best K.G. iron, faggotted edgeways, well bedded in the timbers; and as for linchpins, we have not one about the coach. We use the best patent boxes that are manufactured. In short, sir, you are as safe in it as if you were in your bed." "Bless me," exclaims the old man, "what improvements! And the roads!" "They are perfection, sir," says the proprietor: "no horse walks a yard in this coach between London and Exeter—all trotting-ground now." "A little galloping ground, I fear," whispers the senior to himself! "But who has effected all this improvement in your paving?" "An American of the name of M'Adam," was the reply—"but coachmen call him the Colossus of Roads. Great things have likewise been done in cutting through hills and altering the course of roads: and it is no uncommon thing now a-days to see four horses trotting away merrily down hill on that very ground where they formerly were seen walking up hill."

To rush into another department of the volume, the following few lines about the turf may serve to introduce a very graceful episode of grouping:—

That there are objections to racing we do not deny, as, indeed, there are to most of the sports which have been invented for the amusement of mankind, and few of which can gratify pure benevolence; but, when honourably conducted, we consider the turf as not more objectionable than most others, and it has one advantage over almost all now in any measure of fashionable repute—it diffuses its pleasures far and wide. The owner of race-horses cannot gratify his passion for the turf without affording delight to thousands upon thousands of the less fortunate of his countrymen. This is no trivial feature in the case, now that shooting is divided between the lordly battue and the prowl of the poacher — and that fox-hunting is every day becoming more and more a piece of exclusive luxury, instead of furnishing the lord, the squire, and the yeoman with a common recreation, and promoting mutual goodwill among all the inhabitants of the rural district.

We now bring our notice to a close, ending with the beginning as many critics do - only that here it is the end of the reviews, which is the commencement of the volume. Have our readers ever seen a more beautiful or appropriate title-page than this of the "Turf, the Chase, and the Road."



TITLE-PAGE.

We both congratulate and thank Mr. Murray for the production of this handsome book.

"IT'S THE 'COMET;' AND YOU MUST BE AS QUICK AS LIGHTNING."

MANCHESTER.—A meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Manchester was held on Monday at Manchester. It was announced that the accounts of the late manager, Mr. Burdekin, exhibited a deficiency of £30,000, which deficiency had been concealed through the ingenuity of the individual, and the assistance given him by certain bill-brokers in the City. Mr. Burdekin is now beyond the reach of legal consequences. The directors laid before the meeting a statement showing the condition of the bank's affairs at the end of the year. From this it is found that the liabilities had been progressively reduced to the extent of £489,966 since October 27, and, since the making up of the accounts, some £120,000 further has been liquidated. On the other hand, the estimated ultimate loss has been increased by the sum of £29,922, a difference ascribed in part to a falling off in the value of some of the outstandings, in part to the discovery of more extensive frauds committed by Burdekin, and in part to the accumulation of interest and other charges. A report of the affairs of the defunct Commercial Bank of England (Manchester) has just been published, from which it appears that the concern has still obligations to meet to the amount of £73,408, of which £15,911 is due to the public, and the balance, £57,497, is due to the shareholders, who, on the stoppage of the bank, made advances, in order to prevent litigation on the part of those creditors who insisted on payment at the time. The assets are stated to be £82,365, consisting of sundry items, after deducting the estimated loss by bad debts, and leaving a balance of £8,957 in favour of the unfortunate proprietors.

VALENTINES—By CROWQUILL.

MR. EGO.

Do you suppose, good Mr. E.,
That Love is cheated easily?
Knowing that all your constancy
Is for dear Number One.
Discharge yourself, and look around—
Something more worthy may be found
To lavish love on, I'll be bound.
Try two instead of one.

MISS ANN TIPPATHY.

You never could, at starting, ol.!
Have thought about Miss Marthveau—
'Tis only now you're smatting, on!
With wounds, without the cure.
In vain you try to desecrate
Love's temple by your bitter hate.
Others take warning by your fate,
And try to make quite sure.

MR. JIM PANZY.

Monkeys are satires on the men ·
The thing is quite amusing then;
But all its piquancy goes when Men satirize the beast.
And really puzzling us to know
In which genus they should go—
If Zoological or no—
So much has hair increased.

TOM SLAUGHTER.

Love's a slaughterer well we know,
Yet I don't see why a beau
Like you should have no pity. No,
You've hearts to throw away.
And heads too, faith; for here we see
A pair as like as they can be.
Oh, pray, reserve one, love, for me—
The one with the best tray.

MISS LOVEGOLD.

Love and Time, Ma'am, both have wings:
Love stays to whisper pretty things;
Time never does—but flies, and brings
Grey hairs and faded flowers.
Young Love—who is a jealous elf—
Whilst you are looking out for pelf,
Finds Time a suitor with himself,
And flies to other bowers.

CUPID'S HEART-WARMER.

Cold hearts are seldom found, 'tis true;
But here's a plan you may pursue—
That's if in case you ever do
A maiden's smiles desire.
But mind, when you're a married man,
I hope you'll not regret the plan,
And find that from out of the pan
You've got into the fire.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, Feb. 7, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Every day sees us more gay in this city. Balls, fêtes, concerts, and parties follow each other in uninterrupted succession; and at no time have I observed more activity prevailing amongst those whose employment it is to provide for the demands and exigencies of our ever-changing fashions. As our ball toilettes are here considered the most important of all our fashionable requirements, I shall commence by describing several specimens that have lately come under my notice. Let me then speak, in the first place, of a dress worn by Lady L. at the ball given at one of our foreign embassies. The robe was of rose crêpe, with three immense flounces, forming, in fact, three separate skirts, each of which was surrounded and surmounted with an edging of silver, and upon this edging were bouquets of green velvet flowers, with their foliage in diamonds. The coiffure was of green flowers and diamonds admirably arranged. Another lady at the same party wore a robe of rose-coloured crêpe, trimmed with three volants (falls of lace) of Brussels point; her berthe was of lace, and she wore a crown of roses. Perhaps there was no prettier dress worn at this ball—at least there were few more becoming. A third dress that attracted much attention, as it appeared on the person of one of our most distinguished fashionables, whose general good taste affixes the seal of excellence to everything she wears, was a double robe of white crêpe, both of them relieved on both sides of the skirt by a garland of mulberries. The corsage drapes, and furnished with little sleeves, which were also draped, and relieved about their centre by a little garland of mulberries. Upon the head was worn a cordelier of pearls, forming three turns, retained in its place, on one side, by a branch of mulberries, and having long tassels falling down on the neck. We have also observed the prevalence of many robes of gauze, striped in two shades, such as green and rose colour, blue and yellow, and rose colour and blue. Many of these had the skirts trimmed with ruches of tulle, or of frills of ribbon, the plaits lying opposite ways and of two shades, which is something quite new. A bow of ribbons, with flowing ends, is placed upon each side of the skirt. A coiffure, made entirely of ribbons, with their ends notched and fringed, falls from both sides of the knot of the hair, quite behind, to the nape of the neck. These little simple coiffures, independently of their elegant appearance, have the further advantage of extreme convenience, as they require only to be put upon the head, and give no trouble in adjusting. A-propos of half-dress costume, I have just been shown a robe in green velvet, with the corsage made high, and open upon the breast, in such a manner as to show the reverse side lined in rose satin. The borders and turnback of the sleeves were of the same; and upon the two sides of the open skirt there was placed a double ribbon of green crossed satin, permitting the rose satin to be seen underneath it, and terminated by a bow. The coiffure was formed of a wide bar of blonde, retained behind the hair by a double diamond pin; and the toilet ensemble formed a negligé equally elegant and beautiful. Pelerine camails, entirely of ermine, are more numerous than ever for evening parties, and are even seen in our promenades. The fashion of our pelerines, as in every thing else, has become exaggerated, so that now the little pelerine has enlarged to the size of the Crispin. I should tell you that fans are now a most indispensable article of evening costume, though it is almost impossible to describe every variety that is seen here, or their different degrees of elegance: painting, shell, and inlaying are used for half dress; gold, incrustations of precious stones, and paintings still more exquisitely finished, are seen at full dress parties. I do not know that I have anything more that is particularly worthy of your attention, and shall therefore postpone any further observations till my next. Adieu.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.
(Before Chief Justice Tindal and a Common Jury).

SERJEANT CARRON, ESQ.

The plaintiff in this case, Horatio Smith, who was described as an ivory turner, but who it appeared kept billiard-rooms at Windsor, brought this action against Bartley Wilmot Carleton, Esq., an officer in the 60th Royal Rifles, but now in the Coldstream Guards, to recover compensation in damages for a violent assault committed on the 8th of June, 1841 (one of the Ascot race days), at Windsor. The damages were laid at £500. Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, with whom was Mr. F. V. Lee, appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Serjeant Bompas, with Mr. Carron, for the defendant. It appeared that about half-past twelve o'clock on the night in question, the defendant with about thirty others, several being officers of the Life Guards, and other regiments stationed at Windsor, all being much intoxicated, wished to have a bank made for French hazard, which being objected to, they tore the cloths up, and destroyed the billiard and roulette tables, and also the cues and maces. They smashed the lamps, looking-glasses, and windows, and tore the window curtains. The plaintiff endeavouring to quell the disturbance, was struck by the defendant with a knobbed stick, knocked down and struck several times afterwards, and then dragged into the road several yards. The following day defendant said, "What a lark we had last night; are there any more windows to break? we shall come and give you another turn to-night to finish the job for you." The plaintiff had bumps on his head and was otherwise bruised. Mr. Serjeant Bompas addressed the jury at some length in mitigation of damages. The learned judge summed up, and the jury, after half an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £10.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, FEB. 8
(Before Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque.)

IN THE BANKRUPTCY OF LORD HUNTINGTOWER.

The proceedings in this case were resumed on Wednesday, which was fixed for the application of his lordship's certificate, and the court was as densely crowded as at any of the former hearings. Mr. Chambers and Mr. James, on behalf of the bankrupt, were heard at great length, and urged, with great ability, that if the bankrupt had come before the court with ready-made books, and no accounts, and without the balance-sheet, then, indeed, might reasonable accusation attach to the bankrupt's character. The learned commissioner then proceeded to give his judgment. He went through all the facts of the case as they had unfolded from time to time, and remarked upon the imprudence of the bankrupt and the character of those amongst whom he had fallen. He concluded thus:—I think I am bound to grant him his certificate; but while I grant the certificate, it shall not be immediately, though the period will not be long, as the bankrupt has already suffered a lengthened imprisonment. I shall annex conditions to the grant of his lordship's certificate, which are the same as those in Mr. Commissioner Fane, with the same object, but not the same reasons; and I shall declare that his certificate is not to protect his future property until all his creditors who have proved shall be paid twenty shillings in the pound. I have again to repeat, that I shall grant the bankrupt his certificate at the end of three months from the time of his passing his final examination (on the 14th of April next), reserving to the court the exact terms for the future payment of the estate until twenty shillings in the pound be paid, and a sum for the assignees to make the bankrupt such reasonable allowance for his maintenance as the estate will afford. The court then adjourned.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS, FEB. 8
(Before Mr. Sergeant Adams and a Bench of Magistrates.)

Anne Bryan, aged nine years, was convicted of stealing a tub, value 4d., the property of Elizabeth Chapman. She had been known before to the police as the associate of thieves. The circumstance said he would apply to the Philanthropic Society, of which he had lately become a member, to see what could be done for the girl. The calendar contained the names of forty-three prisoners, thirty-seven of whom are charged with felony, and the remainder with assaults, misdemeanours, &c. The cases tried during the day were not of any public interest.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD COURT.
(Before the Recorder.)

FORGING A DEED.—Frederick Charles Burnham Blackwell, alias Frederick Burnham Blackwell, a respectable-looking man, described in the calendar as a draper, was indicted with forging and uttering a deed of assignment, with intent to defraud Elizabeth Constable, his well-known friend, the deed to be a forgery. There were several other counts varying the form of the charge. Mr. Clarkson stated the case for the prosecution, but the facts were extremely complicated, from the intricate manner in which the transactions were carried on between the parties. Several witnesses were called to prove that the handwriting to the deed which purported to be the signature of Mr. Constable was not that of Mr. Constable, and that the prisoner, as an attesting witness, was genuine, and also that Stanley was in indigent circumstances, and quite unable to lend any sum of money during the last twelve or fourteen years of his life. Dr. Lever deposed that he attended Mr. Constable professionally in his last illness. He died on the 31st of December, 1840, and had been in a dying condition for two or three days previously. He was in such a state that he was quite incapable of holding a pen, much less signing his name. The case for the prosecution having closed, Mr. Chambers submitted that the indictment could not be sustained, inasmuch as the charge made was for uttering a forged deed, and supposing the case as the worst, supposing the deed to be a forged one, he contended that there was no evidence whatever of uttering on the part of the prisoner. Mr. Baldwin took the same side. Mr. Clarkson replied, contending that there was sufficient evidence to satisfy the legal definition. Mr. Bodkin followed on the same side. Mr. Chambers replied. The Recorder thought there was sufficient to go to the jury. The proceedings occupied the court until past three o'clock in the morning, when Mr. Clarkson rose to reply, and his address lasted until nearly four o'clock. The Recorder then summed up, and at five minutes before five, the jury, after deliberating for about five minutes, returned a verdict finding the prisoner "Guilty" of uttering the deed, well knowing it to have been forged. The court then broke up, the trial having occupied upwards of nineteen hours. Judgment was respited.

(Before Commissioner Bullock.)

Samuel Sydney Smith surrendered to take his trial upon an indictment charging him with wilful and corrupt perjury, and after a lengthened trial was acquitted.

NEW COURT
(Before the Common Sergeant.)

Philip Hobbitt, aged 26, was indicted for stealing, on the 27th of December, a box containing gold and other articles of the value of £100, the property of Benjamin Worthy Horne and others, his masters. Mr. Doane defended the prisoner, and Mr. Bodkin prosecuted. After the examination of several witnesses, the Common Sergeant summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The learned judge said that in order to set an example to persons who had the custody daily of valuable property, the court was bound to mark his case. The sentence was that he be transported for seven years

(Before the Recorder.)

In the course of the day Henry Simmers, who was convicted on the first day of the session of wilful and corrupt perjury, in swearing a false affidavit, was brought up to receive judgment. The sentence was that he be imprisoned in the House of Correction for three months, and at the expiration of that period be transported for the term of seven years.

Charles Shipley, aged 24, clerk, was indicted for embezzling and stealing £402 7s. of Messrs. Williams, Deacon, and Co., his masters. Mr. Bodkin appeared for the prosecution. Mr. Adolphus, on the prisoner's behalf, said that he was desirous of retracting his plea of not guilty and pleading guilty. Judgment respited to next session. The court, at its rising, adjourned to Monday, the 27th of February.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—On Tuesday, William Connell was brought up for examination upon the charge of having attempted to murder Mrs. Elizabeth Magnus, at the Auction Mart Tavern, on the 12th of December. A great deal of curiosity was excited, as it was well known in the neighbourhood that the prosecutrix would attend to give evidence.—Mr. Wontner was appointed to conduct the prosecution. The prisoner walked up to the bar with tears in his eyes, which were much swollen.—Elizabeth Sarah Magnus, a comely woman, apparently about forty years of age, stated that she was an occupant dent at the bar at the Auction Mart Tap; had been in the situation e even months, and was authorized by Mrs. Baker, the wife of the proprietor, to conduct the establishment. Some time ago the prisoner had been in the situation about five months. He was called "John" in the house. On Monday night, the 12th of December, at about nine o'clock, she asked the prisoner to take the beer off the stove, as was his duty; after which he said, "Go to heaven with you." At about eleven o'clock she went to shut the gate, which it was his business to do, but which he had neglected, and while she was fastening it he made his appearance; she said she had done the rest of his work, and would do that. He said then to her, "Go to ——." She returned to the bar, in which was Selina, the under barmaid, who was called Sarah. At about five minutes to twelve o'clock, when the prisoner was setting on the steps leading to the place at which the gas was turned off, she went down the passage towards the Mart door. The prisoner suddenly put his hand upon her shoulder behind her, and she said, "Be quiet, John, or I will call Mrs. Baker to you." She heard something rattle, or chunk, and the prisoner immediately shot her. She felt herself shot, and fell to the ground, and the prisoner fell down the moment he shot her. As she lay she felt something trickling upon her hand. In two or three minutes she rose and went into the tap, and as she turned round to make her escape, she saw him standing with a knife in his hand. He looked very pale, and said to her, "Now I'll finish you." She begged for mercy, and said to him, "For God's sake save me; Oh, spare me!" and screamed out "Murder!" She then passed him, and ran along the dark passage, and groped her way as well as she could to her room, and he followed her, begging that she would stop, and assuring her that he would not hurt her.—Mr. Wilkinson asked whether she repulsed the prisoner following her into her room?—The prosecutrix replied that she did. Where could not have left to the attempt on her life. The Lord Mayor: Did you know he had a pistol?—The Prosecutrix: Yes, I had seen a pistol in his possession two or three months before. He shot a cat, of which Mrs. Baker wished to get rid, with as one might. The Lord Mayor: Now, prisoner, do you wish to ask Mrs. Magnus any questions? Prisoner: No, my lord.—Mr. James John Adams, the surgeon, who attended Mrs. Magnus, was next examined, and deposed to the nature of the wound, the particulars of which have already appeared in this paper.—Several other witnesses having been examined, the prisoner was further remanded until next day. On Thursday the prisoner was again brought up, but the prosecutrix was unable to appear. One of the other female servants contradicted the evidence of the prosecutrix as to the freedom which she permitted the prisoner to take.—The prisoner was again remanded.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A BROTHER OF THE LATE SIR SIDNEY SMITH.—On Monday night, M.P., held at the Welbeck Arms, by the Coach and Horses, Welbeck street, Cavendish-square, on the body of Courtney Smith, Esq., aged sixty-nine, of 7, Park-street, Grosvenor-square. The deceased was brother of the late gallant Sir Sidney Smith.—Stephen Stanners, baker, No. 69, Hinde-street, Manchester-square, stated that the deceased, on Saturday afternoon last, about half-past two o'clock, entered his shop, saying, "May I be allowed for a few minutes?" Witness, who was behind the counter, said, "Certainly," and deceased sat down in a chair immediately upon doing which he placed his right arm on the counter, and resting his head upon his hand, seemed to faint. Witness thereupon asked him if he felt unwell, but he was unable to answer, and merely shook his head. A surgeon being instantly sent for, deceased, on his arrival, was pronounced to be dead. The Right Hon. E. Vernon Smith, M.P. for Northampton, deposed that the deceased, who was a gentleman of independent fortune, was his uncle. Witness had not seen him for six months, but he had ascertained that deceased left home on Saturday, about one o'clock, being in the enjoyment of his usual good health. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

EXTRAORDINARY DEATH.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Robin Hood and Little John, Windmill-street, St. Luke's, on the body of Mr. Samuel Cox, a chemist and druggist, who resided at No. 4, John's-road, Brick-lane, St. Luke's. He had it appeared for the last three or four years been much addicted to drinking. In February last he had a very severe illness in consequence, and was obliged to quit his business and go to a private lunatic asylum in the country, and from the medical treatment he there experienced he became reformed, and for about six months afterwards his habits were remarkably abstemious, until four months ago, when he again relapsed into his former course. On Saturday morning last Mr. Harris, a surgeon, was called upon to see him. He was labouring under delerium tremens. He had been drinking that morning brandy and beer. Witness prescribed for him the necessary remedies. On the same evening he became much worse, and died at seven o'clock in the morning. The fever arose to that degree that he made several attempts to throw himself out of the window, in which he was frustrated by his wife, who had remained in attendance upon him. On Sunday morning finding the paroxysms to be increasing, ordered the deceased to be placed under restraint, and a person from Dr. Miles's lunatic asylum, at Hoxton, was sent for to attend him. Witness continued his attention to deceased until nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, when he was seized with convulsions, which lasted until half past ten o'clock the same evening, when he expired. It appeared that the deceased was a considerable sufferer in the year 1838, by the fall of the house, and his connections were of the highest order. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural Death, accelerated by excessive drinking."

Despatches from the Earl of Elgin, Governor of Jamaica, and the Governors of the other West India Colonies, were received at the Colonial Office.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—In consequence of the arrivals of English wheat having been on a very limited scale since our last, and their inferior condition, a decided improvement has taken place in the value of that article, both for both red and white, at an advance on previous currencies of from 1s to 2s per quarter, at which enhancement good clearances have been effected. Foreign wheat, free of duty, has gone off more freely, and the prices have risen quite 1s per quarter; in bonded sorts, however, so little has been transacted that their value remains almost nominal. The inquiry for both barley and malt at full rates ruled extremely dull quotations. Good oats are, in some instances, commanded 6d per quarter more money; but, in the weathered descriptions, no advance has taken place. Beans, peas, and flour have quite as much.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 6170; barley, 17,590; malt, 14,610; and oats, 9160 quarters; flour, 14,730 sacks. Irish: barley, 150; and oats, 8550 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1440 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 44s to 55s; ditto white, 51s to 59s. Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 57s; do. white, 51s to 58; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 22s to 26s; malting do., 28s to 31s; Clevedon, 32s to 34s. Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown do., 30s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 62s; Chevalier, 63s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 24s; potato do., 25s to 26s; Yoorkai and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; do. white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; do. old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 35s; boilers, 32s to 37s; per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkslure, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In bond.—Barley, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 17s; do. feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 23s to 26s; peas, 25s to 27s; per quarter. Flour, America, 23s to 24s; Baltic 21 per barrel

The Seed Market.—The weather being very changeable, exceedingly little has been doing in any kind of seeds, yet we have no decline to notice in our quotations.

In following are the prices entries:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 44s; hempseed, 35s to 40s; per quarter; coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white do., 10s to 10s 6d; tares, 5s 6d to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 30l to 32l per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, 10l to 10l 10s; do. foreign, 7l to 7l 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 6l per ton.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 48s 1d; barley, 27s 5d; oats, 16s 9d; rye, 30s 2d; beans, 27s 1l; peas, 31s 1d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 48s 1d; barley, 28s 11d; Oats, 17s 0d; Rye, 29s 3d; Beans, 27s 9d; Peas, 30s 0d per quarter.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s 0d; Barley, 10s 0d; Oats, 8s 0d; Rye, 10s 0d; Beans, 11s 0d; Peas, 10s 6d.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 6d to 6½d for the 4lb loaf.

Tea. The accounts which have come to hand from China have not had much effect upon the tea market; yet there is less activity apparent in it than last week. Public sales, of nearly 60,000 chests, are declared for next week. The stock of tea in London on the 1st inst. was 26,626,000 lbs. against 29,278,000 ditto at the corresponding period in 1842. The total supply in the kingdom on that date was 35,126,200 lbs. against 35,288,516 ditto last year.

Sugar.—The market, for all kinds of sugar, has been inactive this week, both grocers and refiners having purchased only to suit their present wants, hence former rates have been with difficulty sustained. The stocks are increased.

Coffee.—Several public sales have again been held, but most of the parcels have been withdrawn. The market, by private contract, is very heavy, and prices have still a downward tendency

Cocoa.—This market is heavy with very little doing.

Pepper.—About 3200 bags Sumatra have sold at auction, at from 2½d to 2¾d per lb. for very low quality.

Indigo.—East India is in steady request; but, generally speaking, little is doing.

Metals.—There is more demand for tin, but iron continues exceedingly dull.

Oils.—For all kinds of oils we have little inquiry, and prices may be considered about stationary.

Tallow. The holders of Russian tallow are giving way in their demands, the finest qualities being noted at 45s 3d per cwt. for fine quality.

Provisions.—In Irish butter little has been passing, but prices remain as last quoted. Foreign butter is likewise dull, 108s being the highest quotation for fine Dutch. Lard moves off slowly, while the bacon market remains in the same dull state as for some weeks past. Prime arrable Waterford landed is selling at 36s to 37s

Cattle.—Adairs, 19s 6d; Old Tanfield, 14s 6d; Ord's Redheugh, 14s; South Pontop, 14s; West Wylam, 16s; Gosforth, 18s; Hedley, 17s 9d., Hetton's, 20s; Lambton's, 20s; Stewart's, 18s 9d; Cassop, 19s 9d; South Durham, 18s; Hartley, 15s 9d per ton. Ships arrived, 21.

Hops.—We have had a moderate quantity of hops offering in the borough this week. Prime colonry samples are held on full terms, but other kinds command little attention

Potatoes.—On account of the prevailing cold weather, and to a slight falling off in the arrivals from Scotland and different parts of England, the demand is steady, at from 35s to 62s per ton, the latter figure being for York reds.

Wool. About 900 packages of wool have been imported into London this week. Public sales, of nearly 7000 packages of Australian and other sorts, are announced to take place at Garraway's next week. The sale, by private contract, is heavy Smithfield.—We have had but moderate time-of-year supplies of fat stock offering in this market, and there has been an improvement in the general inquiry, at an advance in the rates of beef and mutton of 2d per 8lb; those of veal and pork remaining unaltered. Beef from 3s to 4s 4d; mutton, 3s 2d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 10d to 4s 10d; and pork, 3s to 4s 4d per 8 lbs., to sink the offal.

Vegetable and Leadenhall.—Although there has been a full average time-of-year arrival of slaughtered meat from northern quarters the demand has ruled steadily, yet the prices have ruled low. Beef from 2s 8d to 3s 8d; mutton, 2s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 8d; and pork, 3s to 4s 2d per 8 lbs., by the carcass.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The arrival of the Bombay mail was announced on Saturday, but the merchants' letters were not delivered until the latter part of this week. From Macao the advices are not later than the 13th of November, and from the entries other points in the Canton Sea with which we are now connected the information received is necessarily of still older date. The news, however, continues to be in every way satisfactory. At Macao a reduction in the tael currency has taken place in the value itself, and has affected in teas of all descriptions and the supply was fully as great as in former years. Shipping was plentiful, and freights, consequently, lower [illegible] was rapidly increasing in population and in commercial importance. It was perfectly understood there that the Emperor not only would perform all the articles of the treaty at present, but that even before the expiration of the stipulated six months all the obnoxious regulations of Foo-Chow-fu, Amoy, Shanghae, and the other sea-ports included in the treaty, to English commerce. This must, therefore, be considered a most encouraging feature in the position of various articles of British industry, and the establishment of the Chinese tariff of import duties was likewise waited for by our merchants before they began to make any important commercial transactions. [illegible] the letters do not [illegible] plentiful, and consequently dull, and to effect sales of cotton wool, manufactures were obliged to [illegible] value of any article. The last advices from Calcutta, previous to the 20th December last, to Europe, had been £1 sterling per ton, and a further rise was confidently expected [illegible] for opium and rather fuller off in India, and at Bombay its price had declined [illegible] to a great extent, but to do so, considerable increasing demand for the produce of the Chinese tariff of import duties was promulgated. On the whole, the intelligence received by this mail is [illegible] pass away, principally accrued both in extent and in value, and thereby inures to the benefit of the [illegible] of the country.

In the Colonial market, in Mincing-lane, [illegible] business has been to a great extent, but to do so, considerable increasing demand for the produce of several princes has occurred in sugars generally this has been the case. The prices of British plantation sugars are considered nearly the same here, whilst the demand is rather more than it has been in the course of their production. Still, however, the opinion is becoming general that the increased growth of this season, the additional means afforded for further improvement in the manufacture, and the reduction of duty on foreign free-labour sugars, are the causes of a more decided tendency to a reduction in all our markets with French growers. This is certainly a reasonable symptom, at all events, of improvement in one branch of manufactures. From the coal-fields at Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford, the reports are such that we have no fears as to their ever ceasing to work. Labour continues plentiful enough, but wages were moderate, though not more so than the prices of provisions justified. It is not our intention to enter into the matters of banking much longer, although the employment of additional hands may be taken as a fair inference of the return of prosperity generally to the woollen traders

Of cotton wool large quantities continue to be duly forced for sale on the markets in Liverpool, Bristol, and the other ports of importation, and large quantities are weekly [illegible] to the consumers amongst the manufacturing [illegible] During the week the demand for grain of all descriptions has exceeded the supply, and an improvement of from 1s to 2s per quarter in wheat has taken place.

In the Money Market very little alteration has occurred since our last publication. The tendency of the public funds continues to improve, and the credit of Railways and productive channels for its employment. The Consols are too high for permanent investment with a view to annual income, and, consequently, during this week, in the total absence of speculation, very little variation has occurred in their value. At the conclusion of last week the [illegible] declined to 94¾, and they have fluctuated since then between 95 and that price; thus showing the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a small member, to convert the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. into Twos, an operation not perfectly in keeping, however, with the national [illegible] In France the funds and Bank Shares find little temptation at present to make investments, and consequently the transactions in them are now nearly entirely confined to speculation, and the alteration in their prices has been so small during the week that they may be [illegible] almost of nominal value. Railway shares have fallen from £3 to £8 each, the late report of the Directors not being considered satisfactory by the shareholders. The shares in the Birmingham line are quoted this evening at from £212 to £213 for each share. Those of the Great Western, and of Havre and Paris also fully maintain the [illegible] of last week

Two great revolutions in France are within the memories of men. Two scenes arising out of them depict strikingly their precarious results. Take first the old town of Nimes, so rich in Roman remains, and let an event on the 8th of April, 1794, bear its own commentary. An advocate, and a Protestant, whose name and civil rights were not recognised by the laws of the old régime, and whose religious persecution was dispelled by the destruction of the Bourbons, was brought to the scaffold, because he was suspected by, or had become obnoxious to, the sanguinary triumvirate of the day. The place of execution at Nimes, on that 8th of April, was rendered more horrifying by the presence of the wife of the victim, who, holding by the hands two children, the eldest a boy six years of age, and the youngest a daughter, raised her eyes to Heaven, and, as the fatal axe fell, convulsively grasped the hand of the boy, and shrieked, "My child this is revolution's work!"

On the 8th of April, 1841, a scene of another kind passed in Paris at the hotel of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. In the cabinet of the minister sat a thin pale-faced man, whose serious and meditative expression indicated traces of deep sorrow and thought. Threescore years of severe trials were scarcely to be mistaken in that care-worn, melancholy, and yet highly intellectual face. The minister was interrupted every moment by his secretaries with despatches, or for instructions. One communication came from the King, and ambassadors and ministers were waiting in turn for audience. But when that minister of state arose for the complex duties of the day, whose visits were the first? A lady having the air of a few years' younger griefs, and who addressed him as "brother;" a venerable woman, whose walk was yet firm, although long past the average limit of human life, whose silvery locks and still erect figure attracted involuntarily, as it were, such deep interest, saluted him as her "son;" and three children (two delicate and beautiful girls and a patrician-looking boy), with vivacious affection clung to his neck and called him "father."

Is any key required to these two scenes, or will not the Protestant victim be at once recognised as M. Guizot, the advocate; and the boy, who with his mother witnessed the execution, as the present Minister of Foreign Affairs nominally, but virtually the Prime Minister of France?

François Pierre Guillaume Guizot is before you. The artist faithfully produces that fine philosophical head and dignified severity of expression, the sedateness of which is so displeasing to the more volatile class of his countrymen. In stature M. Guizot is erect, and his figure is very slight, but there is much ease and grace in his deportment; and when he elevates, proudly and even fiercely, his head, and glances defyingly at his foes and opponents, the influence of a governmental man and master mind is always acknowledged. His career is too mixed up with the fate of his country to be summarily dismissed; and the following details thereof, at a moment when his name is European, will be found to afford an accurate notion of the statesman and the man:—M. Guizot was born on the 4th of October, 1787, and after the dreadful catastrophe of 1794 his mother removed from Nimes to Geneva. It was at the Genevese Gymnasium that M. Guizot commenced his studies, and acquired a first-rate college reputation. Not only did the young student render himself master of the ancient classics, but Schiller and Goethe, Gibbon and Shakspere, Dante and Alfieri, were his especial favourites. The final direction, however, of M. Guizot's studies, was history and philosophy, and his avidity during the latter portion of his collegiate career was prodigious. In 1805 M. Guizot left Geneva for Paris, and for one year was laboriously studying for his degree in the midst of a melancholy gloom, feeling that he had that within him which passeth show, but wanting the occasion to develope his powers. At length he was engaged as tutor in the family of M. Stapfer, who had been Swiss Minister in Paris, and M. Stapfer's kindness procured him an introduction to literary parties of M. Suard. A romantic incident at M. Suard's house led to M. Guizot's marriage. The last member of a family ruined by the Revolution, a Mdlle. Pauline de Meulan, was supporting herself by editing a periodical called the Publiciste. Through over-exertion she had a serious fit of illness. She bewailed to her friends her hard lot, with the prospect of being unable to continue the publication. One day Mdlle. Meulan, however, received an anonymous letter, begging that she might not make herself uneasy, as she would receive, so long as she was ill, articles for the Publiciste. Inclosed was a communication, in which not only her opinions were expressed, but her style imitated with extraordinary skill. Mdlle. de Meulan signed the article (as required by law), and up to the moment of her recovery continued to be supplied with similar writings. Mdlle. de Meulan related her adventure to her friends, and exhausted herself in conjectures as to the person who was her generous and secret contributor. She wrote in her journal most earnestly for the author to present himself and receive her thanks, but no one came. One day she was at M. Suard's, and was talking with a pale young man about her adventure, when some expression caught her ear, and she exclaimed, "Mais mon Dieu! c'est vous!" "Je ne dis pas le contraire," was the quiet reply. The anonymous writer was M. Guizot; and some four or five years afterwards Mdlle. de Meulan was united to the pale young man, and became Madame Guizot. It was the happiest, but, alas, but was cruelly snapped asunder by consumption, in 1827—the death-bed scene of this wife being rendered more touching by Madame Guizot's conversion to the Protestant faith, in order, as she expressed it, "that she might not be separated from her husband in eternity." Madame Guizot expired shortly after her beloved husband had read to her one of Bossuet's magnificent funeral orations. This is not the only blow M. Guizot has experienced in his domestic life. His eldest son, of immense promise, has also died of consumption. He has three surviving children, of delicate health; and never can I forget the agony of the father last year, when two of them were for some days hovering between life and death. There is not on this earth a man of more kindly affections than M. Guizot. He has been called by his enemies a Robespierre of Politics; but in private life, a more amiable, affectionate, generous, and considerate creature cannot exist. Those who are around him have been so for years—those who have formerly served him are in positions secured for them by his grateful recollections; and, where duty is not mixed up, a more sincere and devoted friend, and father, kind son and brother, may rarely be found. The writer who pens this article is also enabled to assure M. Guizot's political foes that he is cognizant of facts (which he only regrets he cannot disclose) establishing that the minister is not the implacable statesman that they represent him to be; but we must return to the history of this great and good man.

For five or six years M. Guizot was devoted exclusively to literary labours. In 1809 his first work, the "Dictionnaire des Synonymes," was published. This was followed by his "Vies des Poètes Français," a translation of Gibbon, with notes, and a translation of Relipio's "L'Espagne en 1808." In 1812 he was nominated Deputy Historical Lecturer at the University, and soon afterwards became the Professor of Modern History, in which he acquired everlasting fame. About this time his connexion was formed with M. Royer Collard, the chief or rather origin of the Doctrinaires,* a class of politicians so called because of the constant use made of the word doctrine in his speeches. M. Guizot, during the eventful scenes of 1814, visited his mother at Nimes, and his political career dates from the first Restoration, when he became Secretary-General at the Ministry of the Interior, over which the courtly Abbé de Montesquiou presided. The French Liberals accuse M. Guizot and M. Royer Collard of having prepared the severe law against the press, brought into the Chambers by M. de Montesquiou. M. Guizot is also charged with being a colleague of the celebrated M. de Fraysinous on the Committee of Censorship. The return of Napoleon and the flight of the Bourbons caused M. Guizot's resumption of his university labours, but towards the close of the Hundred Days he undertook the famous mission to Ghent, with which he is so much taunted by his opponents. M. Guizot was charged by the moderate Royalists with the task of procuring an extension of the charta, and of insisting on the dismissal of M. de Blacas, who was regarded as too ardent a representative of the old and absolute régime. M. Guizot, after the second Restoration, became Secretary-General at the Ministry of Justice, under M. de Barbé-Marbois. He subsequently became a member of the Royalist Constitutional Ministry opposed to M. de Vitrolles—M. Villèle—and distinguished himself by various pamphlets. He became a partisan of the Decazes system (Louis Philippe's in point of fact). One of his brochures for the rare application of the punishment of death for political offences produced a great sensation. In 1825 he was interdicted as Professor of History; and the revenge of the Ministry was the origin of his series of historical works, whilst he was in disgrace and in retirement. M. Guizot joined the Aide-toi, le ciel t'aidera Society against the Villèle encroachments. The Martignac Ministry restored M. Guizot to his chair at the University, and then he was elected for the College of Lisieux, which he has ever represented. He was the strongest opponent of the Polignac Cabinet, but was no party, direct or indirect, to the revolution of 1830. M. Guizot was of opinion that the remedy to the existing evils was to be found in the charta, without having recourse to violent steps. He returned to Paris from Nimes on the 26th of July, and drew up the Protest of the Deputies against the Ordonnances; but intrigue had engaged the mobocracy in the conflict, and M. Guizot, from being a passive spectator became an approbative participator after the Three Days. "Order," the dominant idea of M. Guizot, was uppermost with him in the midst of disorder and amidst the smoking ruins of the barricade combats. His first impulse was to demand, at M. Lafitte's on the 29th, that the revolution should be be replaced by a regular government. On the next day he was nominated by the Municipal Commission Provisional Minister of Public Instruction, and on the 31st he read in the Chamber the proclamation conferring on the Duke of Orleans the Lieutenant-Generalship of France. In less than a week M. Guizot had changed the entire personnel of France, such as prefects, sub-prefects, &c., having become Minister of the Interior. When the revolutionary ordonnances of the first July Ministry had manifest M. Guizot retired. He returned to office as Minister of Public Instruction under the Cabinet of Casimir Perier; and on the death of the latter M. Guizot coalesced with his rival, M. Thiers, in the 11th of October Administration. It was in 1833 that M. Guizot brought forward his great law on primary instruction. The 11th of October Ministry had four years' existence and then broke up. In 1838-39 M. Guizot joined the celebrated coalition of Dynastic and Anti-Dynastic Liberals, of Royalists, and of Republicans, against the Molé Ministry, assisting the principle of the parliamentary government against the particular system of royalty and prerogative. This coalition in 1839 upset the Molé Cabinet in the general elections, but, as the King had foreseen, the unnatural union was broken up by the quarrels of the conquerors for place and honour. The breach between Thiers and Guizot was widened at that time, and the latter, who felt his force, had declined to accept any post but that of Minister of the Interior. After the longest interregnum ever known, the 12th of May or Soult-Dufaure Ministry was formed, owing to the Barbes insurrection in the streets of Paris. M. Guizot remained out of affairs until he was appointed successor to Marshal Sebastiani in the London embassy. M. Guizot's position here, in 1840, and his being called to Paris, to form the 29th of October Ministry, with the nominal presidency of Marshal Soult, are modern facts. As Minister of Foreign Affairs, and as Premier virtually, M. Guizot at length has taken that station from which his friends assert he had been too long excluded. His pacific policy soon became manifest. He caused the return of France to the European concert by the signing of the 13th of July Convention, consecrating the rights of the Ottoman Government to the keeping of the Straits of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus from all ambitious intruders; and M. Guizot had hoped to have reconciled England and France thoroughly by the treaty of December 1841, extending the provisions of the slave suppression treaties of 1831 and 1833; Russia, Austria, and Prussia having entered the common league to put down the inferral black traffic, by a reciprocal right of search of suspected vessels. Party in France, however, got hold of the question, distorted, misrepresented, and calumniated its intent and bearings; and, the voice of the French Chambers being against its ratification, France has been permitted, by the generosity of the Great Powers, to abandon the Treaty of 1841. M. Guizot has, however, succeeded in maintaining order in France, and has secured for her a more kindly regard from the European statesmen than she had a right to expect, from her fickleness and quiescentation. "M. Guizot," says the eloquent Homme de Rien, in his "Galerie des Contemporaires Illustres," "may be considered under four points of view—as the private individual, as the literary man and historian, and as orator and statesman." The authority of Viscount de Cormenin, the Timon of Parliamentary sketches, who is the most bitter and uncompromising opponent of M. Guizot, may be taken as conclusive as to the pure and rigid morals of M. Guizot's life and sentiments. This is not the place to analyse his literary and historical works. In lucidity and profundity he has no rival. As an orator, he is incomparably the most distinguished in France. It is curious that so great a man should be fond of exciting debates, but M. Guizot revels in the most animated discussion. As it warms, so does he become more eager for the combat. The Ministerial benches scarcely follow him. He accompanies the rude or violent attack of his opponent at the tribune by a contemptuous shrug, and he gives a withering glance at the opposition as they cheer. At length, when all the rabid speakers have exhausted themselves, the Minister's turn comes. His sonorous and imposing voice, his well-turned and energetic phrases, his calm and dignified action, even in the midst of a vehement reply, and, above all, a kind of governmental or authoritative tone, which is natural to him, awe the turbulent, and inspire confidence in the Conservative phalanx. Frequently has the majority been turned at the eleventh hour by some masterly address from M. Guizot; and at the moment when the cabinet has appeared lost, he has realised one of its greatest triumphs. To afford the most correct notion of the man is simply to state that he is now in the Boulevard des Capucines, at the Foreign-office, what he was in his modest domicile in the Rue Ville l'Evêque. The honours of a Minister have not changed the habits of the man. To sum up M. Guizot's characteristics as a politician, it may be truly done in the language of the Homme de Rien, thus:—"Definitively, what is M. Guizot? He is, above all, a man for power and government, and at the same time the most independent of men; submitting to the yoke of the principles which he has laid down as his rule of conduct, and holding his head high as to the question of persons; a policy of great value estimating all that is worthy of esteem; more convinced than enthusiastic; prouder of the approbation of his conscience than of the homage of the multitude; endowed, in the supreme degree, with that force of will and perseverance which make the statesman; a mortal enemy of everything resembling disorder, and capable, if things came to the worst, of throwing himself without hesitation into despotism which he detests, rather than accept the anarchy which he abhors."

* The actual political signification of the word Doctrinaire has been much canvassed and discussed, but briefly it may be said to apply to those politicians who lay down dogmatical rules of principle and precedence for the guidance of public affairs.

We have received from another informed and intelligent source a kind communication respecting M. Guizot, which contains two incidental allusions not to be found in the interesting memoir of our esteemed Paris Correspondent.

"In 1830 M. Guizot was a simple Deputy. He was one of the thirty who met at the house of M. Casimir Perier on the first day of the revolution of July, and he never deserted the still smaller band of patriotic Deputies who had the courage, during the following days, to sit and deliberate in the midst of the struggle, while the cannon were roaring in the streets, and the crowd of insurgents who protected them were sometimes engaged in combat under the windows."

Again, with reference to a more recent period:—

"As Minister of Public Instruction, M. Guizot presented the singular anomaly of a Protestant directing the church establishment of a Catholic country; yet his impartiality and justice were such, that he never gave cause of dissatisfaction to any party; and in his connexion with literature and education he gave to his department of state business a development and an impetus which was unknown before. He was ever ready to encourage and employ rising talent; and not a few who have since earned their bread by writing against him owed their first advancement in the world to M. Guizot's generosity."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

WOOLSTHORPE MANOR-HOUSE,

THE BIRTHPLACE OF SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

We have received the following description of this interesting nook from an intelligent correspondent, whose notes we append:—

Colsterworth is a small town, on the high road, 102 miles from London, and eight miles south of Grantham, in Lincolnshire.

Half a mile to the west of Colsterworth, and in that parish, is situated, on a little stream that runs into the River Witham, the Manor-house of Woolsthorpe, the birthplace of Newton, of which my drawing is a correct representation as it was in 1833, and as it no doubt remains at the present time.

The house belonged to Mr. Turnor, of Stoke Rochford, about two miles distant, and was in the occupation of Mr. Wollaston.

The house was built in a substantial manner of the oolitic stone of the country: and since the time of Newton the adjoining rooms in the rear, scen on the left in my drawing, were added.

I have in my possession two small engravings of the house, both taken from different points of view from mine; but though mine agrees with them in the several details, they both convey the idea of a mean cottage rather than of a well-built house, which, though very small, is neat and respectable: in the older of these engravings there are three windows in the roof, which have been removed.

Dr. Stukeley, in a letter written in 1727, says:—"It is built of stone, as is the way of the country hereabouts, and a reasonable good one. They led me up stairs, and showed me Sir Isaac's study, where I suppose he studied when in the country in his younger days, or, perhaps, when he visited his mother, from the University. I observed the shelves were of his own making, being pieces of deal boards."

More than a century after the doctor, I, too, had the pleasure of being led up stairs to the first floor, which is the most interesting part of the house.

Sir Isaac was born in the room on the left hand, commemorated by a small marble tablet fixed in the wall; and there was a frame which contained a copy of the cenotaph in the parish church, but neither of which gave more particulars than I have already stated.

In the room on the right was an oaken enclosure in the corner, about eight feet square, with two small windows in it, since stopped up, which was his study, or, at least, the place where he kept his books. At the corner of the house, by the study, two sun-dials had been cut on the wall, but the gnomon of each was gone; they appeared to have been experiments of Sir Isaac's youthful days.

The apple-tree, from which fell the apple that first caused Newton to reflect upon the universal law of gravity, was blown down a few years ago; but out of its wood, I am informed, a chair has been made, by order of the proprietor.

Such are the particulars I was able to collect, during a hasty visit, relative to the birthplace of a man whose fame will last as long as the earth shall endure.

THE ARMY AND NAVY IN CHINA.

THE Parliament on Tuesday evening registered its vote of thanks to the officers and men of the army and navy, who, under their respective distinguished chiefs, achieved the successful termination of the Chinese war. This very proper and most important vote was proposed in the House of Lords by the Duke of Wellington, and in the Commons by Lord Stanley—received the unanimous sanction of the Legislature—and has since been heartily and emphatically echoed by the press. We take our part with pleasure in what we consider the duty of claiming to participate in the gratitude which the country has felt itself bound honourably to record—and we the more rejoice to know that the fine outburst of public approval, which will reward the generous spirits of our gallant soldiers and sailors, is poured out from the depths of the nation's noble heart—without one touch of the contamination of party—without one base or unholy drawback of malice or of envy—without one spark of reluctance or regret—but rather with a fond, bounding, and honest enthusiasm—the pure and beautiful abandon of genuine thankfulness which must speak out its warmth, soul, and feeling—spurning all depreciation, and admitting of no rebuff. This is the true English spirit which makes nationality eloquent, and strikes party dumb!

We should hold ourselves culpable if we did not put forward this pleasing and exhilirating theme of a country's thanks to its generals and defenders as a very prominent feature to regard in the week's brief history. We are proud of it on all hands. It tells truth, rewards honour, stimulates ambition, and rolls the glorious and sparkling river of emulation, flooding into bosoms which it is sure to fertilize and enrich with noble thoughts. Nor do we despise the occasion which has called forth this proper manifestation of public feeling. The Chinese war was not a war of mighty prowess, it was not a war of trophy, vanity, and pride, but it was a great war for mankind. It opened the eyes of millions of human beings who were buried in the dark recesses of idolatry, and unfurled the wings of commerce in regions where they had hitherto been kept both chained and clipped. It brought with it none of the ordinary glories of a shining warfare, but it exhibited some of the finer influences of humanity and Christianity. We did not charge our brave fellows up to the knees in blood, but while conquest crowned their perils, and victory escorted them upon their way with facile step, we watched them enduring and forbearing—recording the great lesson which lends lustre to all triumphs, and enshrining the principles of virtue and brotherhood within the very temple of discord itself. It would seem from the disclosures made to the public from Parliament that the Chinese could hardly be brought to consider us as enemies, so humane were we to our captives, and so gentle in our administration of the natural obligations of mankind. This fact bears a plume for our gallant services which they may well be proud to wear.

In a commercial sense, the Chinese war has been a most important one. It has, as it were, unlocked a gate of treasure, and taught reserve and prejudice to succumb to the mighty spirit of trade. It has drawn new and wonderful resources from the very heart of bigotry and wilfulness, and opened up fresh streams of national intercourse and civilisation. It has given a natural and healthy impetus to depressed commerce at home—it has spread a wonder at our prosperity abroad; but most and last of all, it has shed the holy and glorious gleam of Christianity upon an almost pagan world. A new worship may yet spring up and flourish over the old idolatry, and England may have the solemn honour of teaching Chinese superstition to break its fetters, and bow down in humility to the religion of CHRIST.

In all senses, therefore, but that of abstract military glory, the results of the Chinese war afford a subject of congratulation, and the vote of thanks to those who achieved them is worthy of Parliament and the country. We were proud to find the subject mooted in the House of Peers by the Duke of Wellington. He is "the very fittest man of all the realm" to give countenance and ability to so important an expression of public gratitude. His testimony in their favour is treasure to the two services that have worked out our renown; and, although we do not go the length of Lord Brougham in declaring that the good word of the Waterloo warrior should be prized higher than the praise of a British Parliament, yet we cheerfully concede that the deliberate approval of Wellington does indeed invest that praise with an authority and value of which those who are happy enough to receive it may most justly be proud. In proposing the vote of thanks his grace dwelt with the precision of an interested soldier upon the whole project and fulfilment of the campaign, and proved the carefulness of his possession of facts, and the instinct capacity of his nature to measure and appreciate the most minute exigencies of war. Of course the voice of the old general carried all before it, and the vote was passed with a cordiality worthy of the tribute it was intended to pay.

In the House of Commons the same subject was eloquently treated by Lord Stanley, and met in an honest and generous spirit by Lord Palmerston. There was much good taste and judgment in the latter nobleman's testimony to the most gratifying and beautiful point for contemplation in all the successes of our troops—their moderation—their forbearance—their humanity. "The generals were moderate in the midst of success, and, while in the command of troops flushed with victory, they restrained them from those acts of violence which too often disgrace the annals of warfare. That is a point which ought to be borne in mind by the house when considering the vote of thanks now before them, for there is another and important consideration connected with that view of the case—namely, that it was the humanity and forbearance on the part of our troops towards the people of China which essentially contributed to the success of our military operations. (Hear, hear.) That conduct excited in the minds of the people of that country a friendly feeling towards us, and we know that the Chinese troops expressed the utmost astonishment at the forbearance of our troops. They had been accustomed to give no quarter to their captives, but to practise the utmost barbarity upon all whom they vanquished and they were surprised that England should take so much pains, expose themselves to danger and death, and expend so much treasure, all for the purpose of inflicting wounds upon the Chinese, which afterwards they took so much trouble to cure. (Hear, hear.) That is an illustration both of the character of the Chinese themselves, and of the contrast afforded by the conduct of our troops. I remember Mr. Canning ridiculing the idea of sending out sixteen thousand bayoneted philosophers; but we have now seen a smaller body of men, philosophers of the same kind, who, instead of exhibiting that ferocity usually displayed by men with arms in their hands, have, by the force of their example, taught their enemy a lesson of humanity towards the conquered. (Cheers.)"

We must not close this article without joining in the general commendation which has everywhere been bestowed upon Sir Henry Pottinger. The circumstance of his fulfilling a diplomatic rather than a military position excluded him technically from the parliamentary votes of thanks; but all parties alike paid their tribute to his wisdom, bravery, and discretion, and his status in public opinion is now placed upon one of the fairest pinnacles of fame.

VIEW OF OPORTO

INSURRECTION AT OPORTO.

The long-pending conflict beyond the Ministers and the nation has at length assumed an aspect of a more serious nature than was anticipated. The Government, having calculated beyond its strength, has again found itself at fault, and this ill-fated country seems doomed to be the victim of anarchy and insurrection. On the 4th inst. the steamer Porto, from Oporto, arrived with the news that the whole of that city was in a state bordering upon rebellion.

It appears that immediately after the publication of the lists of the assessments of the Decima Industrial (Income-tax), a universal feeling of disgust and determination to disobey took possession of all parties, owing to the arbitrary, unfair, and unequal manner in which this new impost had been levied. The lists were torn down, and the inhabitants publicly expressed their intention of resisting claims made upon them which they were unable to bear. The authorities, actuated by fear, threw all the odium upon the Government, and a conference having been held betwixt the civic chambers and the governor of the place, the following proclamation was issued:—

"Inhabitants of Oporto,

"For some days past this heroic and ever loyal city has given a most evident proof of the proneness of man to err, when led away by the impulse of hasty impressions, in which reflection has been allowed to take no part. The publication of the lists of the assessment of the dccima and annexed taxes, which the law demands should be made in order that every person so assessed become acquainted with the amount for the purpose of petitioning the committee in the event of overcharge, has been erroneously reputed by many of the citizens as the publication of an irrevocable sentence. It is not for me to decide upon the justice of the reclamation of any one. But it is a duty incumbent upon me as a magistrate to make known to all mcn—and, that every other proceeding contrary to petitioning the committee is illegal and disorderly. These means of redress, which the law amply provides for, have not been had recourse to. No one has, therefore, ground to complain of injustice done to him, and therefore all public clamour can only be considered as pressure, and as emanating from the insidious movements of the enemies of the constitutional charter. Citizens and countrymen, let peace once more be your guide; the lists have been recalled, and will be submitted to the reconsideration of the respective committees, and every irregularity and error will be amended where found. The Government, by yesterday's post, has been made acquainted with the dissatisfaction which has been manifested. Let order and respect to the laws conduct you to the paths those laws have established, without which society could not exist.

"ANTONIO LUIS ABRERO, Governor."

This proclamation was taken down and torn to pieces in the Praça of Don Pedro, amidst loud cries of "Long live the Queen and Charter, and down with the taxes!" At five in the evening a troop of cavalry arrived in the square, and formed up in line, but made no charge upon the people. The scene which followed can scarcely be described; with the rapidity of lightning the whole mass fell upon the military, dismounted them, and scouted them from the square, thousands of voices vociferating, "Long live our Queen!" "Down with the Ministry!" "No taxation!" "Down with the thieves who are plundering us!" Shortly after a body of municipal infantry came into the square, the commander of which, upon seeing the attitude taken by the populace, very prudently returned to the barracks.

At eleven o'clock on the morning of the steamer leaving, from the multitudes which were congregating from all quarters, a repetition of these disgraceful scenes was to be expected. It is, moreover, to be feared that Lisbon, catching the infection, will also be the theatre of some similar commotion, for all acts of the renowned city are generally followed up here by others of a like nature, invincible Oporto leading the way.

Such a state of things is deeply to be lamented, for it can only retard the restoration of the country to anything like prosperity. The distress of the Douro wine district is beyond everything great, and most finally compel the Government to cede to the views of England; and it is admitted by all that their unwise, not to say stupid, refusal regarding the tariff has brought upon them a universal feeling of odium.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The Paris papers of Monday announced that the French Government had just received the subjoined telegraphic communication from Madrid, which announces the adjustment of the differences between the two Governments:—

"Madrid, Feb. 11.

"The official disavowal was inserted in the Gazette of the 10th in formal terms. It is only this morning I have received the answer to my note; it appears to me satisfactory."

A telegraphic despatch, dated Perpignan, the 10th of February, had also reached the French Government. It was as follows:—

"The Regent has permitted Barcelona not to pay what remained due on the war contributions. The journals of the 8th contain the letter of General Seoane to the Municipality and Chamber of Commerce, announcing the above. The editor of the Papagayo has been restored to liberty."

General Seoane has addressed to the Minister of War the following despatch:

"In my despatch of the 18th inst. I gave your Excellency a slight idea of the state of irritation and intense unrest in which a great portion of the inhabitants of this city had been plunged, in consequence of the seditious articles published in the journals, and the bad advice of individuals who had devoted themselves to the task of keeping the public mind in a state of hostile agitation. The soldiers of the garrison have been insulted, but their forbearance and good discipline have prevented any serious collision. In the night of yesterday things assumed a more serious and alarming aspect. Groups assembled at different points of the city, and insulted and pursued some officers who were passing, and who, after defending themselves as long as they could against superior numbers, were compelled to seek safety in the houses near. A patrol which was passing met also with great insult from the mob, and were followed and pelted with stones for some distance, several stones being at the same time thrown against the balconies of the houses. The arrival of the Governor-General of the city, with a strong reinforcement, succeeded at length in dispersing them. Your Excellency will be able to judge from this of the state of affairs in the capital of the city, and that the means hitherto adopted have been powerless in subduing the spirit of insurrection which prevails amongst the population. I shall, therefore, be under the necessity of adopting the most energetic and stringent measures which are in my power, in order to put an end to a state of things which will otherwise tend to the utter ruin and destruction of this city.

"I beg your Excellency to lay this despatch before the Regent

GREECE. BANKRUPTCY OF THE GREEK GOVERNMENT.—ATHENS, Jan. 21.—Soon after the departure from hence of the French steamer of the 10th instant, it was remarked that there was great activity among the diplomatic body, and that there were frequent visits and conferences. It soon became known that the Greek Government had, at last, officially notified to the representatives of the allies, that the hour was come when it could no longer attempt to pay the interest of the guaranteed loan; and that an announcement, it appears, was accompanied by a demand for further advances. It has also transpired that the Greek Government, in thus notifying its inability to pay the allies, does not attempt to conceal the fact, that it sees no prospect of being able to do so for years to come.

SPAIN.—"We are assured," says the National, "that England, satisfied with having proved that she can cause an embarrassment to Spain when she pleases, is now desirous of proving that she can calm the storm when ever it suits her purpose. She has insisted upon Espartero giving the satisfaction demanded by our Governments. It is in consequence quite contradicting in the Madrid Gazette the official report of M. Guizzieres against our consul. At the same time the English Cabinet has apprised our government that M. Lesseps's position at Barcelona, or even in any other part of Spain, is such that he can no longer communicate with the authorities on those terms by which alone he could protect the interests of French subjects in that country. As soon, therefore, as the satisfaction given to France shall have re-established a good understanding between the two governments, the Regent will demand that M. Lesseps should receive another appointment; and England pretends that, between two friendly powers, it is never refused to remove an ambassador who has displeased the government to which he has been accredited. By these means all would be arranged. France would have obtained satisfaction for the murderous report of M. Guttieres, and Spain on her side would receive an assurance that M. Lesseps should be recalled."

At Barcelona the journals continue to remain under interdict, and their editors are threatened with death if they resume the pen. It was attempted to put down the Diario, but on the representation that the publication of commercial intelligence was indispensable to the interests of the city, the paper was allowed to publish until further orders. It is stated that a conspiracy had been discovered in the garrison of Montjuich, and that several of the officers had been arrested.

All alarm respecting the probability of a rupture between France and Spain had ceased upon the Bourse, and the prices of the rentes and foreign funds were all upon the advance.

LEVANT MAIL.—CONSTANTINOPLE, Jan. 25.—The old dispute with Austria on the subject of the right of its steamers to run as passage boats between the Ottoman ports, after having produced much angry discussion, has caused the Austrian embassy to break off diplomatic intercourse with the Porte. A courier was in consequence sent off with despatches for Vienna. The suspension of relations continued till the 23rd, when the matter was pro tempore arranged.

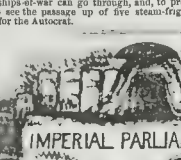
M. Boutenieff has become very active in his endeavours to push the Porte into a decision regarding Servia. It is well known that the pretensions of Russia are that the new order of things has occurred in Servia contrary to the terms of existing treaties, and demands that the Porte should rectify the errors committed. The Servians say that her conduct is fully sanctioned by those treaties, and that nothing exists to require correction. In the meantime the Sultan will probably not give his answer to the autograph letter of the Emperor until all the differences on the subject are cleared up. It is said that Russia is fully determined to carry her point if she can; everybody is aware with what address her measures are generally directed, so that unless the Porte be well supported by her western friends it may yet go hard with her in this case.

By last accounts Syria was tranquil. We ought soon to hear of the nomination of the Maronite and Druse chiefs

Last night a grand ball was given by Sir Stratford and Lady Canning; it went off with great éclat, most of the high pachas and personages in power were present, and appeared to enjoy the scene amazingly

JANUARY 29.—Matters appear to be assuming a new complication in SYRIA. The chiefs of Lebanon have been named; but before Emir Haidar accepted the nomination of prince over the co-religionists, the Maronites, it is said that he demanded not only that the Druses should be compelled to make good the amount of property pillaged and destroyed by them, but that the villages where the robbery occurred, although inhabited by a mixed population of Maronites and Druses, should be confided to his sole administration. Emir Reslan, on the other hand, at the same time selected as governor over his co-religionists, the Druses, put forward his pretensions, as it was judged so exaggerated a form, that they were not accorded, and he threw up his commission. Esaad Pacha, who is a tight hand, and was irritated at the Druse's cavalier conduct, had from therefore seized and incarcerated, a fact which, it is feared, will have a very bad effect among the Druses. The Pacha then, under the plea that the districts of Djebail and Behani (for a long time past included in the government of Mount Lebanon) formerly belonged to the Sanjak of Tripoli, has taken possession of them, though the inhabitants are Maronites; and letters from Beyrout state that in consequence of these circumstances there is a rising spirit of discontent in the mountains, which may burst forth into open insurrection at any moment.

Captain Williams, accompanied by Mr. Redhouse, his talented interpreter, set out from that place, on the 27th, for Trebisonde. The story that had been got up, that the Stromboli would take up the mission, was altogether a mistake. It was not recollected that she, as a British man-of-war, could not go into the Russian ports of the Black Sea, from which we voluntarily excluded ourselves by the unaccountable treaty of July 13, 1841. None but Russian ships-of-war can go through, and, to prove that they can, we are shortly to see the passage up of five steam-frigates, built or building in England for the Autocrat.



HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock. In answer to a question from Lord Clarendon, the Earl of RIPON said it was the intention of the Government to introduce into the other house of Parliament a bill for regulating the erection of public buildings in London.—The Duke of WELLINGTON laid upon the table papers respecting the war in Affghanistan, and postponed the motion for a vote of thanks upon the subject to the army from Thursday until Monday next.—Lord BROUGHAM, on this intimation, postponed, from Monday next till Thursday se'nnight, his motion respecting the London corporation.—Lord CAMPBELL then moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the law of libel, and in so doing gave a sketch of its origin in early times, but, not having undergone alterations suited to the changes in society, the law of libel of the present day was much more adapted to the times in which it originated. It was a singular feature in the existing law that the most infamous libellers—those who traded in libel and made fortunes by receiving money to refrain from attacking respectable people were precisely the persons who carried on their infamous publications with impunity.—Lord BROUGHAM seconded the motion, and said that some alteration of the law of libel was requisite, for the purpose of putting an end to the impunity of those most scandalous of all libellers referred to by his noble and learned friend, of putting a stop to those infamous persons who abused the liberty of the press, as pirates abused the highway of the seas—who perpetrated cruelties in furtherance of the most sordid traffic upon the terrors of man and womankind, and could only be viewed with abhorrence and disgust for their infamous and detestable practices. The Lord Chancellor would not object to the bill, as would not therefore discuss the subject until he could do so with greater advantage, when the committee should have closed its labours. Lord DENMAN, in supporting the motion, said that the most serious truth ought to be considered libellous, for the greatest pain might be inflicted in domestic life by the publication even of the truth. It would therefore be very difficult to define the nature of libel, and it would require much consideration.—After a few words from Lord Cottenham the motion was agreed to.—Lord Langdale moved the second reading of the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Bill, which was agreed to, after a few observations.
